A "PREFACE" is not generally, as the word seems to imply, the beginning of a book, except as to its location, inasmuch as it embraces the last words that come from the author's pen and is the last—with the title-page and contents—to be printed. This enables the writer to have a final word with his readers, even after the book proper is completed. In this instance the opportunity will be used in returning our grateful acknowledgments to the many citizens of the two counties who have assisted in the preparation of this volume.

We are particularly indebted to Hon. Thomas Lawrence, D. S. Anderson, Esq., Hon. Samuel H. Hunt, Thomas G. Bunnell, David Thompson, Esq., John T. Stewart, Richard F. Goodman, Thomas Kays, Esq., Jonathan Havens, M.D., George H. Nelden, Theodore Morford, Thomas Ryerson, M.D., William M. Smith, Maj. William R. Mattison, Rev. A. A. Haines, of Sussex County; and to Hon. James M. Robeson, Hon. William H. Morrow, Hon. Samuel Sherrerd, Jehiel S. Shipman, Esq., Judge J. T. Kern, Hon. John I. Blair, Charles E. Vail, Charles Seranton, J. V. Creveling, John Simerson, Josiah Ketcham, Rev. E. C. Cline, B. F. Howey, Oscar Jeffery, Judge P. H. Hann, J. E. Fulper, Joseph A. Shrope, Augustus H. Dellicker, Caleb H. Valentine, Ziba Osmon, Israel Harris, Drs. Brakeley, Johnson, Griffith, Cook, and Clark, of Warren County; and Hon. Henry C. Kelsey, Trenton, etc.*

The list of those who have contributed to, and in various ways aided in the preparation of, this work is so large that we may be pardoned for not attempting to enumerate each individually. But to the members of the press generally, and the various representatives of the clerical, legal, and medical professions, in Sussex and Warren Counties, we are particularly indebted. The old residents—descendants of the early pioneers—have also nobly come to our aid, placing at our disposal much that is rare and ancient in documents and verbal lore, and which must prove of inestimable value in the future. The efficient and polite county officials have rendered valuable assistance, especially in the documentary portions of the work and in the compilation of the county and township civil lists. So generally and so generously has encouragement been given to our labors that we can charitably overlook the very few exceptions.

Conscientious labor has been bestowed upon this history, with a view to make it as thorough and accurate as possible. These endeavors have been prosecuted often in the face of obstacles,— loss of records, imperfect recollections, and conflicting accounts,—and we trust that a charitable public will keep this in view in passing judgment upon this volume, the result of these efforts. Our work has been performed as if it was not for the day only, but for all coming time; and it is safe to assume that these gathered annals will grow in value with each passing year.

To the author's zealous and able staff of writers much credit is also due, particularly to Prof. W. W. Clayton, who with skill and care has told the tale of the birth, infancy, and development of this country, as found in the general history chapters of Sussex and Warren Counties; also to Messrs. W. H. Shaw, E. O. Wagner, D. Schwartz, etc., who have labored in the special department of township and borough histories.

The publishers have embodied in this handsome volume the historical manuscripts which the author and his numerous assistants have gathered and edited, and with our best wishes they now go back, on the printed page, to the citizens of Sussex and Warren.

JAMES P. SNELL.

NEW JERSEY.

CHAPTER I.

BRIEF REVIEW OF THE EARLY HISTORY OF NEW JERSEY.

I.—DISCOVERY BY HENRY HUDSON.

THE history of Sussex and Warren Counties is so intimately interwoven with the early history of the State of which they are a part that a brief review of the latter seems to be a necessary preliminary step to the local work which is the design of the present volume.

New York and New Jersey were discovered and occupied by Europeans at nearly the same period,—the early part of the seventeenth century. Henry Hudson, the discoverer of the noble river which bears his name, and which forms a portion of the eastern boundary of New Jersey, set sail from Amsterdam, Holland, under the auspices of the Dutch East India Company, on April 4, 1609, with a commission to discover the Northwest Passage or to verify the dream of geographers of that period of a short cut between Europe and China. Hudson did not find the Northwest Passage, but, what is vastly more important to commerce, he discovered the North River, and sailed up its broad and beautiful channel to about the point which is still the head of navigation by those palatial steamers which have taken the place of his "Vlieboot," the "Half-Moon."

Before this, however, Hudson had anchored in the waters of New Jersey, in that grand old bay, the Delaware, which forms the outlet oceanward of the noble river which courses along the western borders of these counties, and which, cutting through the ancient Pahaqualin Mountain, forms within their limits that marvelous phenomenon of nature the Water Gap. In sailing towards the east coast of America, Hudson encountered the ice-floes on the Banks of Newfoundland and changed his course southward. In consequence of this he entered Chesapeake Bay, and, coasting northward, soon cast anchor in the Delaware. Proceeding along the eastern coast of New Jersey, he finally anchored inside of Sandy Hook on Sept. 3, 1609. On September 5th he sent his boat ashore southward in the vicinity of the Horseshoe to take the soundings of the depth of the water. "Here the boat's crew landed and penetrated into the woods in the present limits of Monmouth County," N. J. These were probably the first Europeans who set foot upon the soil of the State.

II.—OCCUPATION OF NEW NETHERLANDS.

Passing over the subsequent operations of Hudson and his return to Holland, we bestow a passing notice upon the first settlement of the New Netherlands by the Dutch, which immediately preceded the first colony planted in New Jersey by the Danes or Norwegians. In 1610 it appears that at least one ship was sent hither by the East India Company for the purpose of trading in furs, which it is well known continued for a number of years to be the principal object of commercial attraction to this part of the New World. Five years after Hudson's voyage a company of merchants, who had procured from the States-General of Holland a patent for an exclusive trade on Hudson's River, had built forts and established trading-posts at New Amsterdam (New York), Albany, and the mouth of the Rondout Kill. The latter was a small redoubt on the site of what is now a part of the city of Kingston, N. Y. It was known as the "Konduit," from whence comes the name of Rondout.* The fort near Albany was upon Castle Island, immediately below the present city, and the one at New York was erected on what is now the Battery.

On the 11th of October, 1614, the "United Company" of merchants, above referred to, received their special grant. This conferred upon Gerrit Jacob Witsen, former burgomaster of the city of Amsterdam, and his twelve associates, ship-owners and merchants of Amsterdam, the exclusive right to "visit and navigate all the lands situate in America between New France and Virginia, the sea-coasts of which lie between the fortieth and forty-fifth degrees of latitude, which are now named New Netherlands, and to navigate, or cause to be navigated, the same for four voyages within the period of three years, to commence from the 1st day of January, 1615, or sooner." Having thus obtained the exclusive right to trade in the new country, they assumed the name and title of "The United New Netherland Company." This company took possession of the Hudson River, then called by them "De Riviere van den Vorst Mauritius," and carried forward their enterprise with commendable zeal. The Hollanders were a trading people, and their bartering- or trading-posts were established at points which were natural outlets for all the trapping regions tributary to the Hudson. This led in a short time to the settlement of those points. Determined upon the settlement of a colony, the States-General in 1621 granted the country to the West India Company; and in the year 1625, Peter Minuet arrived at "Fort Amsterdam" as the first Governor or director.*

The first emigrants under Minuet appear to have been from the river Waal, in Guelderland, and, under the name of "Waaloons," founded the first permanent settlement beyond the immediate protection of the cannon of Fort Amsterdam. They settled at Brooklyn, opposite New York, and were the first who professionally pursued agriculture.†

III.—SETTLEMENTS AT BERGEN AND ON THE DELAWARE.

Meanwhile, a number of Danes or Norwegians, who accompanied the Dutch colonists to the New Netherlands, had effected a settlement at Bergen,—so called from a city of that name in Norway. This was about the year 1618. In 1623 the West India Company dispatched a ship loaded with settlers, subsistence, and articles of trade. The vessel was commanded by Cornelius Jacobs Mey. He entered Delaware Bay and gave his name to the northern cape, which still retains it,—Cape May. He explored the bay and the river, and at length landed and built a fort upon a stream called by the natives Sassakon (now Thunder Creek), which empties into the Delaware below Camden. The fortification was called "Fort Nassau," and its erection may be regarded as the first attempt to establish a settlement on the eastern shore of the Delaware.‡

† At this period the English government seems to have been indifferent concerning the continued occupation of the Dutch. The only measure adopted to effect their removal was the issuing of a grant, June 21, 1634, to Sir Edmund Ploeden for the land they occupied. It conferred upon Sir Edmund the country between Cape May and Long Island Sound, for forty leagues inland. This tract was erected into a free county palatine by the name of New Albion, and over it, with the title of "Earl Palatine," Ploeden was made governor, he having, as it is stated,—although the fact may well be doubted,—"amply and copiously peopled the same with five hundred persons." He, however, visited the province, and resided therein seven years, exercising his office as governor; but, although he may have assumed, on paper, his rights as lord of the soil by granting to various individuals large tracts of land, it is doubted that his authority was ever established over the few inhabitants that then dwelt within the limits of his domain, excepting those who may have come over with him. There was, however, some emigration to "New Albion" as late as 1650.—Whitehead's East Jersey under the Proprietary Governments, pp. 8, 9. [The grant here referred to is given at length in "Hazari's Collection of State Papers," vol. i. p. 160.]

In the winter of 1630–31, David Pietersen De Vries, in command of a vessel, arrived in the Delaware, but found that Fort Nassau had fallen into the hands of the Indians. He erected a fort, colonized his immigrants, and returned to Holland. During his absence a feud arose with one of the native tribes, which terminated in the massacre of all the colonists. De Vries returned soon after with a new company, and, while he mourned the loss of his former companions, he narrowly escaped a similar fate. He was saved by the kindness of an Indian woman, who informed him that treachery was intended. But, "disheartened by repeated disasters, the Dutch soon after abandoned the country, and for some years not a single European was left upon the shores of the Delaware."§

IV.—SWEDISH COLONY—NEW SWEDEN.

In 1637 two Swedish ships arrived in the Delaware, bringing a number of settlers. They were soon followed by other companies, and, in 1642, John Printz, a military officer, was sent over as Governor of the colony. He established himself upon the island now known as Tinicum, which was given him by the Queen of Sweden. Here he built a fort, planted an orchard, and erected a church and several dwellings, including a fine house for himself, which was called "Printz Hall." At the same time with the Governor came also John Campanius Holm, a clergyman and the future historian of the colony; and in the same company was Lindstrom, an engineer, who afterwards published a map of the Delaware and its adjacent parts.||

In the government of New Sweden, as that portion of New Jersey was then called, Printz was succeeded by his son, John Papegoia, who soon returned to Europe and left the control to John Claudius Rising. In 1655 the Dutch sailed from Manhattan with seven ships and six hundred men, under command of Governor Peter Stuyvesant, and fell unawares upon the Swedish settlements. Fort after fort fell into their hands; the officers and principal men were made prisoners and carried to New Amsterdam, while the Dutch retained possession of the country. They held the mastery of it and of the New Netherlands, however, but a short time; for, in 1664, Charles II., King of England, sent over Col. Nichols with a fleet and army; he made a complete conquest of New Amsterdam and the surrounding country, and all the Dutch possessions fell into the hands of the English.

V.—GRANT TO THE DUKE OF YORK—PROPRIETARY GOVERNMENT.

Immediately after the surrender of New Amsterdam by Governor Stuyvesant, Charles II. granted the territory including New York and New Jersey to his brother James, the Duke of York and Albany, who in turn conveyed that portion of it now known as New Jersey to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret. This latter conveyance is said to be the first instrument in which the bounds of New Jersey are regularly defined. Berkeley and Carteret formed a constitution for the colony, and appointed Philip Carteret, a son of Sir George, as its Governor. He came in 1665, fixed the seat of government at Elizabethtown, purchased land of the Indians, and offered such favorable terms to the settlers in New England as inducements to emigrate to Jersey that many came hither and located, principally at Elizabethtown and Newark.

In 1673 the Dutch retook New York, but by the treaty of the following year the territory of both that province and New Jersey reverted to the English, who continued in undisturbed possession until the war which secured the independence of the United States of America. Doubts having arisen as to the validity of the title of the Duke of York, a new patent was issued in 1674, and Edmund Andros was sent over as Governor. Philip Carteret, who had returned to England in 1672, returned in 1675, and was welcomed by the people, who had been uneasy and disaffected under the arbitrary rule of Andros.

Lord Berkeley, dissatisfied with the pecuniary outlook of his colonization scheme, disposed of his interest to John Fenwicke, in trust for Edward Byllinge, both members of the Society of Friends. He received the sum of one thousand pounds for the tract of land then called "New West Jersey," embracing about one-half of the State as now constituted. The division between East and West Jersey was made by Carteret and the trustees of Byllinge, July 1, 1676. The line of partition was agreed on "from the east side of Little Egg Harbor, straight north, through the country, to the utmost branch of Delaware River." This line was extended from Little Egg Harbor as far as the South Branch of the Raritan, at a point just east of the Old York Road. It was run by Keith, the surveyor-general of East Jersey, but was deemed by the West Jersey proprietors to be too far west, thereby encroaching on their lands, and they objected to its continuance. On the 5th of September, 1668, Governors Coxe and Barclay, representing the respective interests, entered into an agreement, to terminate the dispute. It was that this line, so far as run, should be the bound, and that in its extension it should take the following course: From the point where it touched the South Branch, "along the back of the adjoining plantations, until it touches the North Branch of the Raritan, at the falls of the Allamitung,* thence running up that stream northward to its rise near Succasunny." From that point a short straight line was to be run to touch the nearest part of the Passaic River. Such a line would pass about five miles north of Morristown. The line was to be continued by the course of the Passaic as far as the Paquanick, and up that branch to forty-one degrees north latitude, and from that point in "a straight line due east to the partition-point on Hudson River between East Jersey and New York." This line gave to the northern part of West Jersey the present counties of Warren and Sussex, and portions of Morris, Passaic, and Bergen. The Coxe-Barclay agreement was not carried into effect, although the division-line constituted the eastern boundary of Hunterdon County until Morris County was erected, in 1738.

Edward Byllinge became so embarrassed in his financial ventures that in 1676 he was compelled to assign his interests to William Penn, Gawen Lowrie, and Nicholas Lucas, all Quakers, "to be used for the benefit of his creditors." Prior to this, however, he had sold a number of shares, and the trustees sold many of them to different purchasers, who thereby became proprietaries in common with them. Fenwicke soon after made a similar assignment. As these trustees were Quakers, the purchasers were mostly members of that body. Two companies were formed, one in Yorkshire, the other in London, both intent on colonization in America, and in the same year some four hundred persons came over, most of them of considerable means. Daniel Coxe was connected with the London Company, and one of the largest shareholders; subsequently he became the owner of extensive tracts of land in old Hunterdon County.

At that time persecution in England was driving the Quakers to America as to a haven of religious toleration and social equality. Emigration commenced in the spring of 1677, and on the 16th of June in that year the ship "Kent" arrived from London with two hundred and thirty passengers. This was the second ship "to the Western parts." Next arrived the "Willing Mind," John Newcomb commander, with sixty or seventy more. Several settlements were started, and West Jersey became, as early as the year 1680, quite populous. Burlington was founded, and became the principal town. There the land-office for the whole province of West Jersey was located, and there all deeds were recorded.

In 1681, Samuel Jennings, having received a commission from Byllinge as deputy-governor, came to West Jersey, called an assembly, and with them agreed upon a constitution and form of government. From this time on assemblies were held each year, courts were established in several places, and "justice was administered in due course of law." Jennings' successors in the executive department were

Thomas Olive, John Skeine, William Welsh, Daniel Coxe, and Andrew Hamilton. The last named continued as Governor until the proprietary charter was surrendered to the Crown.

VI.—PROPRIETARY GOVERNMENT OF EAST JERSEY.

On the 16th of October, 1680, the Duke of York relinquished all his pretensions to East Jersey in favor of the grandson and heir of Sir George Carteret,* soon after which Andros returned to England. Sir George died in 1680, and by his will, dated Dec. 5, 1678, left his widow, Lady Elizabeth, executrix of his estate and guardian of his grandson and heir, George, a son of Sir Philip, and devised to Edward, Earl of Sandwich, John, Earl of Bath, Hon. Bernard Grenville, brother to the Earl of Bath, Sir Thomas Crewe, Knight, Sir Robert Atkyns, Knight of the Bath, and Edward Atkyns, one of the barons of the Exchequer, and their heirs, among other lands, all his property in East Jersey, in trust for the benefit of his creditors. These trustees, failing to find a purchaser by private application, offered it at public sale to the highest bidder, William Penn with eleven associates, most of whom were Quakers, and some already interested in West Jersey, becoming the purchasers for three thousand four hundred pounds.† Their deeds of lease and release were dated the 1st and 2d of February, 1681-82, and subsequently each of them sold one-half of his respective right to a new associate, making in all twenty-four proprietaries.‡ In the following year the Duke of York confirmed this sale by issuing a new grant to the proprietors, their names there appearing in the following order: James, Earl of Perth, John Drummond, Robert Barclay, David Barclay, Robert Gordon, Arent Sommans, William Penn, Robert West, Thomas Rudyard, Samuel Groom, Thomas Hart, Richard Mew, Ambrose Rigg, John Heywood, Hugh Harts-horne, Clement Plumstead, Thomas Cooper, Gawen Lawrie, Edward Byllinge, James Brain, William Gibson, Thomas Barker, Robert Turner, and Thomas Warne, those in italics being eleven of the twelve original purchasers; Thomas Wilcox, the twelfth, having parted with his interest, Feb. 27, 1682, to David Barclay.§

There was a strange mingling of professions, religions, and characters in these proprietaries, among them being, as an English writer observes, "high-prerogative men (especially those from Scotland), dissenters, papists, and Quakers."|| The first twelve purchasers, however, were mostly, if not all, Quakers, and, as some of their associates were of the same religious faith, they had a controlling influence in the body, which fact may explain why Robert Barclay, of Urie, a Quaker and a personal friend of William Penn, was selected to be Governor of the province. It was a worthy choice, as he was a man of learning, of religious zeal, and of exemplary character.¶ Such was the esteem and confidence in which he was held by his fellow-proprietaries that they subsequently commissioned him as Governor for life; nor was he required to visit the province in person, but was allowed to exercise his authority by deputy. For this office he selected Thomas Rudyard, an eminent lawyer of London and one of the proprietaries.

Soon after his arrival Rudyard selected as his counselors Col. Lewis Morris, Capt. John Berry, Capt. John Palmer, Capt. William Sandford, Lawrence Andross, and Benjamin Price, before whom he was sworn into office (Dec. 20, 1682) as deputy-governor. The previous "Concessions" were confirmed, and the Assembly called by Rudyard, which held three sessions during the year 1683 at Elizabethtown, "passed several acts of importance tending to the well-being of the province." Among these were acts remodeling the criminal and penal codes, etc., and "An Act dividing the province into four counties, and appointing a high sheriff for each." The county of Bergen included all the settlements between the Hudson and Hackensack Rivers, and extended to the northern bounds of the province; Essex, all the country north of the dividing-line between Woodbridge and Elizabethtown and west of the Hackensack; Middlesex, all from the Woodbridge line on the north to Cheese-quake Harbor on the southeast, and back southwest and northwest to the province bounds; and Monmouth comprised the residue. A point of variance between the deputy-governor and Groom, the surveyor-general, led to Barclay's supersedure by Gawen Lawrie, a London merchant and a proprietary, who was already deeply interested in West Jersey.

Although most of the proprietaries resided in Great Britain, still emigration and transfers of proprietary rights soon brought to East Jersey many persons who were directly interested in the soil,—resident property-holders,—who Aug. 1, 1684, established a "Board of Proprietors," composed of "all the proprietaries that might be from time to time in the province," and was designed "to act with the deputy-governor in the temporary approval of laws passed by the Assembly, the settlement of all disputes with the planters," etc. This board continued to have prominent control within the province "of those concerns which were connected with the proprietary titles to the government and soil." Great pains was taken by the proprietary government to avoid a collision with the province of New York, whose Governor, Dongan, refrained from any open act of hostility until 1685, when William Dyre was appointed collector of the customs.

The Duke of York was now (1685), by the death of Charles II., raised to the throne as James II., and, notwithstanding he had thrice conveyed and confirmed to others all the rights, powers, and privileges he had in New Jersey, he resolved to extend his royal prerogative over it in order to increase his revenues. The proprietaries in England were not silent under this arbitrary action of the sovereign. In a petition to the king in council they specified some of the encroachments of Dongan, in relation to the seizure of vessels trading to New Jersey, as calculated to "overthrow one of the most hopeful colonies in America." In a remonstrance subsequently presented to the king they reminded him that they had not received the province as a gratuity, but had expended for it twelve thousand pounds; that under his own confirmation of their title and assurance of protection they had sent thither several hundreds of people from Scotland, but as yet had received no returns; and that, notwithstanding all these guarantees, their rights had been violated by the Governor of New York. They signified their willingness to submit to an imposition of the same customs that were levied in New York, and among other prayers requested that a customs officer might be appointed at Perth Amboy.* The last request was the only one granted, as it promised additional revenue and did not conflict with the designs he then had in view.

On the 6th of April, 1686, the Assembly met for the first time at the new seat of government, Perth Amboy. Lawrie was succeeded by Lord Neill Campbell, in the same year. His council was composed of Gawen Lawrie, Maj. John Barry, of Bergen, Isaac Kingsland, of New Barbadoes, Capt. Andrew Hamilton, of Amboy, Richard Townly, of Elizabethtown, Samuel Winder, of Cheesequake, David Mudie and John Johnson, of Amboy, and Thomas Codrington, of Raritan. In 1687, Lord Campbell returned to Scotland, leaving Andrew Hamilton as his substitute. Under the operations of the writ of quo warranto, issued in 1686 against the proprietors by the order of King James, the king's pliant tool, Andros, commissioned as Governor over all New England, proceeded to extend his sway not only over that country, but over New Jersey, and, finding the king immovable in this determination, "the proprietaries of East Jersey considered it advisable to abandon the hopeless contest for their previously-conceded privileges, and by facilitating the king's design obtain his guarantee to respect their right to the soil. They consequently made a formal surrender of their patent on this condition in April, 1688." The quo warranto process was stayed so far as affected East Jersey; and, as the pro-prietaries of West Jersey also entered into the arrangement, a new commission was directed to Andros, annexing both provinces to his government, together with New York,—Governor Dongan being thus superseded,—with Francis Nicholson as his lieutenant. This made but little if any change in the government of East Jersey, as Andros wisely continued all their officers in their places.

In August, 1689, Hamilton left for Europe, and the people of East Jersey were left to the guardianship of their county and town officers from that time until 1692. "These, however, possessed ample powers to meet all common emergencies, and without any pressure from abroad, or attempted exercise of any disputed prerogative within the province by the agents of the proprietaries, the authority of these local magistrates appears to have been respected and the peace of the community preserved."† Bancroft asserts that during this period East Jersey had no government whatever; but this is disputed by Whitehead and others, whose opinions are supported by a reference to the various charters and local regulations.

After the death of Governor Barclay, in 1690, the proprietaries appointed John Latham, and, in 1691, Col. Joseph Dudley, as Governor, but the people "scrupled to obey both," although the reason is not given. Perth Amboy, the new capital, had grown to be an important village, and from thence the new settlers spread westward, entering upon the unbroken interior and establishing themselves on the banks of the Raritan, soon becoming sufficiently numerous to call for the erection of a new county; hence Somerset was set off from Middlesex in 1688, with a somewhat larger territory than it has at present.

In September, 1692, Andrew Hamilton, who had been appointed Governor, arrived in Jersey, "and was received in a manner that removed every impediment to the re-establishment of the proprietary government."‡ He appointed John Barclay receiver and surveyor-general, and Thomas Gordon resident secretary. On the 14th of the month he selected as his council Capt. Isaac Kingsland, Capt. Andrew Bowne, John Injans, of Raritan River, David Mudie, § James Dundas, John Royce, of Roycefield, Samuel Dennis, John Bishop, and Lewis Morris. September 28th a General Assembly convened at Perth Amboy, at which the laws passed subsequent to 1682 were, with a few exceptions, re-enacted and others amended. An act was also passed authorizing a special tax of four hundred pounds to lighten the burden of New York in the war between England and France, the frontier settlements being much exposed to expeditions from Canada. This action must have been prompted by a sense of duty, as East Jersey had no danger to apprehend from the French, and certainly at this time had no unusual regard for the interests of New York. In 1696 similar projects for the relief of New York found little favor.*

From 1692 to 1696 a more quiet condition of affairs prevailed than had existed for years, but dissensions were not yet at an end. Considerable agitation prevailed concerning the payment of quit-rents, but no adjustment of the matter was arrived at. The first judicial decision respecting land titles was obtained in 1695, the judgment being in favor of the party claiming under the proprietary grants. This was rendered of non-effect by the reversal of the king in council on account of a technical informality in the proceedings.

In 1697 the proprietaries in England appointed Jeremiah Basse to succeed Governor Hamilton, and much dissatisfaction was felt and expressed in both Jerseys when it was found he had not received the royal approbation, but only the support of the proprietors. For that reason he postponed calling the Assembly together, but rather sought to make friends from among the opponents of that body. It was not until Feb. 21, 1699, that he convened the Assembly. Basse's first court was held in May, 1698, the record of which bears this entry:

"Lewis Morris, Esq., came in open Court and demanded by what authority they kept Court. The Court declared by ye Kings Authority. He denied it & being asked, who was dissatisfied besides himself, he said, One and all. The court commanding ye said Morris to be taken in custody, Col. Richard Townley, Andrew Hampton, both of Elizabethtown, & three or four more, cried one and all, and ye said Lewis Morris said he would fain see who durst lay hold on him—and when a constable by order of ye Court laid hold on him, he, in ye face of ye Court, resisted."†

Soon after (1699) followed the passage of a bill by the Assembly excluding from that body "any proprietor or representative of one." This was the outcome of the opposition of George Willocks‡ to a bill before the Assembly, which was passed, and a writ issued by the Governor for the election of a member of Assembly in his stead. Thus were the proprietary interests endangered. The unjust action and harassing proceedings of New York in relation to the trade of the province formed another source of trouble. Governor Bellamont, of New York, tried to obstruct the foreign trade of East Jersey, and even forbade the printing in New York of proclamations which Governor Basse was anxious to distribute, making known the establishment of the ports of Perth Amboy and Burlington. Bellamont also published a proclamation, based upon an order he had obtained from the Crown, denying the right of the proprietors of East and West Jersey to the privilege of ports. Governor Basse resisted with much spirit. He put a cargo on board the ship "Hester," lying at Perth Amboy, and it was about to sail, when Bellamont sent down an armed force, seized the vessel and brought her to the city; and, as Basse refused to have her cleared from New York, she was condemned in the Court of Admiralty. These difficulties continued until 1700, when Basse's claim for damages came before the Court of King's Bench, resulting in an award to Basse and the thorough establishment of the right of East Jersey to the privileges of a port.

If Governor Basse met with opposition from the people at first, he found it greatly increased as months passed. Indeed, there were serious apprehensions of an insurrection under the leadership of Willocks and Morris. Nor were matters improved by the action of the citizens of Perth Amboy in returning Lewis Morris to the seat in the Assembly declared vacant by the dismissal of Willocks. Although both were cited to appear before the court at its October term,—which citation they refused to obey,—and although both the Council and Assembly became involved in this vexatious issue, it does not appear that they were tried, for every month brought greater anarchy, until Basse's government was openly defied. Aug. 19, 1699, Governor Hamilton was reinstated, notwithstanding Basse's efforts to prevent it; but he did not arrive in the province until December, prior to which time Basse had sailed for England. Hamilton's course being one of pacification,§ his authority was at first generally submitted to; but this was not to last long, for there was still a numerous party who held a deep-rooted aversion to the proprietary government, no matter by whom represented. The majority of the Assembly were of this class, and when Hamilton dissolved the Assembly, May 31st, the day after it first convened, "the validity of his commission was for the first time openly called in question. Tumultuous and seditious meetings were subsequently held, the justices appointed by him were assaulted while sitting in open court by bodies of armed men, the sheriffs were attacked and wounded when in the discharge of their duties, and every exertion made to seduce those peaceably disposed from their allegiance to the government; so that this period became known in after-years as 'the Revolution.'"|| Of this critical time Whitehead says,—

"A crisis had evidently arrived in the affairs of the province which the proprietors were not prepared to encounter successfully. As a body they had become so numerous, so scattered,—some in England, some in Scotland, and some in America,—and so divided in interests, that unanimity in council could scarcely be expected; and yet the inhabitants were pursuing such a system of measures as required the utmost wisdom to project, with equal firmness and union to administer, such remedies as could alone lead to the re-establishment of peace and regularity; without these necessary qualities to control their opponents, but one result could be anticipated."¶

VII.—SURRENDER OF THE GOVERNMENT TO THE CROWN.

In the years 1701 and 1702 there occurred many dissensions and disturbances in both the east and west provinces, but the proprietors, finally wearied of contending with one another, and with the people, drew up an instrument whereby they surrendered their right of government to the Crown,* which was accepted by Queen Anne, April 17, 1702. This was the end of proprietary government in New Jersey; thenceforward, until 1776, it was under royal rule.

The queen consolidated both Jerseys into one province, and commissioned Lord Cornbury as Governor of both New York and New Jersey. In this capacity he acted from 1703 until 1708, when, giving heed to the grievous complaints made against him by the people, the queen revoked his commission. He was succeeded by John, Lord Lovelace, but his death (which occurred May 5, 1709) threw the government into the hands of Lieutenant-Governor Ingoldsbey. Governor Hunter's administration commenced in 1710; in 1720 he resigned in favor of William Burnet. Afterwards officiated John Montgomery, 1727 to 1731; William Cosby, 1731 to 1736; John Anderson, also in 1736; John Hamilton, 1736 to 1738. In the summer of the last-named year a commission arrived to Lewis Morris as Governor of New Jersey, separate from New York; he served until his death, in 1746. He was followed successively by President Hamilton, 1746; John Reading, 1746; Jonathan Belcher, 1747; John Reading, 1757; Francis Bernard, 1758; Thomas Boone, 1760; Josiah Hardy, 1761; and William Franklin, son of Benjamin Franklin, in 1763,—the last royal Governor, he being deposed, arrested, and sent a prisoner to Connecticut in 1776.

The proprietaries who signed away the sovereignty of East Jersey were Peter Sonnans, Joseph Ormston, Charles Ormston, Edward Antill, George Willocks, Francis Hancock, Sir Thomas Lane, Paul Dominique, Robert Mitchell, Joseph Brookshank, Edward Richler, Michael Watts, Clement Plumstead, Robert Burnet, Miles Foster, John Johnston, Michael Hawdon, John Barclay, David Lyell, Thomas Warno, Thomas Gordon, Thomas Barker, Thomas Cooper, Gilbert Mollison, Richard Huseel, and William Dockwa. Three of these—those in Italics—were of the twenty-four who nineteen years previous had received the grant from the Duke of York. And it was said in 1759 that sixty-four years after the grant to the twenty-four (1746) there was not a male descendant of the whole number enjoying "a foot of land in East Jersey" excepting the right of the Penns and two or three small plantations occupied by the Hartshornes and Warnes,—a reflection which should "blate our ardor in the pursuit of lands and wealth, and make us think ourselves, at best, but tenants in common to the blessings which the earth produces and co-heirs of the gifts of nature."—A Pocket Commentary of the first settling of New Jersey by the Europeans: and an account or fair detail of the original Indiana East Jersey grants, and other rights of a like tenor in East New Jersey, digested in order. New York, printed by Samuel Parker, 1759. CHAPTER II.

ORIGINAL COUNTIES AND THEIR BOUNDARIES.

I.—COUNTIES UNDER THE PROPRIETORS.

PREVIOUS to the act of the General Assembly of 1709 erecting and defining the boundaries of the old counties of New Jersey, eight had been formed. These were Monmouth, Essex, and Salem, in 1675; Gloucester, in 1677; Middlesex, in 1682; Somerset, in 1688; Cape May, in 1692; and Burlington, in 1694. These may be called the original counties under the proprietary government. In 1702 the proprietors surrendered their charter to Queen Anne, and the royal government was extended over East and West Jersey, united in one province. After the brief and inglorious administration of Lord Cornbury, the provincial government was organized under John, Lord Lovelace, Baron of Hurley, and the Legislature convened first at Bergen and then at Burlington. Nothing, however, was done by the first four Assemblies towards organizing the civil divisions of the province.

II.—COUNTIES DEFINED BY THE ACT OF 1709.

In the eighth year of the reign of Queen Anne, the fifth Assembly, held at Burlington, passed an act dividing and ascertaining the boundaries of all the counties in the province, as follows:

In the eastern division, the county of Bergen should begin at Constable's Hook, and so run up along the bay and Hudson River to the partition-point between New York, and so to run along the partition-line between the provinces and the division-line of the eastern and western divisions of this province to Pequanoek River; and so to run down the said Pequanoek River and Passaic River to the Sound, and so to follow the Sound to Constable's Hook, where it began.

Essex began at the mouth of the Rahway River where it falls into the Sound, and ran up said river to Robinson's Branch; thence west to the division-line between the eastern and western divisions, and so to follow the said division-line to the Pequanoek River, where it meets the Passaic River; thence down the Passaic River to the bay Sound; thence down the Sound to where it began.

The county of Somerset began where Bound Brook empties itself into the Raritan River; thence down the stream of Raritan to the mouth of a brook known by the name of Lawrence's Brook; thence running up the said Lawrence's Brook to Cranberry Brook; from thence south forty-four degrees, westerly to Saunpink Brook, to the said division-line of the easterly and westerly divisions aforesaid, and so to follow the said division-line to the limits of the aforesaid county of Essex; thence east along the line of Essex County to Green Brook and Bound Brook to where it began.

Middlesex County began at the mouth of the creek that parts the lands of George Willocks and what were formerly Capt. Andrew Brown's; thence along the said Capt. Andrew's line to the rear of said land; thence upon a direct course to Warne's bridge, on the brook "where Thomas Smith did formerly live;" thence upon a direct course to the southeast corner of Barclay tract of land that lies near Matchaponix; thence to the most southernmost part of said tract of land in Middlesex County; thence upon a direct line to Saupinck bridge on the high-road, including William Jones, William Story, Thomas Buchanan, and John Guyberson, in Monmouth County; thence along the said road to Aaron Robin's land; thence westerly along the said Robin's land and James Lawrence's line to the line of the eastern and western divisions aforesaid, including Robin's and Lawrence's, in Monmouth County; thence northerly along the said line to Saupinck Brook, being part of the bounds of said Somerset County; thence following the lines of the said Somerset and Essex Counties, and so to the Sound; and thence down the Sound to Amboy Point; and from thence down the creek to where it first began.

The partition-line between Burlington and Gloucester Counties began at the mouth of Pensauquin, alias Cropwell, Creek; thence up the same to the fork; thence along the southernmost branch thereof—sometimes called Cole's Branch—until it comes to the head thereof, which is the bounds between Samuel Lipincote's and Isaac Sharp's lands; thence upon a straight line to the southernmost bank of Little Egg Harbor's most southerly inlet; thence along the line of the sea-coast to the partition-line between East and West Jersey; thence along the said line of partition, by Maidenhead and Hopewell, to the northernmost and uttermost bounds of the township of Amwell; thence by the same to the river Delaware; thence by the river Delaware to the first-mentioned station.

The beginning-point of Gloucester County was at the mouth of Pensauquin Creek; thence up the same to the forks thereof; thence along the said bounds of Burlington County to the sea; thence along the sea-coast to Great Egg Harbor River; thence up said river to the forks thereof; thence up the southernmost and greatest branch of the same to the head thereof; thence upon a direct line to the head of Oldman's Creek; thence down the same to the Delaware River; thence up the Delaware River to the place of beginning.

Salem County began at the mouth of a creek on the west side of Stipson's Island, commonly called Teack's Creek; thence up the same "as far as high tide floweth;" thence upon a direct line to the mouth of a small creek at Tuckahoe, where it comes into the southernmost branch of the fork of Great Egg Harbor River; thence up the said branch to the head thereof; thence along the bounds of Gloucester County to Delaware River; thence down the Delaware River and Bay to the place of beginning.

Cape May County began at the mouth of a small creek on the west side of Stipson's Island, called Teack's Creek; thence up the said creek "as far as tide floweth;" thence along the bounds of Salem County to the southernmost main branch of Great Egg Harbor River; thence down the said river to the sea; thence along the sea-coast to the Delaware Bay, and so up the said bay to the place of beginning.

This last section subjected Somerset County to the jurisdiction of the courts and officers of Middlesex, for want of a competent number of inhabitants to hold courts and supply jurors, and enacted that jurors might be taken promiscuously from both to either of the said counties, but was altered on March 11, 1713.

In March, 1714, an act was passed by the General Assembly held at Burlington to alter the bounds between the counties of Somerset, Middlesex, and Monmouth, making the lines as follows:

"That the boundary-line between Somerset and Middlesex Counties shall be and begin where the road crosseth the river Raritan at Inian's Ferry, and run from thence along the said old road to Jedediah Higgins' house, leading towards the Falls of the Delaware, so far as the eastern division of the province extends.

"The boundary-line between Middlesex and Monmouth Counties shall be and begin at the mouth of the creek that parts the land of George Willocks and the land that was formerly Capt. Andrew Brown's; thence along the said captain's land to the rear of the said land; thence upon a direct course to Warne's bridge, on the brook, where Thomas Smith did formerly live; then upon a direct course to the southeast corner of Barclay's tract of land that lies near Matchaponix; thence to the most southernmost part of said tract of land, including the whole tract of land in Middlesex County; thence upon the direct line to Assaupinck bridge, on the high-road, including William Jones, William Story, Thomas Buchanan, and John Guyberson, in Monmouth County; thence along the said Aaron Robbins' and James Lawrence's line to the line of the eastern and western divisions, including the said Robbins' and Lawrence's in Monmouth County."

On Nov. 4, 1741, in the fiftieth year of the reign of George II., an act was passed by the General Assembly, convened at Perth Amboy, to annex part of the county of Essex to the county of Somerset, which made the boundaries of Somerset as follows,—viz.:

"Beginning at the South Branch of the Raritan River, where the reputed division-line between East and West Jersey strikes the same; along the rear of Raritan lots until it meets with the North Branch of said river; thence up the same to a fall of water commonly called Allamantuk; from thence along the bounds of Morris County to Puckwa River; thence down the same to the lower corner of William Dackwra's two-tenths, on the same river; thence on a straight line southeasterly to the head of Green Brook, and thence down the said brook to Bound Brook; thence down the said Bound Brook to the place where it empties itself into the Raritan River; thence down the Raritan River to the place where the road crosseth the said river at Inian's Ferry; from thence along the said old road which leads by Jedediah Higgins' house towards the Falls of the Delaware, until it intersects the division-line to the South Branch of the Raritan River, where it first began."

In 1747 an act was passed erecting the southern part of the county of Salem into a separate county, thus altering the bounds of Cumberland County, as follows:

"Beginning in the county of Salem, at the mouth of Stow Creek, and running up the same unto John Bick's mills, within the county hereby erected; then continuing still up Stow Creek Branch to the house where Hugh Dunn now dwells, leaving the said Hugh Dunn's within the new county; and from the said Hugh Dunn's house upon a straight line to Nathan Shaw's house, within the new county; and then on the northeast course until it intersects the Pilesgrove line, in Salem County; thence along the said line till it intersects the line which divides the counties of Gloucester and Salem; then running southeastward down Gloucester line into the boundary of Cape May County; then bounded by Cape May County to Delaware Bay; and up the Delaware Bay to the place of beginning."

* Robbins appears to be the correct spelling, as in the former act.

At the time of fixing the original boundary-line between Morris and Somerset Counties, upon the erection of the latter, the division-line between the said counties was to be from the Falls of Allamantuck to the Passaic River, but, not mentioning what course or where to fix upon said river, it remained uncertain, very prejudicial to the inhabitants, and a great obstacle to the officers of the counties in the discharge of their duties. Hence, to obviate the difficulty, an act was passed, March 28, 1849, beginning the division-line between the said Somerset and Morris Counties at a fall of water commonly called Allamantuck Falls, as in the previous act, and from thence on a straight line, before recited, in a "course east and by north, as the compass now points," to the main branch of Passaic River; and so down the said river as the above-recited act directs.

III.—COUNTIES IN NORTHWESTERN NEW JERSEY.

Previous to March 11, 1713, the people of the western division of New Jersey attended the several courts held in Burlington. But, it being very inconvenient for most of the inhabitants, on account of the distance and difficulties of traveling at that early day and the expense necessarily incurred, therefore, to remove these inconveniences, an act was passed by the General Assembly, March 11, 1714, in the thirteenth year of the reign of Queen Anne, erecting the county of Hunterdon, to wit:

"That all and singular the lands and upper parts of the said western division of the province of New Jersey, lying northward or situate above the brook or rivulet commonly called Assanpink, be erected into a county named, and from henceforth to be called, the County of Hunterdon; and the said brook or rivulet commonly known and called Assanpink shall be the boundary-line between the county of Burlington and the said county of Hunterdon."

The county was to have and enjoy all the jurisdictions, rights, liberties, privileges, and immunities whatsoever which any other county or province enjoyed, excepting only the choice of a representative in the General Assembly; which liberty was suspended until Her Majesty's pleasure was further known therein. This suspension lasted until Feb. 10, 1728, when King George, by his instruction to William Burnet, the Governor, was pleased to declare his royal pleasure that the county of Hunterdon should for the future have the choice of two representatives to serve in the General Assembly. The right of Salem township was suspended and given to Hunterdon, which elected two representatives in lieu of those from the former municipality.

Morris County was taken from Hunterdon by act of the General Assembly passed March 15, 1738. The boundaries are thus set forth in the act:

"That all and singular the lands and upper parts of the said Hunterdon County, lying to the northward and eastward, situate and lying to the eastward of a well-known place in the county of Hunterdon, being a fall of water in part of the North Branch of the Raritan River, called in the Indian language, or known by the name of, Allamantuck, to the north-eastward of the northeast end or part of the lands known as the New Jersey Society lands, along the line thereof crossing the South Branch of the aforesaid Raritan River, and extending westerly to a certain tree marked with the letters L. M., standing on the north side of a brook emptying itself into the said South Branch, by an old Indian path to the northward of a line to be run northwest from the said tree to a branch of the Delaware River, called Musconetcong, and so down the said branch to the Delaware River; all which said lands, being to the eastward, northward, and northwestward of the above boundaries, be erected into a county, and it is hereby erected into a county, named, and from henceforth to be called, Morris County; and the said bounds shall part and from henceforth separate and divide the same from Hunterdon County."

Up to this time Trenton had been the place for the transaction of all public business by the people living in what are now Hunterdon, Mercer, Morris, Sussex, and Warren Counties, and the expense and inconvenience of going there to attend courts and for other public purposes led to a petition from the people residing in the upper portion of Hunterdon to have the new county of Morris erected. Upon its organization courts were established at Morristown, which continued to be the seat of justice for the people of Northwestern New Jersey till the county was divided and Sussex County organized.

Sussex County was erected from the upper part of Morris County by an act of the General Assembly passed June 8, 1753, with boundaries as follows:

"That all and singular the lands and upper parts of Morris County, northwest of Musconetcong River, beginning at the mouth of said river where it empties itself into the Delaware River, and running up said Musconetcong River to the head of the Great Pond; from thence northeast to the lines that divide the province of New Jersey; thence along the said line to the Delaware River aforesaid; thence down the same to the mouth of the Musconetcong, the place of beginning, and the said Musconetcong River, so far as the county of Hunterdon bounds it, shall be the boundary-line between that county and the county of Sussex."

Such remained the bounds of Sussex County till it was reduced to its present dimensions by the detachment of Warren County in 1824. After the erection of Sussex County, from June, 1753, to Dec. 9, 1770, Hunterdon, Morris, and Sussex united in sending a representative to the General Assembly. At the last-mentioned date an act (passed by the General Assembly May 10, 1768) received His Majesty's approval, allowing each county to send a representative.

CHAPTER III.

INDIAN OCCUPATION—THE ORIGINAL PEOPLE.

I.—GENERAL TRIBAL DIVISIONS.

WHEN the first white explorers penetrated into the valleys of the Delaware and Hudson Rivers they found these, with all the country lying between them, as well as the entire area now comprised in the States of New York and Pennsylvania, peopled by aboriginal tribes of the Algonquin stock, and embraced in two nations, or groups of nations, called by Europeans the Iroquois and the Delawares, the former having been so named by the French and the latter by the English. The language spoken by both these people was the Algonquin, but differed materially in dialect. The nation to which the whites gave the name of Delawares was known in the Indian tongue as the Lenni Lenapè, or simply the Lenapè; the Iroquois were in the same tongue called the Mengwe, which name became corrupted by the more ignorant white men into Mingoes, which last term was adopted to some extent by the Delawares in its contemptuous application to their Mengwe neighbors, between whom and themselves feelings of detestation and hatred existed to no small degree.

The Mengwe or Iroquois inhabited the territory extending from the shores of Lake Erie to those of Champlain and the Hudson River, and from the headwaters of the Delaware, Susquehanna, and Allegany Rivers northward to Lake Ontario, and they even occupied a large scope of country north of the St. Lawrence, thus holding not only the whole of the State of New York, but a part of Canada, which vast territory they figuratively styled their "long council-house," within which the place of kindling the grand council-fire was Onondaga, not far from the present city of Syracuse, and at that place, upon occasion, representatives of all the Mengwe tribes met together in solemn deliberative council. These tribes consisted of the Mohawks, Senecas, Cayugas, Onondagas, and Oneidas, who collectively formed an offensive and defensive confederation, which has usually been known in English annals as that of the Five Nations.*

The Mohawks occupied the country nearest the Hudson River, and held the post of honor as the guardians of the eastern entrance of the "long house." The Senecas, who were the most numerous, energetic, and warlike of the five tribes, defended the western portal of the "house," while the Cayugas were the guardians of the southern border of the Iroquois domain,—the frontier of the Susquehanna and Delaware valleys. The Oneida tribe was located along the shores of Oneida Lake, and the Onondagas, occupying a large territory in the central portion of the present State of New York, kept watch over the council-place and fire of the banded Mengwe.

II.—THE LEAGUE OF THE IROQUOIS.

The league of the Iroquois nations had been formed—at a date which no Indian chronology could satisfactorily establish—for the purpose of mutual defense against the Lenapè and other tribes contiguous to them; and by means of this confederation, which they kept up in good faith and in perfect mutual ac-

* At a later period—soon after the commencement of the eighteenth century—the Tuscaroras, having been almost entirely subjugated and driven away from their hunting-grounds in the Carolinas, migrated northward and were received into the Iroquois confederacy, which from that time became known as the Six Nations.

cord, they were not only enabled successfully to repel all encroachments upon their own territory, but after a time to invade that of other nations, and to carry the terror of their arms southward to the Cape Fear and Tennessee Rivers, westward beyond Lake Michigan, and eastward to the shores of the Connecticut.

III.—THE DELAWARES OR LENNI LENAPÈ.

The Delawares—the Indian people with which this history has principally to deal—occupied a domain extending along the sea-shore from the Chesapeake to the country bordering Long Island Sound. Back from the coast it reached beyond the Susquehanna valley to the foot of the Allegheny Mountains, and on the north it joined the southern frontier of their domineering neighbors, the hated and dreaded Mengwe or Iroquois. This domain, of course, included not only the counties of Sussex and Warren, but all of the State of New Jersey.

The principal tribes composing the Lenni Lenapè or Delaware nation were those of the Unamis or Turtle, the Unalachtgo or Turkey, and the Minsi or Wolf. The latter, which was by far the most powerful and warlike of all these tribes, occupied the most northerly portion of the country of the Lenapè and kept guard along the Iroquois border, from whence their domain extended southward to the Musconetcong Mountains, about the northern boundary of the present county of Hunterdon. The Unamis and Unalachtgo branches of the Lenapè or Delaware nation (comprising the tribes of Assanpinks, Matas, Shackamaxons, Chiciquaas, Raritans, Nanticokes, Tuteloes, and many others) inhabited the country between that of the Minsi and the sea-coast, embracing the present counties of Hunterdon and Somerset and all that part of the State of New Jersey south of their northern boundaries. The tribes who occupied and roamed over the counties of Sussex and Warren, then, were those of the Turkey and Wolf branches of the Lenni Lenapè nation, but the possessions and boundaries of each cannot be clearly defined.

The Indian name of the Delaware nation, Lenni Lenapè, signifies, in their tongue, "the original people,"—a title which they had adopted under the claim that they were descended from the most ancient † "The Wolf, commonly called the Minsi, which we have corrupted into Monseys, had chosen to live back of the other two tribes, and formed a kind of bulwark for their protection, watching the motions of the Mengwe and being at hand to afford aid in case of a rupture with them. The Minsi were considered the most warlike and active branch of the Lenapè. They extended their settlements from the Minisink, a place named after them, where they had their council-seat and fire, quite up to the Hudson on the east, and to the west and south far beyond the Susquehanna. Their northern boundaries were supposed originally to be the heads of the great rivers Susquehanna and Delaware, and their southern that ridge of hills known in New Jersey by the name of Musconetcong, and in Pennsylvania by those of Lehigh, Conowago, etc. Within this boundary were their principal settlements; and even as late as the year 1742 they had a town with a peach-orchard on the tract of land where Nazareth, in Pennsylvania, has since been built, another on the Lehigh, and others beyond the Blue Ridge, besides many family settlements here and there scattered."—History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania, by Rev. John Heckewelder.

of all Indian ancestry. This claim was admitted by the Wyandots, Miamis, and more than twenty other aboriginal nations, who accorded to the Lenapè the title of grandfathers, or a people whose ancestry antedated their own. The Rev. John Heckewelder, in his "History of the Manners and Customs of the Indian Nations," says of the Delaware nation,—

"They will not admit that the whites are superior beings. They say that the hair of their heads, their features, and the various colors of their eyes evince that they are not, like themselves, Leani Lenapè,—no original people—a race of men that has existed unchanged from the beginning of time; but that they are a mixed race, and therefore a troublesome one. Wherever they may be, the Great Spirit, knowing the wickedness of their disposition, found it necessary to give them a Great Book, and taught them how to read it that they might know and observe what He wished them to do and what to abstain from. But they—the Indians—have no need of any such book to let them know the will of their Maker: they find it engraved on their own hearts; they have had sufficient discernment given to them to distinguish good from evil, and by following that guide they are sure not to err."

IV.—TRADITIONS AMONG THE DELAWARE TRIBES.

Concerning the origin of the Lenapè, numerous and essentially differing traditions were current among the various tribes. One of these traditions is mentioned by Loskiel in his "History of the Mission of the United Brethren among the North American Indians," as follows:

"Among the Delawares, those of the Minsi or Wolf tribe say that in the beginning they dwelt in the earth under a lake, and were fortunately extricated from this unpleasant abode by the discovery which one of their men made of a hole, through which he ascended to the surface; on which, as he was walking, he found a deer, which he carried back with him into his subterranean habitation; that the deer was eaten, and beyond his companions found the meat so good that they unanimously determined to leave their dark abode and remove to a place where they could enjoy the light of heaven and have such excellent game in abundance.

"The two other tribes, the Unamis or Tortoise, and the Unalachtgos or Turkey, have much similar notions, but reject the story of the lake, which seems peculiar to the Minsi tribe."

There was another leading tradition current among the nations of the Lenapè, which was to the effect that, ages before, their ancestors had lived in a far-off country to the west, beyond great rivers and mountains, and that, in the belief that there existed, away towards the rising sun, a red man's paradise,—a land of deer and beaver and salmon,—they had left their western home and traveled eastward for many moons, until they stood on the western shore of the Namisi Sipu (Mississippi), and there they met a numerous nation, migrating like themselves. They were a stranger tribe, of whose very existence the Lenapè had been ignorant. They were none other than the Mengwe; and this was the first meeting of those two peoples; who afterwards became rivals and enemies, and continued such for centuries. Both were now travelers and bound on the same errand. But they found a lion in their path, for beyond the great river lay the domain of a nation called Allegewi, who were not only strong in numbers and brave, but more skilled than themselves in the art of war, who had reared great defenses of earth inclosing their villages and strongholds. In the true spirit of military strategy, they permitted a part of the emigrants to cross the river, and then, having divided their antagonists, fell upon them with great fury to annihilate them. But when the Lenapè saw this they at once formed an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the Mengwe. The main body crossed the river and attacked the Allegewi with such desperate energy that they defeated and afterwards drove them into the interior, where they fought from stronghold to stronghold, till finally, after a long and bloody war, the Allegewi were not only humiliated, but exterminated, and their country was occupied by the victors. After this both nations ranged eastward, the Mengwe taking the northern and the Lenapè still keeping the more southern route, until, after long journeyings, the former reached the Mohicanituck (Hudson River) and the latter rested upon the banks of the Lenapè Wihittuck,—the beautiful river now known as the Delaware,—and here they found that Indian elysium of which they had dreamed before they left their old homes in the land of the setting sun.

These and other similar Indian traditions may or may not have some degree of foundation in fact. There are to-day many enthusiastic searchers through the realms of aboriginal lore who accept them as authentic, and who believe that the combined Lenapè and Mengwe did destroy a great and comparatively civilized people, and that the unfortunate Allegewi who were thus extinguished were none other than the mysterious Mound-Builders of the Mississippi valley. This, however, is but one of the many profitless conjectures which have been indulged in with reference to that unknown people, and is in no way pertinent to this history. All Indian tribes were fond of narrating the long journeys and great deeds of their forefathers, and of tracing their ancestry back for centuries, some of them claiming descent from the great Manitou himself. Missionaries and travelers among them who were, or professed to be, familiar with their language and customs have spoken with apparent sincerity of Indian chronology running back to a period before the Christian era, and some of the old enthusiasts claimed that these aborigines were descendants of the lost tribes of Israel.* But all the traditions of the Indians were so clouded and involved in improbability and so interwoven with superstition, and the speculations of antiquarian writers have almost uniformly been so baseless and chimerical, that the whole subject of Indian origin may be dismissed as profitless.

* In a small, quaint, and now very rare volume entitled—"An Historical Description of the Province and Country of West New Jersey in America Never made Publick till now, by Gabriel Thomas, London, 1698," and dedicated "To the Right Honourable Sir John Maser, Sir Thomas Lane, Knights and Aldermen of the City of London, and to the rest of the Worthy Members of the West Jersey Proprietors," is found the following, in reference to the aborigines of this region: "The first Inhabitants of this Country were the Indians, being supposed to be part of the Ten dispersed Tribes of Israel, for indeed they are very like the Jews in their Persons, and something in their Practices and Worship; for they (as the Pennsylvania Indians) observe the New Moons with great devotion and Reverence; And their first Fruits they offer, with their Corn and Hunting-Game they got in the whole year, to a False Deity or Sham God whom they must please, else (as they fancy) many misfortunes will befall them, and great injuries will be done them. When they bury their Dead, they put into the Ground with them some Horns & Tonsils and some Money (as tokens of their Love and Affection), with other Things, expecting they shall have Occasion for them in the other World."

V.—TOTEMS OR TRIBAL BADGES OF THE INDIANS.

The Indians, from the earliest times, considered themselves in a manner connected with certain animals, as is evident from various customs preserved among them, and from the fact that, both collectively and individually, they assumed the names of such animals. Loskiel says,—

"It might indeed be supposed that those animals' names which they have given to their several tribes were mere badges of distinction, or 'coats-of-arms,' as Pylæus calls them; but if we pay attention to the reasons which they give for those denominations, the idea of a supposed family connection is easily discernible. The Tortoise—or, as they are commonly called, the Turtle—tribe, among the Lenapè, claim a superiority and ascendancy over the others, because their relation, the great Tortoise, a fabled monster, the Atlas of their mythology, bears, according to their traditions, this great island on his back,* and also because he is amphibious and can live both on land and in the water, which neither of the heads of the other tribes can do. The merits of the Turkey, which gives its name to the second tribe, are that he is stationary and always remains with or about them. As to the Wolf, after which the third tribe is named, he is a rambler by nature, running from one place to another in quest of his prey; yet they consider him as their benefactor, as it was by his means that the Indians got out of the interior of the earth. It was he, they believe, who by the appointment of the Great Spirit killed the deer which the Monsey found who first discovered the way to the surface of the earth, and which allured them to come out of their damp and dark residence. For that reason the wolf is to be honored and his name to be preserved forever among them.

"These animals' names, it is true, they all use as national badges, in order to distinguish their tribes from each other at home and abroad. In this point of view Mr. Pylæus was right in considering them as 'coats-of-arms.' The Turtle warrior draws, either with a coat or with paint, here and there on the trees along the war-path, the whole animal, carrying a gun with the muzzle projecting forward; and if he leaves a mark at the place where he has made a stroke on his enemy, it will be the picture of a Tortoise. Those of the Turkey tribe paint only one foot of a turkey, and the Wolf tribe sometimes a wolf at large with one foot and leg raised up to serve as a hand, in which the animal also carries a gun with the muzzle forward. They, however, do not generally use the word 'wolf' when speaking of their tribe, but call themselves P'duk-sit, which means round foot, that animal having a round foot, like a dog."

VI.—INDIAN POPULATION IN NEW JERSEY.

It does not appear that the Indians inhabiting New Jersey were very numerous. In an old publication entitled "A Description of New Albion," and dated A.D. 1648, it is found stated that the native people in this section were governed by about twenty kings; but the insignificance of the power of those "kings" may be inferred by the accompanying statement that there were "twelve hundred [Indians] under the two Raritan kings on the north side, next to Hudson's River, and those came down to the ocean about little Egg-bay and Sandy Barne-gatte; and about the South Cape two small kings of forty men apiece, and a third, reduced to fourteen men, at Roymont." From which it appears evident that the so-called "kings" were no more than ordinary chiefs, and that some of these scarcely had a following. Whitehead, in his "East Jersey under the Proprietary Governments," concludes, from the above-quoted statement, "that there were probably not more than two thousand [Indians] within the province while it was under the domination of the Dutch." And in a publication† bearing date fifty years later (1698) the statement is made that "the Dutch and Swedes inform us that they [the Indians] are greatly decreased in numbers to what they were when they came first into this country. And the Indians themselves say that two of them die to every one Christian that comes in here."

VII.—CONQUEST OF THE LENNÏ LENAPÈ BY THE IROQUOIS.

Before the European explorers had penetrated to the territories of the Lenapè the power and prowess of the Iroquois had reduced the former nation to the condition of vassals. The attitude of the Iroquois, however, was not wholly that of conquerors over the Delawares, for they mingled, to some extent, the character of protectors with that of masters. It has been said of them that "the humiliation of tributary nations was to them [the Iroquois] tempered with a paternal regard for their interests in all negotiations with the whites, and care was taken that no trespasses should be committed on their rights, and that they should be justly dealt with." This means, simply, that the Mengwe would, so far as lay in their power, see that none others than themselves should be permitted to despoil the Lenapè. They exacted from them an annual tribute, an acknowledgment of their state of vassalage, and on this condition they were permitted to occupy their former hunting-grounds. Bands of the Five Nations, however, were interspersed among the Delawares‡ probably more as a sort of police, and for the purpose of keeping a watchful eye upon them, than for any other purpose.

The Delawares regarded their conquerors with feelings of inextinguishable hatred (though these were held in abeyance by fear), and they also pretended to a feeling of superiority on account of their more ancient lineage and their further removal from original barbarism, which latter claim was perhaps well grounded. On the part of the Iroquois, they maintained a feeling of haughty superiority towards their vassals, whom they spoke of as no longer men and warriors, but as women. There is no recorded instance in which unmeasured insult and stinging contempt were more wantonly and publicly heaped on a cowed

† Gabriel Thomas' "Historical Description of the Province and Country of West New Jersey in America."

‡ The same policy was pursued by the Five Nations towards the Shawanese, who had been expelled from the far Southwest by stronger tribes, and a portion of whom, travelling eastward as far as the country adjoining the Delawares, had been permitted to erect their lodges there, but were, like the Lenapè, held in a state of subjection by the Iroquois.

* And they believed that sometimes the grandfather tortoise became weary and shook himself or changed his position, and that this was the cause of earthquakes.

and humiliated people than on the occasion of a treaty held in Philadelphia in 1742, when Connossatego, an old Iroquois chief, having been requested by the Governor to attend (really for the purpose of forcing the Delawares to yield up the rich lands of the Minisink), arose in the council, where whites and Delawares and Iroquois were convened, and in the name of all the deputies of his confederacy said to the Governor that the Delawares had been an unruly people and were altogether in the wrong, and that they should be removed from their lands; and then, turning superciliously towards the abashed Delawares, said to them, "You deserve to be taken by the hair of your heads and shaken until you recover your senses and become sober. We have seen a deed, signed by nine of your chiefs over fifty years ago, for this very land. But how came you to take it upon yourselves to sell lands at all? We conquered you; we made women of you! You know you are women and can no more sell lands than women. Nor is it fit that you should have power to sell lands, since you would abuse it. You have had clothes, meat, and drink, by the goods paid you for it, and now you want it again, like children, as you are. What makes you sell lands in the dark? Did you ever tell us you had sold this land? Did we ever receive any part, even to the value of a pipe-shank, from you for it? This is acting in the dark,—very differently from the conduct which our Six Nations observe in the sales of land. But we find you are none of our blood; you act a dishonest part in this as in other matters. Your ears are ever open to slanderous reports about your brethren. For all these reasons we charge you to remove instantly! We do not give you liberty to think about it. You are women! Take the advice of a wise man, and remove instantly! You may return to the other side of the river, where you came from, but we do not know whether, considering how you have demeaned yourselves, you will be permitted to live there, or whether you have not already swallowed that land down your throats, as well as the land on this side. You may go either to Wyoming or Shamokin, and then we shall have you under our eye and can see how you behave. Don't deliberate, but go, and take this belt of wampum." He then forbade them ever again to interfere in any matters between white man and Indian, or ever, under any pretext, to pretend to sell lands; and as they (the Iroquois), he said, had some business of importance to transact with the Englishmen, he commanded them to immediately leave the council, like children and women, as they were.

Heckewelder, however, attempts to rescue the good name of the humbled Delawares by giving some of their explanations, intended to show that the epithet "women," as applied to them by the Iroquois, was originally a term of distinction rather than reproach, and "that the making women of the Delawares was not an act of compulsion, but the result of their own free will and consent." He gives the story, as it was narrated by the Delawares, substantially in this way: The Delawares were always too powerful for the Iroquois, so that the latter were at length convinced that if wars between them should continue, their own extirpation would become inevitable. They accordingly sent a message to the Delawares, representing that if continual wars were to be carried on between the nations, this would eventually work the ruin of the whole Indian race; that in order to prevent this it was necessary that one nation should lay down their arms and be called the woman, or mediator, with power to command the peace between the other nations who might be disposed to persist in hostilities against each other, and finally recommending that the part of the woman should be assumed by the Delawares, as the most powerful of all the nations.

The Delawares, upon receiving this message, and not perceiving the treacherous intentions of the Iroquois, consented to the proposition. The Iroquois then appointed a council and feast, and invited the Delawares to it, when, in pursuance of the authority given, they made a solemn speech, containing three capital points. The first was that the Delawares be (and they were) declared women, in the following words:

"We dress you in a woman's long habit, reaching down to your feet, and adorn you with ear-rings," meaning that they should no more take up arms. The second point was thus expressed: "We hang a calabash filled with oil and medicine upon your arm. With the oil you shall cleanse the ears of other nations, that they may attend to good and not to bad words; and with the medicine you shall heal those who are walking in foolish ways, that they may return to their senses and incline their hearts to peace." The third point, by which the Delawares were exhorted to make agriculture their future employment and means of subsistence, was thus worded: "We deliver into your hands a plant of Indian corn and a hoe." Each of these points was confirmed by delivering a belt of wampum, and these belts were carefully laid away, and their meaning frequently repeated.

"The Iroquois, on the contrary, assert that they conquered the Delawares, and that the latter were forced to adopt the defenseless state and appellation of a woman to avoid total ruin. Whether these different accounts be true or false, certain it is that the Delaware nation has ever since been looked to for the preservation of peace and intrusted with the charge of the great belt of peace and chain of friendship, which they must take care to preserve inviolate. According to the figurative explanation of the Indians, the middle of the chain of friendship is placed upon the shoulder of the Delawares, the rest of the Indian nations holding one end and the Europeans the other."^{*}

* Notes on the Indians, by David Zetsberger.

It is evident that the clumsy and transparent tale of the Delawares in reference to their investiture as women was implicitly believed by Heckewelder and other Indian missionaries, who apparently did not realize that which no reader can fail to perceive,—that if their championship and explanation were to have any influence at all on the world's estimate of their Indian friends, it could hardly be a favorable one, for it would only tend to show that they had suffered themselves to be most ridiculously imposed upon by the Iroquois, and that they were willing to acknowledge themselves a nation of imbeciles rather than admit a defeat which in itself brought no disgrace on them, and was no impeachment of their courage or warlike skill.

Gen. William Henry Harrison, afterwards President of the United States, in his "Notes on the Aborigines," said, in reference to the old missionary's account of the Delawares' humiliation,—

"But even if Mr. Heckewelder had succeeded in making his readers believe that the Delawares, when they submitted to the degradation proposed to them by their enemies, were influenced, not by fear, but by the benevolent desire to put a stop to the calamities of war, he has established for them the reputation of being the most egregious dupes and fools that the world has ever seen. This is not often the case with Indian sachems. They are rarely cowards, but still more rarely are they deficient in sagacity or discernment to detect any attempt to impose on them. I sincerely wish that I could unite with the worthy German in removing the stigma upon the Delawares."

It was not a lack of bravery or military enterprise on the part of the Delawares which caused their overthrow; it was a mightier agent than courage or energy: it was the gunpowder and lead of the Iroquois, which they had procured from the trading Dutch on the Hudson almost immediately after the discovery of that river, which had wrought the downfall of the Lenapè. For them the conflict was a hopeless one, waged against immeasurable odds,—resistance the irresistible. Under a reversal of conditions the Delawares must have been the victors and the Iroquois the vanquished, and no loss of honor could attach to a defeat under such circumstances. It is a pity that the tribes of the Lenapè should vainly have expended so much labor and ingenuity upon a tale which, for their own sake, had better never have been told, and in which even the sincere indorsement of Heckewelder and other missionaries has wholly failed to produce a general belief.

When the old Iroquois chief Connosatego, at the treaty council in Philadelphia, before referred to, commanded the Delawares instantly to leave the council-house, where their presence would no longer be tolerated, and to prepare to vacate their hunting-grounds on the Delaware and its tributaries, the outraged and insulted red men were completely crest-fallen and crushed, but they had no alternative and must obey. They at once left the presence of the Iroquois, returned to the homes which were now to be their homes no longer, and soon afterwards migrated to the country bordering the Susquehanna, and beyond that river. This forced exodus of the Delawares was chiefly from the Minisink, the section of the country now embraced in Sussex and Warren Counties.

There were traditions among the descendants of the Minisink people that the tribe from which that place derives its name made frequent expeditions down the river and came back with white men's scalps hanging at their belts. They stole down on the Pennsylvania side, and crossed over to this State a little below the Hopewell hills; then, returning on this side of the river, they would lie in ambush along the yet wild and rugged shores and pick off any unfortunate traveler who might be passing along the river-path. An old Indian sachem used to relate that the steep hills along the Delaware had been the scene of more than one ambush and murder.

It was only the Indians from the upper country, however, who committed these acts of violence and bloodshed. Those whose domain embraced what are now the counties of Hunterdon and Somerset were uniformly peaceable and friendly in their intercourse with the settlers, by whom they were treated with justice and consideration. Their numbers in this region steadily decreased as the years passed, but it was the natural decadence of their race, and not the steel of the white man, that swept them away. But a very small remnant of the tribe was left here at the opening of the Revolution, and of these a few served in the army under Washington. In a very few years after the close of the war they had entirely disappeared.

VIII.—FINAL DISPOSAL OF THE DELAWARES.

At the treaty of 1758 the entire remaining claim of the Delawares to lands in New Jersey was extinguished, except that there was reserved to them the right to fish in all the rivers and bays south of the Raritan, and to hunt on all uninclosed lands. A tract of three thousand acres of land was also purchased at Edge Pillock, in Burlington County, and on this the few remaining Delawares of New Jersey (about sixty in number) were collected and settled. They remained there until the year 1802, when they removed to New Stockbridge, near Oneida Lake, in the State of New York, where they joined their "grandsons," the Stockbridge tribe. Several years afterwards they again removed, and settled on a large tract of land on Fox River, Wis., which tract had been purchased for their use from the Menominee Indians. There, in conjunction with the Stockbridges, they engaged in agricultural pursuits, and formed a settlement which was named Statesburg. There, in the year 1832, there remained about forty of the Delawares, among whom was still kept alive the tradition that they were the owners of fishing and hunting privileges in New Jersey. They resolved to lay their claims before the Legislature of this State, and request that a moderate sum (two thousand dollars) might be paid them for its relinquishment. The person selected to act for them in presenting the matter before the Legislature was one of their own nation, whom they called Shawuskukhkung (meaning "wilted grass"), but who was known among the white people as Bartholomew S. Calvin. He was born in 1756, and was educated at Princeton College, at the expense of the Scotch missionary society. At the breaking out of the Revolution he left his studies to join the patriot army under Washington, and he served with credit during the Revolutionary struggle. At the time when his red countrymen placed this business in his hands he was seventy-six years of age, yet he proceeded in the matter with all the energy of youth, and laid before the Legislature a petition in his favor signed by a large number of respectable citizens of New Jersey, together with a memorial, written by his own hand, as follows:

"MY BRETHREN: I am old and weak and poor, and therefore a fit representative of my people. You are young and strong and rich, and therefore fit representatives of your people. But let me beg you for a moment to lay aside the recollections of your strength and of our weakness, that your minds may be prepared to examine with candor the subject of our claims.

"Our tradition informs us—and I believe it corresponds with your records—that the right of fishing in all the rivers and lays south of the Baritan, and of hunting in all uninclosed lands, was never relinquished, but, on the contrary, was expressly reserved in our last treaty, held at Crosswicks, in 1758. Having myself been one of the parties to the sale, —I believe, in 1801,—I know that these rights were not sold or parted with.

"We now offer to sell these privileges to the State of New Jersey. They were once of great value to us, and we apprehend that neither time nor distance nor the non-use of our rights has at all affected them, but that the courts here would consider our claims valid were we to exercise them ourselves or delegate them to others. It is not, however, our wish thus to excite litigation. We consider the State Legislature the proper purchaser, and throw ourselves upon its benevolence and magnanimity, trusting that feelings of justice and liberality will induce you to give us what you deem a compensation. And, as we have ever looked up to the leading character of the United States (and to the leading characters of this State in particular) as our fathers, protectors, and friends, we now look up to you as such, and humbly beg that you will look upon us with that eye of pity, as we have reason to think our poor untutored forefathers looked upon yours when they first arrived upon our then extensive but uncultivated dominions, and sold them their lands, in many instances for trifles, in comparison, as 'light as air.'

"From your humble petitioner,

"BARTHOLOMEW S. CALVIN,

"In behalf of himself and his red brethren."

In the Legislature the subject was referred to a committee, which, after patient hearing, reported favorably; whereupon the Legislature granted to the Delawares the sum of two thousand dollars,—the full amount asked for, in consideration of this relinquishment of their last rights and claims in the State of New Jersey. Upon this result Mr. Calvin addressed to the Legislature a letter of thanks, which was read before the two houses in joint session, and was received with repeated rounds of most enthusiastic applause.

IX.—LOCAL INDIAN NAMES.

We add to this chapter a few Delaware Indian names of localities in Sussex and Warren Counties, with their explanations, which will be of assistance to the reader.

In the Indian deed made by Kowyockhickon and other chiefs to William Penn, dated July 15, 1682, the name given to the Delaware River was Mackerishickon. In another location and survey it was called Zunikoway. The Delaware Indians called it Lenapè-whittuck,—i.e., "the river of the Lenapè." It was also called Kit-hanne (in Minsi Delaware, Gicht-hanne), signifying "the main stream in its region of country." The Dutch, who were the first Europeans to sail up the Delaware, named it, in contradistinction from the North (now Hudson) River, Zuydt or South River, and later the Fishkill. In a single instance (affidavit of Johannes Decker, in 1785) the Indian name of the Delaware is given as Lanasepose, signifying "fishkill." The river takes its present name from Lord de la Ware, Governor of Virginia, who passed the Capes and sailed into Delaware Bay in 1610.

The Paulinskill was called, in the Indian language, Tockhockonetkong. Its present name is said to have been derived from Pauline, the daughter of a Hessian soldier who was taken prisoner by Washington at the battle of Trenton, and who, after the close of the Revolutionary war, continued to reside in the neighborhood of Stillwater. Several surveys were located on this stream as early as 1716, and in one of the ancient returns an Indian town is spoken of called Tokhok-nok, near the head of the stream. From the large quantities of beads, arrow-heads, flints, etc., found where the Newton brickyard now stands it is quite evident that an Indian village was once located there. It is also at the head of the West Branch of the Paulinskill. On Germany Flats, nearer to the East Branch, there still remain the traces of an Indian burying-ground. It may be that the ancient village of Tokhok-nok was located within the present limits of the town of Newton.

The Indian name of the Pequest was Pophannunk, afterwards corrupted to Poquessing, and still later to its present name. William Penn and Col. John Alford located two large surveys of twelve hundred and fifty acres each at the mouth of the Pophannunk River, and below the noted hill Penungachung. These tracts comprised Belvidere and the surrounding country, the surveys being made by John Reading, deputy surveyor, Oct. 8 and 9, 1716. William Penn's heirs, Richard, Thomas, and William, sold the land to Robert Patterson in 1759, and on the Pequest he built the saw-mill then called Patterson's Mills. Penungachung is the Manunka Chunk of the present day. So anxious was the elder Martin Ryerson to preserve the correct orthography and pronunciation of the word that he wrote it out and underscored it in one of his ancient returns to the surveyor-general's office as Pe-Nun-gau-chung.

"Musconetcong" is corrupted from the Indian name Maskhanneung, which signifies "a rapid stream."

According to an old survey, in 1716, there stood on the Musconetcong an Indian village called Woponichosongong.

The name "Blue Mountain" first occurs in the land records in 1773. The original Indian name was Pahaqualong, from which Pahaquarry is a corruption. An Indian village and burying-ground located on the farm owned by the late Judge Andrew Ribble bore the original name. It has since been called the Kitatinny Mountain, Minisink Mountain, Blue Ridge, etc. In the report of the commissioners to divide Sussex County into precincts, dated April 17, 1754, it is called "Packoquarry Mountain," and in a couple of old documents written in 1755 it is called "The Great Mountain."

According to Heckewelder, who is good authority, "Walpack" is a corruption from Wahlpeek, which in the Indian language signified a turn-hole or whirlpool in the water. It is compounded of the two Indian words, waa-lac, "a hole," and tup-peek, "a pool." The name "turn-hole"—a provincialism now obsolete—was used to designate a sudden bend of a stream by which the water when deep was turned upon itself into an eddy or whirlpool. The turn-hole in the Lehigh, above Mauch Chunk, was many years ago an object of interest to travelers in that wild region. Howell's map of 1792 indicates the exact spot. There is a "turn-hole" in the bend of the Delaware at the mouth of the Flat Brook, from which Walpack doubtless took its name. It is visible in low water, and during great floods it becomes a powerful whirlpool, sucking in large pieces of timber and carrying them out of sight.

Heckewelder also says that Wantage is a corruption of the Indian word Wandachqui, signifying "that way."

Allamuchy is the site of an Indian village called Mamnachokken. John Lawrence, who surveyed the East and West Jersey line in 1737, makes mention of this place in his field-notes.

Emhowlack was the name of an Indian village on the Pequest, just below the new Pequest furnace.

CHAPTER IV.

FIRST SETTLEMENT IN SUSSEX AND WARREN.

1.—PIONEERS FROM ULSTER COUNTY.

The first settlement in Sussex County, including the present county of Warren, was made in the upper valley of the Delaware, and was part of a general movement westward from the Dutch settlements at Esopus, New Paltz, and Kingston, on the Hudson River. The settlers were of the same Huguenot and Holland stock,—the former born in France, from which they had been driven by persecution but a few years before, while the latter, if not themselves natives of Holland, were the immediate descendants of those born in that country, which then offered an asylum for the persecuted and oppressed of all nations, and whose struggles in behalf of civil and religious liberty were so memorable.

The first settlers came here directly from Ulster Co., N. Y., the tide of immigration setting up the Mamacating valley and thence to the Delaware, down which it flowed until it was met by another current ascending from Philadelphia. The two currents of population which thus met and mingled in the ancient valley of the Minisink and spread along the borders of these counties from the Neversink to the Musconetcong were of divers nationalities, yet all uniting in one common characteristic,—a native love of liberty and a desire to find freedom from the civil and ecclesiastical restraints which had hampered and burdened them in the Old World. Those coming in from the north, we have said, were Huguenots and Hollanders,—the most renowned Protestants and dissenters of continental Europe; those reaching our territory from the south were Welsh, Quakers, Germans, and Scotch-Irish, with a considerable intermixture of the Puritans of New England, all noted for their struggles for civil and religious liberty in the several European countries whence they came. These formed the basis of the early population not merely of Sussex and Warren Counties, but of the upper Delaware valley generally, including the river settlements in the three States of New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania.

The precise period at which the Dutch and Huguenot settlers entered the Minisink valley is uncertain. We find the following in Mr. Edsall's "Centennial Address." Speaking of the "Old Mine Road," which he thinks was constructed and used by a company of miners from Holland as early as 1650, and abandoned as a mining-road upon the accession of the English rule, in 1664, he says,—

"The main body of these men are believed to have returned to their native land, yet a few undoubtedly remained and settled in the vicinity of their abandoned mines. In this county we class the Dupes, Ryersons, and probably the Westbrooks and Schoonmakers, as among the descendants of those ancient immigrants. . . . Here, then, we have the point at which the first settlement in Sussex County was made clearly established. Here log cabins were built and orchards planted when the site of Philadelphia was a wilderness. The Swedes in West Jersey and the Dutch and Norwegian settlers in Bergen antedate the pioneers of Pahaquarry but a very few years. The light of civilization had shone but for a brief period upon the eastern and southwestern borders of New Jersey ere it penetrated our northern wilds. Feeble at first, it grew brighter as time advanced. News of the fertility of the Delaware flats was doubtless carried to Esopus, whence it was taken to Communipaw, to the island of Manhattan, and even into Bushwick and the vales of Mespat. Esopus was a favorite place of resort from 1660 to 1685, because of the great strength and richness of its soil; but immigrants who came in there from around the bays and inlets of New York, Bergen, and Long Island, and who found the best locations occupied, turned their thoughts to these bottom-lands on the Delaware, whereof many-tongued rumor had frequently spoken, and, led by necessity and curiosity, they followed the Mamakating until at last the blue outlines of the Pahaqualin Mountains greeted their vision, and the cabins of three or four hermit-like settlers were found reposing beneath their shadow. Here they met a hospitable welcome and here they made their locations, enlarging by their ingress the social circle and affording strength to the infant colony."

This fine and beautifully rhetorical passage, we are constrained to believe, is slightly in error as to its historical accuracy. The date assigned for the "three or four hermit-like settlers" and the "infant colony" is undoubtedly too early by a considerable period. Certainly, none of the Huguenot names could have been among those mentioned as having been in the valley prior to 1664, or for more than twenty years subsequent to that date; for the decree revoking the Edict of Nantes, which sent them to this country, was not passed till 1685.

We notice that some other writers, probably relying for authority on the traditions of Scull and Lukens, who passed through the Minisink on a surveying tour in 1730, have taken a similar view as the writer above quoted, and have even given to the early Minisink settlement a greater antiquity. Thus M. R. Hulce, in a letter to L. W. Brodhead, Esq., says, "This valley was settled by the Dutch about one hundred years before Penn founded Philadelphia." This is quite too great a stretch of the imagination to entitle the author to any credit as a historian; yet it is published in a work claiming to give information to the public.* Brodhead, in his "History of the Minisink," says, "It is difficult to determine the exact date of the first European settlement in the upper valley of the Delaware. That there were white people here at an early period, and even before the arrival of William Penn at Philadelphia, seems now to be generally admitted; but it must be confessed that concerning those who inhabited the Minisink previous to 1725 we have little knowledge. It is quite certain that the first tide of immigration into this valley flowed from the direction of the Hudson, and so down the valleys of the Mamakating and Neversink, and, entering the Minisink at the Delaware, flowed throughout its borders."

The best authorities in Ulster and Orange Counties make the prior settlements in and about Port Jervis to have begun about 1690. Jacob Cnudebee and Peter Guimar† were the first settlers. The location of their settlement was known as the "Upper Neighborhood," being in the valley of the Neversink, at Peenpack, now known as Port Clinton, on the Delaware and Hudson Canal. Dr. Mills, in his "Historical Address," says, "A few years after the settlement at Guimar's—probably about 1715—a number of families came into what was subsequently called the 'Lower Neighborhood,' and located on either side of the Neversink, from what is now named Huguenot south to Port Jervis. These families came from Ulster County, and were all Hollanders or of Holland descent, as indicated by their names,—Cortright, Van Auken, Westbrook, Decker, Kuykendal, Westfall, Cole, and Davis."

We find the same names in the records, and many others of Hollandish extraction, extending from the settlements named above all along the New Jersey side of the Delaware to the Water Gap. The settlements from Port Jervis southward were undoubtedly made about the same time as those above, or very soon after, as the rich Minisink flats opened a most inviting prospect to immigrants, especially to Hollanders, which could not, in the nature of things, have remained long unoccupied. In 1730 the surveyor-general, Scull, and his deputy, John Lukens, speak of the valley as being quite thickly settled on both sides of the river from the Water Gap north for a distance of thirty or forty miles, and of their admiration being excited by a "grove of apple-trees far exceeding in size any near Philadelphia." This would indicate that the settlement must have been made at an earlier date than 1725, as given by one author, or than 1715, as given by others. Fifteen years would hardly be sufficient to grow such apple-trees as the witnesses describe, even in the rich soil of the Minisink. Smith, in his "History of New Jersey," tells us that in 1756 the settlements were more numerous on the Jersey than on the Pennsylvania side of the river, and they were probably so from the beginning, and made at an earlier date.

We are of the opinion that both classes of writers have erred,—the one in giving too great an antiquity to the Minisink settlement, and the other in making it of too recent origin. We shall probably find that the truth lies between the two extremes. We have positive documentary evidence that there was a considerable colony of settlers at the Neversink and in the Minisink valley, including both of the Minisink Islands, prior to the beginning of the eighteenth century. A voting precinct, with a municipal organization, was laid off there before this date, which implies a considerable number of voters; and by an act of the Provincial Assembly of New York, passed Oct. 18, 1701, "for the more Regular proceedings in the Election of Representatives," the "inhabitants of Wugachemick (Neversink) and Great and Little Minisink (Islands)" were "empowered to give their votes in the County of Ulster." Thus the people of Sussex voted in Ulster Co., N. Y., not only at that time, but continued to vote there for eight years subsequently, until, by the passage of an act by the same provincial authority, Nov. 12, 1709, their votes were restored to Orange County.*

This evidence clearly substantiates the fact that there were many settlers in the Jersey Minisink previous to 1700. And with this agree the researches of B. A. Westbrook, Esq., of Montague. We quote from an article entitled "Old Minisink," published in the New Jersey Herald of June 25, 1879, wherein Mr. Westbrook says,—

"Just prior to the year 1700 many of the Low Dutch farmers from Ulster Co., N. Y., together with fugitives from the states of Europe, principally from France, commenced the establishment of a chain of kindred settlements along the Machockemack (Never-sink) and Delaware Rivers, extending from Ulster County on the north to the Delaware Water Gap at the south, and covering a stretch of territory about fifty miles in length, and of variable width.

"The old 'mine road,' extending from Æsopus (Kingston) on the Hudson to the Water Gap on the Delaware, constructed previously to facilitate mining operations at the latter point, had been abandoned as part of an unprofitable venture. This road, though a failure as to its original purpose, yet proved to be of great advantage to the pioneers in settling our valley, by furnishing them with convenient access to their future homes in the wilderness, and for the first hundred years of the history of the settlements referred to, as a common thoroughfare, it was instrumental in continuing a close relationship with and attachment for the parent settlements upon the Hudson River."

II.—THE OLD DUTCH RECORDS.

The records of the old Reformed Dutch Churches of the Minisink valley furnish us with the names of many of the pioneers who settled this region. They are the oldest and most valuable records of the valley extant; and the descendants of those who first settled that portion of Old Sussex, as well as every earnest searcher after historic data, have cause to be thankful for the learning and piety which made these old records and caused them to be preserved in the heart of a wilderness country. Let it be observed that these records, although beginning with the baptisms of children in 1716, do not reach back to the beginning of the settlements, but only to the period when they had acquired sufficient numbers and strength to begin to look after the religious interests of the community, and to employ ministers to visit them occasionally from the older settlements. Rev. Petrus Vas and Rev. Georg Wilhelm Mancius, of Kingston, first visited and administered the ordinances to them, from 1716 for about twenty-five years. A brief outline of these churches, preparatory to some extracts which we propose to make from the records, will here be given.

* See Prefect of Minisink, in another part of this work.

In 1737 four churches of the Dutch Reformed faith were formed in the Minisink valley, two of which were in what is now Sussex County, in ancient Walpack, the third at Port Jervis, and the fourth at Lower Smithfield, on the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware. The congregations connected with these churches extended from the Neversink, some eight miles above Port Jervis, to the Delaware Water Gap,—a distance of about fifty miles, including portions of New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania.

From 1741 to 1756 all these churches were under the pastorate of the Rev. Johannes Casparus Fryenmoet, a young man who was sent to Holland at the age of sixteen to finish his education, receive ordination by the Classis of Amsterdam, and return as their pastor. He was a native of Switzerland, and had been partially educated before coming to this country. By an agreement with the people of the several congregations, he was furnished with the means to return to Holland and prepare himself for the ministry, which he did; and, being ordained, he returned and on June 1, 1741, became the first regular pastor of the four churches, each congregation agreeing upon his services for one-fourth of the time. The parsonage, subsequently built, was at Nomanock, near the old fort, in what is now Sandyston, Sussex Co., where the ruins of the old cellar still remain. It appears from the records that this young man was married soon after his return from Holland by Abraham Van Campen, Esq., and that he steadily continued in the relation of pastor till 1756, and irregularly after that till the fall of 1759. During most of this period he kept the records of the churches, the Consistories, the baptisms, and the marriages in a peculiarly neat and finished handwriting. A few years ago they were translated from the original Dutch by the Rev. J. B. Ten Eyck, late pastor of the Reformed Church of Berea, and in 1877 were published in a neat and conveniently-arranged pamphlet by Wm. H. Nearpass, Esq., of Port Jervis. We give from these records the names of many of the primitive settlers of the Minisink valley, a considerable part of whose descendants are among the worthy and influential citizens of Sussex and Warren Counties at the present day. They were mostly justices of the peace, holding the king's commissions, and members of the Consistories of the several churches, and of the Joint Consistory which usually held its meetings in the old parsonage at Nomanock. The names are given as they appear in the original Dutch, but most of them have since undergone changes conforming them to the English method of orthography.

NAMES OF EARLY SETTLERS OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

1741.—Jan Kortrecht, Jan van Vliedt, Abraham van Campen, William Cool, Johannel Westbroeck, Hendrick Kortrecht, Peter Kuikendal, Derrick Westbroeck, Jacobus Swartwood, William Kortrecht, Solomon Davids.

1745.—Jacob Westfael, Jan van Campen, Johannes Brinck, Johannes Decker, Cornelius Westbroeck, Jan van Eiten, Abram Bevier, Dirk Ten Broeck, Samuel Bevier, Cornelius Louw.

1746-48.—Nicholas Dupui, Lambert Brinck, Samuel Schamers, Abram Kermers, Moses Dupui, Andrius Dingenman, Ja. Swartwoudt.

1750.—Benjamin Shoemaker, William Eunes, Gerit Brinck.

1761.—Arie Verdenburg, Hendrick Hoover, Nicholas Brinck.

1764.—Abram Middag, Thomas Schoonhoven, Daniel Rosenkrans.

1765.—Abram Kittle, Isaac van Campen, Adam Dingman, Jacob Dewitt, Philip Wintermoet, Johannes Dewitt, Harmanus Nimwegen, Abram C. Aaken, David Cool.

1785.—Jacob R. Dewitt, Helmas Cole, Jacob Dewitt Gumaer, Elias V. Bauschooten, Thomas Kyte, Geysbert Sutfin, Benjamin Fisher, Abraham Dutcher.

MARRIAGES.

We give below a few of the marriages taken from the record, covering the few years from 1738 to 1797. The dates are given from the first publication of banns:

* 1738, March 6.—Johannes Westbroeck, Jr., young man, born at Nystfield, to Magdalena Westbroeck, young woman, born at Horly, and both dwelling at Menissinck; married by Anthony Westbroeck, justice of the peace, the last day of March.

* 1738, March 26.—Jan van Nitten, young man, born at Nystfield, to Marijke Westfael, young woman, born at Menissinck, and both living there; married by Anthony Westbroeck, justice of the peace, April 13.

* 1742.—Joh. Casparus Fryenmuth, young man, born in Switzerland, to Lena van Eten, young woman, born at Nystfield; married with a license from Governor Morris, in New Jersey, by Justice Abram van Campen, the 23d July, 1742.

* 1742, July 25.—Jacobus Quick, young man, born at Rochester, dwelling in Smithfield, in Bucks County, to Maria Westbroeck, young woman, born at Rochester, dwelling at Menissinck; married the 23d of August by me.

* 1741, July 19.—Abram Miblagh, young man, born at Menissinck, to Lena van Anken, young woman, born at Rochester, both dwelling here; married August 18, by me, J. C. Fryenmuth.

* 1743, March 13.—Simon Westfael, young man, born in Dutchess County, dwelling in Smithfield, Bucks County, to Jannetje Westbroeck, born at Normal, dwelling at Menissinck; married the 15th of April by Peter Kuykendal, justice of the peace.

* 1743, August 21.—Johannes Bogardt, born in Dutchess County, to Sarah Longtelling, young woman, born at Rochester, both dwelling at Menissinck; married the 9th of November, ditto, by Abraham van Anken, justice of the peace.

* 1745, May 12.—S. Iohn Decker, young man, born on the Cuet-baen [Kutsham], to Lena Quick, young woman, born at Metshepekonck, and both dwelling at Metshepekonck; married by J. C. Fryenmuth, June 8th.

* 1745, July 21.—Johannus Kortrecht, young man, to Catharina Kortrecht, young woman, both born at Rochester, and both living in Bucks County, Pennsylvania; married August 27, by J. C. Fryenmuth.

* 1746, February 19.—Benjamin Thomson, young man, born in New England, to Elizabeth Westfael, young woman, born at Machackemeck, and both dwelling there; married February 9th by me, J. C. Fryenmuth.

* 1747, September 13.—Jacob van Campen, young man, born at Nepeack, to Rachel Decker, young woman, born at Niskolock, both living in Bucks County; married the 9th of October by me, J. C. Fryenmuth,* Mach.

* At this date the spelling of the name changes, and so remains ever after.

* 1748, March 29.—Daniel Westfael, young man, born at Machackemeck, to Maria Westbroeck, young woman, born at Gil-ford, and both dwelling at Menissinck; married the 8th of April, ditto, by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, Mach.

* 1748, December 11.—Benjamin Westbroeck Vorony, young man, born at Wawarsinck, and dwelling at Nomenack, to Lydia Westfael, young woman, born at Machackemeck, and dwelling there; married the 8th of January, 1749, by me, J. C. Fryenmuth.

* 1749, January 8.—Joseph Westbroeck, young man, born at Wawarsinck, and dwelling at Nomenack, to Elizabeth Kuykendal, young woman, born at Machackemeck, and dwelling there; married the 27th of January by me, J. C. Fryenmuth.

* 1750, January 7.—Isaac Miblagh, young man, born at Menissinck, and dwelling at Teeshacht, to Femtje Decker, young woman, also born at Menissinck, and dwelling at Shippekock; married the 6th of February by me, J. C. Fryenmuth.

* 1750, July 8.—Anthony van Eiten, young man, born at Nepeack, and dwelling at Nomenack, to Annetje Decker, young woman, born at Machackemeck, and dwelling there; married the 3d of August by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 29.

* 1751, April 11.—Jan Kerner, young man, born at Kingston, and dwelling among [near] Walpeck, to Elizabeth van Campen, young woman, born in Upper Smithfield, and dwelling there; married the 15th of May by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 30.

* 1752, February 9.—Abraham Westbroeck, young man, born at Wawarsinck, and dwelling at Nomenack, to Blandina Rosenkrauz, young woman, born at Shippekock, and dwelling Machackemeck; married the 6th of March by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 31.

* 1752, December 17.—Petres Kuykendal, young man, born at Machackemeck, and dwelling there, to Catharina Kittle, young woman, born at Wawarsinck, and dwelling at Menissinck; married the 12th of January, 1753, by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 32.

* 1752, December 31.—Jacobus Gussales, young man, born at Mammekutting, and dwelling there, to Sarah Westbroeck, young woman, born at Nomenack, and dwelling there; married the 28th of January, 1753, by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 32.

* 1753, July 22.—James Rish, young man, born in N. Jersey, to Catharina Hoochteling, born at Rochester, and both dwelling at Menissinck; married the 20th of August by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 32.

* 1753, November 11.—Daniel van Aken, young man, born at Machackemeck, and dwelling there, to Lea Kittle, young woman, born at Wawarsinck, and dwelling at Menissinck; married the 13th of December by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 33.

* 1753, December 2.—Jeremias Kittle, young man, born at Horly, to Lea Davis, young woman, born at Menissinck, and both dwelling there; married the 4th of January, 1754, by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 33.

* 1754, February 17.—Thomas Wells, young man, born in Philadelphia, and dwelling at Menissinck, to Elizabeth Dewitt, young woman, born at Rochester, and dwelling in Upper Smithfield; married the 14th of March by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 33.

* 1754, August 4.—Abram Kittle, young man, born Wawarsinck, to Christina Westfael, young woman, born at Menissinck, and both dwelling there; married the 30th of ditto by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 34.

* 1755, January 26.—Alexander Ivory, widower of Myrta Cole, to Jenneke Decker, born at Menissinck, and both dwelling at Walpeck; married the 21st of February, by me, J. C. Fryenmuth, at 34.*

† To aid the reader in understanding some of the places referred to in the above records, the following is appended:

Menissinck (now spelled Menisk), the town or village of that name where Montagu is now situated; the church was also called Menissinck church. A number of the parties married were born here, and a larger number were residents of the place.

Nomenack (now spelled Nomonack), an island in the Delaware; also the old fort built on the main land, opposite the Island, during the French war, where stood the old parsonage of Dominic Fryenmuth and some of his successors. Some of the parties married lived here or on the Island.

Machackemeck, the Indian name of the Neversink branch of the Delaware, where one of the old churches was situated; now Port Jervis.

CHAPTER V.

I.—THE MINISINK COUNTRY.

THE Minisink country, originally so called, comprised a portion of what are now the three States of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and included the soil on both sides of the Delaware River from the Water Gap to the Lackawaxen. According to Heckewelder, who is regarded as excellent authority on Delaware Indian names, the term "Minisink" signifies "the place or home of the Minsies." It is probable, however, that the name was first given to the valley or locality where these Indians settled, and that they were subsequently called Minsies because they lived there. We find the following in Eager's "History of Orange County," pages 407 and 408:

"The tradition of the Indians in this vicinity at the early settlement of the country was that their nation lived at Kittatinny (now Blue Mountains), in Warren Co., N. J., which means 'chief town;' that at an early period there was a difficulty or disagreement of some kind in the nation, and the discontented portion removed to the other or north side of the mountain, upon the lowlands along the Delaware. The tradition also was that long ago, and before the Delaware River broke through the mountain at the Water Gap, these lands, for thirty or forty miles along it, were covered by a lake, but became drained by the breaking down of that part of the dam which confined it. When the discontented retired from the nation they settled upon the lands from which the water had retired, and by the others were called 'Minsies' because they lived upon the land from which the water had gone. The name in the first instance was descriptive of the land from which 'the water is gone,' and afterwards was applied to the Indians who lived upon it."

If this be true,—and there can be little doubt of its correctness,—Heckewelder gave only the secondary meaning of the word,—that is, the meaning given to it by the Indians of his time,—without going back to search for its derivative signification in the events and circumstances which first led to its use. Scull and Lukens, the early surveyors, were both conversant with the language of the Lenni Lenapè, and they give the meaning of "Minisink" as "the water is gone." The editor of Heckewelder's manuscripts says, "The upper valley of the Delaware was pre-eminently the home of the Minsies (the historic Minisink), where they built their towns, planted their corn, and kindled their council-fires, and whence they set out on the hunt or the war-path. The Minsies, Miniseys, or Muncys were the most warlike of their people, and proverbially impatient of the white man's presence in the Indian country," yet the early settlers of the valley managed to live on peaceable terms with them till the war broke out, in 1755. The only exception we know of was the murder of Wright, at Snaketown, Pa., in September, 1727. This was done, we are told, by the Minsies, who were the subjects of Kindassowa, the chief who "resided at the Forks of the Susquehanna."

The settlers appear to have purchased their lands of the Indians and to have insured the safety and quiet of the settlements by fair and equitable dealing and by according to their red neighbors the privileges of hunting and fishing, which were so essential to their existence. The titles, however, obtained of the Indians were never recognized as valid by any of the colonial governments unless afterwards confirmed by grants from the proprietors or from the provinces or States in which they were located, the principle everywhere involved being the right of the State or province, not of individuals or private corporations, to the treaty-making or land-purchasing power as respects the aborigines, who were held by all the European nations having claims in America as having only a possessory right, and no real title in fee simple, to the soil. Hence they could make no valid conveyance of the soil, no matter if their ancestors had fished and hunted and buried the generations of the past upon it from time immemorial. Neither their long possession, their dearest associations, nor the sacred ashes of their fathers were any guarantee against the arbitrary and assumed right of civilized nations to deal with them as troublesome occupants only, to be got rid of on the easiest terms practicable. Hence the whole matter of the extinguishment of Indian claims, so called, has proceeded upon the assumption that discovery or conquest gave right to the soil, and that the native inhabitants were to be treated as wards or subjects, having no rights which the white man was bound to respect further than his interest or his cupidity might dictate. The instances in which justice and humanity have ruled in these negotiations have been the exceptions, not the rule. It has never been sufficiently considered, in dealing with the aborigines of this country, how strongly they were attached to their old hunting-grounds, burial-places, and the scenes of their altars and council-fires. Reverence for the graves of their fathers and worship of ancestry were parts of their religion. Hence it was peculiarly hard for them to be driven away from their possessions, and it is not to be wondered at that they frequently shed the blood of those whom they regarded as intruders upon their soil.

"Minisink was the favorite home and the delight of the native red man, the river 'Fish Kill' abounding in its wealth of fish; within its shallow water they became an easy prey to his rude traps and methods of capture, and upon the Minisink flats, lying between Minisink and Namenock Island on the south, he was wont to cultivate his patches, and thus produce the material for his 'succotash' and other favorite dishes. Just opposite, upon the Pennsylvania side of the river, on a flat elevated table-land called by the first Dutch settlers 'Pow-wow Hill,' almost within the shadow of the falls of the Raymond's Kill and overlooking his cherished possessions, he buried his dead and met kindred braves in council from time immemorial.

"From the easy fords of the Minisink, Indian trails diverged,—west, beyond 'Pocono,' to the Wyoming Valley, along the Susquehanna River; north, by a cut across the peninsula of Pike County to the mouth of the Lackawaxon, on the Delaware; south, through Culver's Gap to the ponds and hunting-grounds of Great Kittatinny Valley, beyond the Shawangunk; and northeast, by way of the Delaware River, to Machackemack and corresponding valleys. Thus surrounded with all the facilities essential to savage comfort, with game and fish near at hand and in overflowing abundance, and intercourse with neighboring and friendly tribes, it is no wonder that the first settlers who located in the valley esteemed it almost a perfect paradise for the savage Indian. Thus did the first white settlers find the natives of this valley, and of them they obtained the peaceable possession of its lands by satisfactory purchase; otherwise, their titles were a subject of dispute through the claim of the proprietors of East Jersey upon the one side, and through the imposition of the holders of the alleged 'Minisink patent' upon the other. The uncertainty as to the title only terminated with the action of the boundary commission, which established the present State line in 1772.*

II.—MINISINK SETTLEMENT.

The settlement in Montague township first known by this name was located opposite the lower end of Great Minisink Island, "upon the higher portion of the Minisink flats, and just at the foot of the limestone ridge on the south running parallel with the river and overlooking the surrounding country. This settlement took the name of 'Minisink.' A small grist-mill was erected upon the stream, which here discharges its waters into the Bena Kill, between the residences of Daniel D. Everitt and Jacob Westbrook, Esq., the former residence being within the township of Montague and the latter in that of Sandyston, as this stream here forms the boundary-line between the townships for a short distance from the river. Johannes Westbrook settled upon one side of this stream of water, and (Simon?) Westfall (said to have been his son-in-law†) upon the opposite bank, where Mr. Everitt now resides. Others settled above, and still others below, the first settlers all placing their dwellings near the old Esopus or mine-road. The place until a generation or two back had its country store, tavern, and blacksmith-shop, and when the old Machackemack church was erected to take the place of the one destroyed by Brant, at the present village of Port Jervis, near Mr. Eli Van Inwegen's residence, the contractor was obliged to come here to have manufactured the nails and fastenings necessary in its construction, the present site of that town at the time being owned and occupied by two or three small farmers.

"In 1731, Johannes Westbrook, of Minisink, deeded to Anthony Westbrook, Col. Abraham Van Campen, Gerrit Van Campen, John Cortright, Jacob Koykendal, and Jacob Van Etten a tract of land lying below and near his residence for a burying-ground and for a school-house, for the use of all the inhabitants of Minisink."‡ "In 1737 the principal men along the Machackemack (Neversink), from Walpack and from the lower end of the valley to the Water Gap, met Dominic Mancius, of Kingston, accompanied by his protégé, young Fryenmoet, with the principal men of Minisink, and together at the latter place they planned and laid the foundations of the four Low Dutch churches of the Delaware and Neversink valleys. . . . The parsonage first used by the Rev. Johannes Casparus Fryenmoet, and last by the Rev. Cornelius C. Elting before his purchase of a farm at Carpenter's Point, occupied a fine elevated plat of ground within a stone's throw of Nomaock fort, and directly above the old road, overlooking the beautiful island of that name; which circumstance accounts for several of his church papers being dated 'Nomaock.' The parsonage was taken from the farm of Cornelius Westbrook, who was sexton and supervisor, by appointment of the churches, over the parsonage and church of Minisink, near by."§

III.—MINISINK PRECINCT.

The first municipal organization within the territory of Sussex and Warren Counties was the "Precinct of Minisink," claimed as a part of Orange Co., N. Y., and erected by the General Assembly of that province. It extended along the Delaware River from Carpenter's Point to the lower end of Great Minisink Island, and into the country eastward till it joined the precinct of Goshen, having its assessor, clerk, justice of the peace, and other local officers. The original tax-warrant, levying the proportion of tax assessed upon the inhabitants of this ancient precinct under the provincial authority of New York, to be used in building the first jail at Goshen, is still extant and in the possession of Benjamin Van Fleet, of Deerpark, N. Y. The warrant is issued under the seals of the justices of the peace of the several precincts of Orange County, including among the number Anthony Westbrook, of Minisink.

We give below the tax-roll, furnished by Mr. Benjamin Van Fleet, and published in the Port Jervis ‡ Deed in possession of Mr. John S. Jagger, of Sandyston.

§ Article by B. A. Westbrook, Esq., of Montague.

Gazette. This tax-roll evidently accompanies the warrant referred to above, and is especially valuable as showing the names of all the inhabitants of the territory embraced in the precinct of Minisink in 1739, as well as the valuation of property. Among these names will be recognized the ancestors of many of the families in the valleys of the Neversink and Delaware. The document is well worthy of publication and preservation. Below are the names and also the valuation and tax in pounds, shillings, pence, and farthings:

Which, rendered in English, reads:

"September 8, 1739, then received of Johannis Decker £1 4 7 residuo of the tax, by me.

"SOLOMON DAVIS."

"Anthony Westbrook, of Minisink Precinct, County of Orange and Province of New York," lived in what is now Montague, Sussex Co., N. J., just opposite Milford, in Pennsylvania, and, together with Peter Lambertus Brinck, owned the Jersey flats adjoining, and a large tract of land extending from the flats towards the mountains. Here he lived and died, and was buried in the Minisink burying-ground. According to the returns indorsed upon the said warrant, the inhabitants of New Jersey residing upon the Delaware in the present county of Sussex contributed towards the erection of the original jail at Goshen the sum of twenty-nine pounds New York currency. The return is dated June 30, 1739."

IV.—SETTLEMENTS IN OTHER PARTS OF SUSSEX AND WARREN.

Our purpose is to give under this head a brief summary of the first settlements in Sussex and Warren Counties outside of the Minisink valley.

While the latter portion of our territory was being peopled, as we have described, immigrants were coming in to the southward from quite a different direction. Lands were patented and settled near Phillipsburg by Messrs. Lane and Morrill, from Ireland, about the beginning of the eighteenth century. In 1735 three brothers named Green settled in that part of old Greenwich now known as Oxford township. They were soon followed by the McKees, McMurtrys, McCrackens, Axforde, Robersons, Shippins, Andersons, Kennedys, Stewarts, Loders, Hulls, Brands, Bowlbys, Swayzcs, Scotts, Shackletons, and Armstrongs, all of whom were Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, with the exception of Robeson, the Greens, and possibly one or two others. Here, as a consequence of this unanimity of religious faith and nationality, the first Presbyterian church in the two counties was erected, in 1744, following the old Dutch Reformed churches of the Minisink within a very few years of their date. It may be mentioned in this general chapter that the first pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Greenwich was Rev. James Campbell, and that he was followed by David Brainerd, the celebrated missionary to the Indians, whose labors called him frequently into the vicinity. He lived for some time at the "Irish settlement" in Pennsylvania, now known as Lower Mount Bethel, about five miles from Belvidere, where the site of his ancient cabin is still pointed out to the curious traveler. In speaking of Brainerd it may be well to notice a singular mistake made by Rev. Peter Kanouse in his "Historical Sermon." He speaks of the Neversink "emptying into the Delaware and constituting what in D. Brainerd ard's time was called 'The Forks of the Delaware,' and where was the field of his labors in an Indian settlement named Shakhawotung, now known as Carpenter's Point." It is well known that "the Forks of the Delaware," where Brainerd had his chief mission, was at Easton, the forks being formed by the Delaware and the Lehigh, which form a confluence at that point. "Shakhawotung," the name of the Indian town, signifies "where a smaller stream empties into a larger one, or the outlet," shakunk being the general Delaware word for "the mouth of a river."⁸

"The first furnace for the manufacture of iron in Sussex County was erected by Jonathan Robeson, in the then township of Greenwich. It was commenced in 1741, but iron was not run till March 9, 1743. He called this 'Oxford Furnace,' in compliment to Andrew Robeson, his father, who had been sent to England and educated in Oxford University. From this furnace the town of Oxford—which was formed twenty years afterwards—took its name. Jonathan Robeson was one of the first judges of Sussex County. His father and grandfather both wore the ermine before him in Pennsylvania, while his son, grandson, and great-grandson, each in his turn, occupied seats on the judicial bench. William P. Robeson, of Warren County, was the sixth judge in regular descent from his ancestor, Andrew Robeson, who came to America with William Penn and was a member of Governor Markham's Privy Council. In this country, where the accident of birth confers no special right to stations of honor, and where ability and honesty are—ought to be—the only passports to public distinction, this remarkable succession of offices in one family affords a rare example of hereditary merit, and is, so far as we know, without a parallel in our judicial annals."

Another of the first settlements in Sussex and Warren was made by members of the Society of Friends in that part of ancient Hardwick called "the Quaker settlement." The pioneers in this locality came from Maiden Creek (now Attleborough), Pa., and from Crosswicks, N. J., from 1735 to 1740. They were the Wilsons, Lundys, and others, and must be set down as among the very first settlers of ancient Hardwick. The settlers here were so few in number that when the first frame house in the settlement was erected they were obliged to secure help from Hunterdon County. The heavy timbers then put into frames required a greater force to lift them to their place than is needed in raising modern frame structures, and this may account for the fact that this first frame building erected in the settlement stood the blasts of more than a century and a half without having been seriously impaired.

The deed for the ground on which the Friends' meeting-house in this place was built was given by Richard Penn, a grandson of William Penn, in 1752.

Previous to the erection of a mill in this neighborhood the people took their grain to Kingwood, in Hunterdon County, to be ground.

Mr. Edsall, from reliable data furnished him, has summed up the settlements in other portions of Sussex and Warren as follows:

"In that part of ancient Newton known as Vernon township there were some early settlements, principally consisting of those who had first tried their fortunes in Orange County. One Joseph Perry, who had prepared for the erection of a house there about the year 1740, could not raise the timbers without procuring help from New Windsor. Col. De Kay settled in New York, upon the edge of this township, in 1711; some of his lands, which he then held under a New York patent, now lie this side the boundary-line. The McComlys, Campbells, Edsalls, Winans, Hynards, Simonsons, etc., did not come in until just before the Revolution, at which period a considerable amount of population had spread not only over Vernon, but throughout Hardyston. Joseph Sharp,—the father, I believe, of the late venerable Joseph Sharp, of Vernon,—who had obtained a proprietary right to a large body of land stretching from Deckertown to the sources of the Walkkill, came from Salem County a few years before the Revolution and erected a furnace and forge about one mile south of Hamburgh, which were known for some years as the 'Sharpsborough Iron-Works.' This was the second furnace erected in Sussex County. Sharp lost a great deal from this enterprise; and, particularly from the annoyance which he met with from the sheriff of the county,—who, under certain circumstances, is well known to be a most unwelcome visitor,—he abandoned the works."† Robert Ogden removed from Elizabethtown and settled in Vernon in 1765 or 1766. He was long one of the judges of the courts of the county, and one of its most prominent and patriotic citizens. Three of his sons fought in the war for independence, and one of them—Col. Aaron Ogden—commanded the honored regiment known as Gen. Washington's Life-Guard.

"Peter Decker built the first house in Deckertown, in 1734. He was the son of John Decker, of Minisink, and was among the earliest of the pioneers who crossed the mountains and founded the township of Wantage. He was a man of enterprise and energy, and served his country for many years as a magistrate. The early settlers upon the lands southeast of the Minisink Mountain and west of the Walkkill, in the section now known as Wantage, were regarded as of close kin to the inhabitants of Minisink. Their names are identical with those of the Delaware and Neversink borders, and they unquestionably, by kindred and association, constituted one community. One of the earliest settlements east of the Blue Mountains was in the Popokating valley, and was made by Messrs. Colt, Price, and Gustin, who were originally from New England. Many of this class of emigrants, in their progress westward from the land of the Puritans, had first settled upon Long Island, but, hoping to better their condition, they removed to Orange Co., N. Y., and Bergen, Somerset, Hunterdon, and other counties in New Jersey. About the year 1700 a great many of the settlers on Long Island removed to the places indicated, because the land was cheaper and better than that which they tilled upon the island. Hunterdon and Orange were the favorite counties of this class of immigrants; in these they established homes, but their own cosmopolitan disposition was transmitted to their children, who in their turn plunged also into the wilderness, and, entering Sussex at her northern and southern extremities, explored the various rivulets to their sources, and upon the lands drained alike by the tributaries of the Hudson and the Delaware kin met with kin in the heart of the county, and their blood, separated for from fifty to seventy years, again commingled. Of this class were the Greens, Hunts, Blackwells, Blancs, Browns, Brokaws, Howells, Hopkins, Begles, Townsends, Stileses, Ketchams, Collards, Millses, Havens, Trusedells, Moores, Hills, Dentons, Cascs, Knapps, Coes, Smiths, Johnsons, Pettits, Wallings, and others. Many of these settlers were not far behind those of Minisink in the date of their advent into the county.

“From the year 1740 to the close of the Revolution there was a considerable immigration of Germans. Among the first of this class were John Bernhardt and Casper Shafer, his son-in-law. They had purchased lands where Stillwater village now is, of persons in Philadelphia, and in the year 1742, by the Delaware and the valley of the Paulinskill, they journeyed to their destination and took possession of the tracts indicated by their title-deeds. They were followed in a few years by the Wintermutes, the Snovers, Swartswelders, Staleys, Merkels, Schmucks, Snooks, Mains, Cousses, and a large number of other Germans, who settled principally in the valley of the Paulinskill, although a portion branched off in other directions. Mr. Bernhardt lived only a few years after his arrival. He died in 1748, and was the first person buried in the cemetery of the old German church, the cemetery having been used before the church was built, which was not erected till 1771. In the beginning of his life in the backwoods, Mr. Shafer found it necessary to cross the Pahaqualin Mountain to get his grist ground; the mode adopted was that of leading a horse along an Indian trail, upon whose back the bag of grain was borne. This inconvenience suggested to him the expedient of constructing a mill upon his own property, which he did in the following primitive manner: First, he built a low dam of cobblestones, filled in with gravel, across the kill, to create a water-power; he then drove piles into the ground, forming a foundation for his building to rest upon;

then upon these he built a small frame or log mill-house, furnishing it with one small run of stones and other equally simple and primitive machinery. His mill, being thus furnished and put in operation, was capable of grinding about five bushels a day; yet it was a great convenience and was resorted to from far and near. ‘In a few years he built a better mill and commenced shipping flour to Philadelphia,’ loading it on a flat-boat and running it down the Paulinskill and the Delaware to its place of destination. ‘Mr. Shafer was the first man in this region to open a business intercourse with Elizabethtown; he heard from the Indians in his vicinity that there was a large place far away to the southeast which they called “Tespatoone,” and he determined to ascertain the truth of this assertion. He traveled over mountains and through bogs and forests, and after a rough journey of some fifty miles he arrived at the veritable “Old Borough.” He opened a traffic in a moderate way at this time, and thus laid the foundation of that profitable intercourse between the southeastern towns and cities and Northern New Jersey which has augmented from that time to the present, and almost entirely excluded Philadelphia from participation in the trade of this section of the State.’

“Robert Paterson was the first settler at Belvidere, according to the ‘Historical Collections,’ about the year 1755. ‘Shortly after, a block-house was erected on the north side of the Pequest, some thirty or forty yards east of the toll-house of the Belvidere Delaware bridge. Some time previous to the Revolutionary war a battle was fought on the Pennsylvania side of the river between a band of Indians who came from the north and the Delawares residing on the Jersey side.’ The name ‘Belvidere’ was given to the village by Maj. Robert Hoops because of the beauty of its situation. It was made the county-seat of Warren County when the latter was set off from Sussex, in 1824.*

“Henry Hairlocker, a Hollander, about the year 1750, settled near the present site of Newton. It was then a wilderness, there being not another cabin for miles around.

“The Greens, Armstrongs, Pettits, Van Horns, Simes, Hazens, Dyers, Cooks, Shaws, and others, settled in and around the present village of Johnsonsburg, formerly called the ‘Log Jail,’ where the county-seat of Sussex County was first located and the first jail built.

“In 1769 the Moravian Brethren, from Bethlehem, Pa., purchased fifteen hundred acres of land of Samuel Green for the sum of five hundred and sixty-three pounds, or about two thousand five hundred dollars, and founded the village of Hope. This Samuel Green was a deputy surveyor for the West Jersey proprietors, and owned several tracts of land in ancient Hardwick and Greenwich. The Moravians remained at Hope some thirty-five years, when they commenced selling their property and returned to Bethlehem. Sampson Howell, who settled at the foot of the Jenny Jump Mountain, near Hope, a year or two before the Moravians arrived, erected a saw-mill and supplied the lumber for the construction of the very substantial buildings erected by the United Brethren."

We have thus glanced in a brief and general manner at the first settlements in the principal parts of Sussex and Warren Counties. They were made for the most part within a period of about fifty years, embracing the first half of the eighteenth century,—that is, by the year 1750 permanent settlements had been made in most of the important parts of the two counties. When Morris County was set off, in 1738, Northern New Jersey began to attract attention. It was then ascertained that, although this section had at a remote period evidently been a favorite residence of the Indians, most of them had departed and occupied hunting-grounds farther to the north and west. Little danger was therefore to be apprehended from the red men by those who settled in the central portions of the territory; for, even if they should become hostile, the line of settlements on the Delaware from the Musconetcong to the Neversink would be most apt to bear the brunt. Hence immigrants flowed in, and by 1750 they had become so numerous, and had experienced so much inconvenience from being compelled to go to Morristown to attend to public business, that they very generally petitioned the Provincial Assembly to "divide the county" and allow them "the liberty of building a court-house and gaol." This request was granted, resulting in the erection and organization of Sussex County in 1753.* As to the nationalities constituting the base of population, Mr. Edsall made as complete a list as practicable from the public records for the first six years of the existence of the county. "This list contains four hundred and two names, of which those indicating an English and Scotch origin are the most numerous; those pertaining to Holland and Germany follow next, and the residue are derived from France, Ireland, Wales, and Norway."

One thing which stood very much in the way of the prosperity of the early settlers was the appropriation by the proprietors of many portions of the best land in the county. As early as 1715, when as yet but two or three points in the whole territory had been settled, the sagacious proprietors of West Jersey, foreseeing that these lands would ultimately become very valuable, sent their surveyors, who penetrated the heart of the country, establishing "butts and bounds" of many of the most desirable tracts. Among others, William Penn located three tracts of land, containing ten thousand or twelve thousand acres, in and around the vicinity of Newton. "In this way the best locations were generally entered before any immigrants had arrived in the central portions of the county, and they had to cultivate the soil, when they did come, as tenants or trespassers."

CHAPTER VI.

FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR, 1755.

I.—CAUSES OF THE DISTURBANCE.

THE border troubles begun by the Indians in 1755 were not induced in retaliation for any injustice done them by the people of New Jersey. The citizens of this province had never shed the blood of any of their race, nor had they cheated them out of any of their lands. Why, then, were they obliged to defend themselves by a line of forts along the whole frontier of Sussex and Warren Counties, and to call out their militia to protect the settlements from the merciless tomahawk and scalping-knife? Why was the border a scene of savage attack and massacre from 1755 to 1758, inclusive? The causes which led to this lay entirely beyond the bounds of Sussex and Warren Counties, and even of New Jersey, and were induced by agencies over which the people of the province had no control. In the first place, it was a period when England and France were at war, and when their respective colonies in North America had secured the alliance of the various Indian tribes of the country, on one side or the other, in the great contest then pending, and which was decided a few years after by the downfall of Canada and the surrender of all the French possessions in North America to the English. The Iroquois, or Six Nations, of New York,—the hereditary enemies of the Delaware and Susquehanna Indians,—were the firm allies of the English and the most powerful agents in turning the scale against their French adversaries. At this time the French were largely in possession of the great water-basins of the interior of the country accessible by the St. Lawrence and the great chain of Western lakes and rivers, and had forts extending from Quebec to Mobile Bay, and their agents, traders, and missionaries were widely disseminated among the Indians of all that region of country. Lake Champlain, Niagara, and Pittsburg were at that time the nearest points to New Jersey fortified by the French, but her frontier was accessible by a few days' march along the great trails leading to the Susquehanna and Delaware Rivers. These avenues were then peculiarly exposed, as the Iroquois were fighting for the English in other parts of the country. There can be no doubt that the Indians who raided upon these borders during the French war were French allies, and that they were incited, and even sometimes led, to their work of pillage and slaughter by French agents and military officers.

Moreover, there was a local cause which embittered

* See chapter on organization, courts, etc.

the strife. The agents of William Penn had procured the lands of the Minisies in the Pennsylvania portion of the Minisink valley by what has been known as the famous "walking purchase" of 1737.* From the time of this transaction the discontent of the Indians seemed manifest, and distrust and jealousy took the place of the confidence and friendship which had hitherto characterized their intercourse with the whites. For eighteen years, until 1755, they smothered their resentment at the wrong and perfidy which had deprived them of their fairest possessions; and at last, driven to desperation, they resolved, under Teedyuscung, the king of the tribe, to reclaim by force what had been taken from them by fraud and treachery. Had none but the guilty suffered in the storm of blood and carnage which swept over the valley during those terrible years of war, we might now derive a melancholy satisfaction from the belief that the tomahawk of avenging justice had done its work well. But scores of innocent settlers who had acquired their lands by honest purchase, and who had never wronged the Indians, were also compelled to suffer, as the indiscriminate vengeance of the savage in the height of his fury seldom pauses to judge between friend and enemy so long as the scalp to be taken belongs to the pale-face and brings him prestige and profit in war. The troubles at first were confined to the Pennsylvania side of the valley, but New Jersey was also destined to feel somewhat the shock of the conflict.

II.—THE VAN CAMPEN AND BELCHER CORRESPONDENCE.

Jonathan Belcher was then His Majesty's Governor of the province, and he was duly advised of the threatening aspect of affairs by Col. Abraham Van Campen, of Walpack. On Nov. 11, 1755, the Governor sent Col. Van Campen the following instructions:

"SIR,—I just now received your good letter of the 7th inst., as I hope you have before now my order of the 6th of the same month. I will approve of what you propose, of marching with your regiment into the next Province, in order to meet and repel the enemy before they enter into the Jerseys. In this matter I desire you to be very vigilant and diligent in giving me notice of all your proceedings, and per express if necessary.

"I am, Sir, Your Assured Friend,

"J. BELCHER.

"ELIZABETH TOWN, NOV. 11, 1755.

"COL. VAN CAMPEN."

One day later the Governor wrote to Col. Van Campen:

"SIR,—Since I sent you my order for a speedy muster of your Regiment I have received repeated accounts of the approach of the savage French and Indians to the borders of Pennsylvania and to those of this province, committing the most barbarous outrages on His Majesty's good subjects, in slaughter, blood, and fire, wherever they come.

* See the relations of Thomas Furniss and Joseph Knowles "Concerning the walk made between the Proprietors of Pennsylvania and the Delaware Indians by James Yates and Edward Marshall," in "An Enquiry into the Causes of the Alienation of the Delaware and Shawanese Indians from the British Interest." Written by Charles Thomson, the American patriot, who in 1774 was elected secretary to Congress, and whose last literary work was a translation of the Septuagint, which was published in four volumes in 1804.

"There are therefore to command you, in His Majesty's name, to have your regiment in best readiness to march to the borders of this Province, or that of Pennsylvania, upon the most sudden notice of distress by the enemy, for the aid and relief of His Majesty's subjects. I shall not doubt the good courage and spirit of yourself, the officers and men of your Regiment, to proceed where it shall be necessary, and would have you publish this order at the head of your regiment upon their muster.

"Given under my hand and Seal of Arms at the Borough of Elizabeth, this 12th day of November, in the twenty-ninth year of His Majesty's reign, Anno Domini, 1755.

"J. BELCHER.

"TO COL. VAN CAMPEN."

In reply to Col. Van Campen's report of the 17th of the same month, the Governor wrote as follows:

"SIR,—I have duly received yours of the 17th of this month, and am well pleased with your diligence in giving me information how things are circumstanced in the county of Sussex with respect to the enemy, etc. I have given notice to the several colonels to muster their regiments and repel the enemy over in Pennsylvania Province, and so to prevent their passing the river Delaware, and which I think would be better than to let them enter on the frontiers of this Province. I pray Almighty God to have you and your people in his good protection, and am,

"Sir, Your Assured Friend,

"J. BELCHER.

"ELIZABETH TOWN, NOV. 24, 1755.

"COL. VAN CAMPEN."

III.—DEFENSIVE MEASURES ADOPTED.

On the 27th of December the Legislature passed an act authorizing the erection of four block-houses at suitable distances from one another on the Delaware River, in the county of Sussex. The persons appointed to superintend their erection were John Stevens and John Johnson, Esqs., who had "voluntarily offered themselves for that service gratis." The act ordered the enlistment of two hundred and fifty men to garrison said block-houses, and provided for the issuing of bills of credit to the amount of ten thousand pounds to pay the expenses of protecting the frontiers. Jonathan Hampton was appointed commissioner of supplies for the troops, and John Wetherill commissary and paymaster. These troops were to serve one month and until their places could be supplied by others. To encourage enlistments, exemptions from arrest upon civil processes for debts of less than fifteen pounds, as well as the protection of property from execution, was guaranteed. The pay of the soldiers, too, was increased beyond the ordinary average, being for the commander-in-chief of a block-house six shillings per day; captain, four shillings; lieutenant, three shillings; sergeant, corporal, and drummer, two shillings sixpence each; private, two shillings per man.

These block-houses were erected and numbered from 1 to 4, and are sometimes referred to by their numbers in the early documents. They were also garrisoned as speedily as practicable; yet the Indians continued to make incursions into the settlements, often forming ambuscades so near the forts that parties going out hunting were surprised and killed. In view of several occurrences of this kind, it became necessary to issue an order that the officers and soldiers should keep within their garrisons. In times of general alarm whole neighborhoods would retreat within the inclosures for safety.

IV.—INDIAN INCURSIONS AND MURDERS.

The Indians would sometimes elude the vigilance of these garrisons, get into the interior, and there perpetrate their bloody work. Such was the case when they penetrated into Hardwick, the very heart of the county, and captured the Hunts and Swartwout. From the different accounts given of this tragical affair we condense the following statement: A party of five Indians who had formerly resided in the neighborhood, but had removed to Pennsylvania, determined to capture three men,—Richard Hunt, Harker, and Swartwout,—having become disaffected towards them because of the part they had taken in the colonial service. They accordingly crossed the Delaware near where Dingman's bridge now is, and in the evening reached the log house of Richard Hunt, having traveled about fifteen miles on the Jersey side of the river. Richard Hunt was absent from home, and the only occupants of the house at the time were Thomas Hunt, a younger brother, and a negro servant. The latter was engaged in amusing himself and his companion by playing on a violin, when their entertainment was suddenly interrupted by the appearance of the Indians. Quick as thought the boys sprang to the door and closed and bolted it. Their fun was at an end, and the negro, in his terror, "threw his fiddle into the fire and awaited in trembling suspense the result of the unwelcome visit." The Indians disappeared and were gone about an hour, when they returned. It was discovered, by their footprints in a newly-plowed piece of ground, that during their absence they had reconnoitred the house of Mr. Dildine, where Richard Hunt happened to be at the time, but they evidently dared not make an attack at that place. Returning to Hunt's house, they made a movement to set it on fire, threatening to burn the inmates alive if they did not surrender. The boys yielded, and were forced to accompany the savages, who proceeded towards the Delaware by the way of the southerly end of Great Pond, and soon came to the house of Swartwout, who lived on the tract now occupied by the village of New Paterson. Mrs. Swartwout, soon after their approach to the house, without a thought of danger, went out to the milk-house, and was instantly shot down. They then attempted to enter the house, but Swartwout seized his rifle and held them in check. Finally he agreed to surrender if they would spare his life and the lives of his son and daughter. They consented to this proposition, but they either themselves violated their pledge or, what was worse, procured a white man to do it, for Swartwout was murdered, and a man named Springer was arrested, convicted, and hung for the murder. We shall give the details of the trial and execution farther on; meantime, we proceed with our narrative.

Swartwout's two children were taken to an Indian town on the Susquehanna, while Hunt and the negro were conveyed to Canada. "Hunt was sold by his captors to a French military officer, and accompanied him as his servant. His mother, anxious for his deliverance if alive, attended the general conference at Easton, in October, 1758, where a treaty was made with the Six Nations, and, finding a savage there who knew her son, she gave him sixty pounds to procure his freedom and return him to his friends. This proved money wasted. Hunt was soon after liberated under that provision of the treaty of Easton which made a restoration of prisoners obligatory upon the Indians, and reached home in 1759, after a servitude of three years and nine months. Swartwout's children must have been freed about a year after their capture, for we find his son in New Jersey in 1757, active in causing the arrest of a white man named Benjamin Springer, whom he charged with being the murderer of his father.

Springer was arrested and confined in the jail of Essex County. An act was passed by the Assembly of New Jersey on Oct. 22, 1757, authorizing his trial to take place in the county of Morris, "because the Indian disturbances in Sussex rendered it difficult, if not dangerous, to hold a Court of Oyer and Terminer there." The act also ordered that the expenses of the prosecution should be borne by the province. "Pursuant to this act," says Allison, "Springer, on the positive testimony of Swartwout's son and the contradictions in the prisoner's own story, after a full and fair hearing, at which an eminent councilor attended in his behalf, was convicted, to the satisfaction of most all present, and was executed in Morris. He declared himself innocent of the crime, and on the return of Thomas Hunt and a negro who had been taken a few miles distant by the same party that captivated Swartwout's family (with which party it was proved at the trial Springer was, and that he killed Swartwout), it appearing by their declarations that they did not see Springer until they got to the Indian town, some inclined to believe that he might not have been guilty. Thus the question seemed obscured. It is, however, agreed that his trial was deliberate and impartial, and many still think that his life was forfeited to the laws of his country."^{*}

Springer declared on the scaffold that Thomas Hunt knew him to be innocent, and his parents, after Hunt's return, came on from Virginia to learn if their son was really guilty. "Hunt assured them, as he did every one else to the end of his days, that he considered him innocent. He did not see Springer until he arrived at the Susquehanna flats, where he found him, like himself, as he believed, a prisoner. Neither did he see Swartwout murdered, but he was confident that the deed was done about one mile northwest from his own house; he and the negro at the time were guarded by two Indians, the others being busy not a great way off dispatching Swartwout. He heard his cries,—heard him beg for his life and promise to go with them peaceably if they would spare him. He was an athletic, resolute man and the Indians were afraid of him, and therefore, as Hunt always declared, murdered him. They tied him to a tree, tomahawked him, and left his body to the wolves and birds of prey." The Indians doubtless murdered him to gratify an old grudge: putting him out of the way was the surest revenge, as well as an indemnity against any personal violence which they might have apprehended from him, and the danger of the arrest of the party by the scouts from some one of the block-houses.

During these troubles with the Indians the courts of Sussex County were held at Wolverton's, in Hardwick. In February, 1756, the grand jury appeared, but were not sworn, "by reason," as the record says, "of troublesome times with the Indians." The term of May, 1756, found the condition of affairs in the county equally alarming, and the "Grand Inquest" was again dispensed with.

V.—PRECAUTIONS AND ADVENTURES OF FRONTIER SETTLERS.

Upon the first breaking out of hostilities, in 1755, most of the settlers upon the southeastern and northwestern slopes of the Blue Mountains fortified their houses by building stockades around them; Casper Shafer, in Stillwater valley, was one who took this precaution. There were at that time a few Indians living in the neighborhood, and, though not previously hostile, it was not known that their conduct would continue to be pacific. At Mr. Shafer's house it was common for the neighbors to assemble upon each recurring alarm. One night, however, when Mr. Shafer was alone, the Indians showed signs of hostility by yelling around his house and threatening violence. He thereupon fastened up the house and started across the fields to procure assistance from his neighbors. "Soon he found himself hotly pursued by one of the enemy, and likely to be overtaken; whereupon he turned upon his pursuer, and, being an athletic man, he seized, threw, and with his garters bound him hand and foot, leaving him prostrate, while he went on his way and procured the desired assistance. Mr. Depue, in Walpack, had also a narrow escape from the tomahawk and scalping-knife. A party of Indians broke into his house at midnight with murderous intent, and he, being aroused from slumber, seized his loaded gun and leveled it at the foremost aggressor, who, realizing his danger, uttered the peculiar Indian 'Ugh' dodged away, and fled. So acted the next, and another, and another; and thus, without firing his gun, he succeeded in driving the whole gang from his dwelling."

VI.—MILITARY ORGANIZATION—FIGHTING THE INDIANS.

On June 3, 1757, the General Assembly of New Jersey, after reciting that "the savage Indian enemy have lately perpetrated cruel murders on the frontiers of this colony, and the inhabitants there have, by their petitions, set forth their distresses and supplicated a number of troops for their assistance and protection," enacted that one hundred and twenty men be immediately raised, with the proper number of officers; that Jonathan Hampton be appointed paymaster and victualer for the company, and that he provide and allow each officer and soldier the following provisions every week,—viz., "seven pounds of Bread, seven pounds of Beef, or, in lieu thereof, four pounds of Pork, six ounces of Butter, three pints of Peas, and half a pound of Rice." As tea, coffee, and sugar were luxuries in those days, they were not provided in the rations. All prisoners for debt were to be released, because they might "in this time of common danger suffer for want of persons to look after them." The act, however, allowed the sheriff to reincarcerate them after six months of liberty.

In 1758, when the frontier was supposed to be well protected, the family of Nicholas Cole, of Walpack, was attacked by Indians, most of them murdered, and the rest carried into captivity. Several other murders were committed, and the people again petitioned the Legislature for further protection and defense against the hostile attacks of the Indians. On the 12th of August of that year the Legislature ordered an additional levy of one hundred and fifty men, none of whom, with the exception of the officers, should be recruited from the militia of the county of Sussex, as "the whole of that militia might be wanted in case of any formidable attack." A new block-house was ordered to be erected "below Pehoquain Mountain, near the mouth of the Paulinskill, or between that and the said Mountain." Twenty guides well acquainted with the country were to be hired by the commanding officer to conduct the troops through the wilds and fastnesses of Sussex; and it was further provided "that inasmuch as the Indians are a very private and secret enemy, and as it has been thought Dogs would be of very great service not only in discovering them in their secret retreats among the swamps, rocks, and mountains, frequent in those parts; therefore be it enacted, etc., that it shall and may be lawful for the Paymaster aforesaid to procure upon the best terms they can Fifty good, large, strong, and fierce Dogs; and the same so procured to supply with food necessary to their subsistence, equal to ten men's allowance in quantity; which said Dogs shall be disciplined for and employed in the service in such manner as the said Major, in conjunction with the Commission officers, or the major part of them, shall think proper."

We quote the following from Neville's "Laws," vol. ii. page 202, which is said to have been the first recognition of personal bravery by the Provincial Legislature of New Jersey, and is peculiarly appropriate inasmuch as it refers to residents of Sussex County. It is part of the act of Aug. 12, 1758:

"Whereas, it is not only strictly just, but highly prudent, to reward and encourage such acts of martial Bravery as have a tendency to distress the Enemy and defend Ourselves: And whereas It's credibly reported that John Vantile, a Sergeant in the pay of this Colony, with a party of nine more under his Command, have lately exerted themselves against the Common Enemy upon the frontiers of this Colony in a signal Manner; and that a Lad, aged about seventeen years, surnamed Tisort, when pursued by the Enemy, shut one of them and secured his retreat from the imminent danger with which he was threatened, losing his gun; Therefore, as a just Reward to those Persons, and to excite others to imitate their heroic Example, Be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful for the Paymaster aforesaid, and he is hereby directed to pay unto the said John Vantile the sum of twenty Spanish Dollars, and to each of the party under his command the sum of Ten Dollars a piece; and to the said Lad, surnamed Tisort, as aforesaid, the sum of Thirty Dollars; And shall also procure for, and present to the said John Vantile, and the said Lad, surnamed Tisort, with a Silver Medal each, of the size of a Dollar, whereon shall be inscribed the Bust or Figure of an Indian, prostrate at the feet of the said Vantile and Lad aforesaid, importing their victory over them, and to commemorate their Bravery and the Country's Gratitude upon the occasion. Which Medals the said Vantile and Lad aforesaid, shall or may wear in view at all such public occasions as they may happen to attend, to excite an Emulation and kindle a martial fire in the Breasts of the Spectators, so truly essential in this Time of General War."

VII.—EXTRACTS FROM THE "NEW AMERICAN MAGAZINE."*

Respecting affairs at this period in Sussex County, the "New American Magazine," published at Woodbridge, N. J., under date of May 31, 1758, gives the following:

"PERTH AMBOY, May 31.—On Monday, the fifteenth instant, about two o'clock in the afternoon, thirteen Indians rushed into the house of Nicholas Cole, in the county of Sussex, near Nominack fort, in the township of Walpack, in this province, adjacent to the river Delaware, and, Cole being from home, they immediately killed his son, about eighteen years old, who was asleep upon the bed; they then finished Cole's wife, and, dragging her out of doors, she there saw her eldest daughter, aged thirteen, her son, aged eight, and her youngest daughter, about four years old, all murdered and scalped. The savage villains then plundered the house, after which they carried off the mother and her son Jacob, about ten years of age. They were soon after joined by two other Indians, who had with them two Germans, whom they had taken that day, and had killed and scalped a third in Anthony Westbrook's field, near Minisink, in said county of Sussex. The soldiers who were guarding the frontiers proposed to join some of the neighbors and to cross the Delaware the next morning by daybreak to watch the road to Wyoming. And as four of them were going to the place of rendezvous, about two o'clock in the night, they heard the Indians coming down the hill in the main road to cross the Delaware; when one of the four fired among them the savages immediately fled, setting up a most dismal yell, and leaving Cole's wife and son at liberty, who made the best of their way along the road to one McCarty's, to which place the soldiers soon after came. The woman said the Indians talked English and Dutch, and she was sure one was a white man. Capt. Gardner is gone with two parties to waylay the road to Wyoming and Cochecton. The Indians, thinking they were discovered, killed the two German prisoners, and after scalping them cut off one of their heads and fixed it on his breast, the two bodies being since found.

"On the Thursday following, the daughter of the Widow Walling, near Fort Gardner, between Goshen and Minisink, was killed by three Indians as she was picking up chips for the fire. Her shrieks alarming the house, her brother ran up-stairs, and, seeing the Indians scalping his sister, he fired at them from the garret-window, and is sure he wounded one of them. The mother and other daughter in the mean time made their escape, and the son likewise got off clear."

The same magazine for June 30, 1758, has the following:

"PERTH AMBOY, June 30.—On the 12th instant one Walter Vantile, a sergeant of the forces stationed upon the frontier of this province in the county of Sussex, having received information that a party of Indians had crossed the river Delaware into Pennsylvania, took nine soldiers with him and went over the river in pursuit of them. They made diligent search after the Indians in different ways, but could make no discovery of them. However, for that night they encamped upon the river, about six miles above Cole's Fort, and in the morning they scouted back from the river about four miles; at last they discovered an Indian walking towards the place where they had lain the night before, whom they pursued, but he got into a swamp and made his escape. The sergeant and his party then took the same course towards the river which the Indian was steering, and when they came to the bank of the Delaware they heard some Indians chopping on a small island in the river, and saw ten of them making a raft in order to cross the river. Vantile and his men watched them very strictly the whole night. In the morning, early, the Indians packed up their clothes and other things and waded the river, drawing their raft after them. Vantile, perceiving by their course that they would land higher up than where he and his men were posted, crept privately up the river until they came within one hundred yards of them, when they saw a smoke upon the shore and an Indian rise up, who came towards the soldiers, but he soon returned to the fire and took up his gun; upon which about fifteen Indians rose up and hid hold of their guns. The sergeant then ordered his men to fire upon them, and the Indians returned the fire and advanced; the aforesaid ten Indians who were coming from the island also fired very briskly. The sergeant and his men sustained the attack with great courage, and after fighting six rounds and boldly advancing towards the enemy the Indians fled in great confusion, leaving behind them four guns, four tomahawks, three pikes, fifteen pairs of moccasins, fifteen pairs of stockings, and other sundry things. These are supposed to be the same Indians who had attacked Uriah Westfall's and Abraham Cortwright's houses.

"His Excellency Governor Bernard hath sent up orders to the officers upon the frontiers to restrain the soldiers from leaving their quarters and straggling into the woods to hunt and shoot, as the same is certainly a dangerous and pernicious practice; for on Friday last William Ward was shot and scalped as he was hunting within a half mile of No. 3, in the county of Sussex; and the same day about noon a house was burnt on the opposite side of the river. The Indians shouted and fired several guns while it was burning.

"Some days since a man and a boy, traveling along the public highway in the said county of Sussex, were attacked by the Indians. The man was shot dead; the boy was surprised, but, finding one of the Indians in pursuit of him, he had presence of mind, as the last refuge, to turn and fire upon him, and saw him drop. The other Indian still pursued, and the boy, perceiving that his gun so retarded his flight that he must be taken, broke it to pieces against a rock, that it might not fall into the enemy's hands, and made his escape from them. He then alarmed the people, who immediately went out upon the scout with guns and dogs, and, coming to the place where the boy shot the Indian, they found a great deal of blood, but not the body. They searched very diligently about the woods, when at last one of the dogs began barking; and, going to see what was the matter, they found him barking at a bunch of brush, and, turning it aside, they found the Indian buried with his clothes and tomahawk, upon which they scalped him and brought away the things they found buried with him. On Tuesday, the 16th of June, Justice Decker, of the county of Sussex, brought the said Indian scalp and tomahawk to the city of Perth Amboy. This savage proves to be the notorious bloody villain well known by the name of Capt. Armstrong, a noted ring-leader of the Delawares, who, with other Indians, was concerned with Benjamin Springer (lately executed in Morris County) in the murder of Anthony Swartwout, his wife and children."

VIII.—CONFERENCES—NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE.

The Legislature appointed a committee, who met the Indians of this State at Crosswicks in the winter of 1756. Their grievances were heard patiently, and then reported to the Legislature, which passed acts to relieve them.

In June, 1758, Governor Bernard, of New Jersey, consulted Gen. Forbes and Governor Denny, of Pennsylvania, as to the measures best calculated to put a stop to the unpleasant warfare, and through Teedy-escung, king of the Delawares, he obtained a conference with the Minisink and Pompton Indians, protection being assured them.* The conference took place at Burlington, Aug. 7, 1758. On the part of the province, there were present the Governor, three commissioners of Indian affairs of the House of Assembly, and six members of the council. Two Minisink or Munsey Indians, one Cayuga, one Delaware messenger from the Mingorans, and one Delaware who came with the Minisies were the delegates on the part of the natives. The conference opened with a speech from the Governor. He sat holding four strings of wampum, and thus addressed them: "Brethren, as you are come from a long journey through a wood full of briars, with this string I anoint your feet and take away their soreness; with this string I wipe the sweat from your bodies; with this string I cleanse your eyes, ears, and mouth, that you may see, hear, and speak clearly, and I particularly anoint your throat that every word you say may have a free passage from your heart; and with this string I bid you welcome." The four strings were then delivered to them. The result of the conference was that a time was fixed for holding another at Easton, at the request of the Indians, that being, as they termed it, the place of the "old council."

The act passed in 1757 appropriated sixteen hundred pounds for the purchase of Indian claims; but, as the Indians living south of the Raritan preferred receiving their portion in lands especially devoted to their occupancy, three thousand and forty-four acres in the township of Evesham, Burlington Co., were purchased for them. A house of worship and several dwellings were subsequently erected, forming the town of Brotherton; and, as the selling or leasing of any portion of the tract was prohibited, as was also the settlement of any persons upon it other than Indians, the greatest harmony appears to have prevailed between its inhabitants and their white neighbors.†

On Oct. 8, 1758, the conference commenced at Easton. It was attended by the lieutenant-governor of Pennsylvania, six of his council, and an equal number of members of the House of Representatives, Governor Bernard, of New Jersey, five Indian commissioners, George Croghan, Esq., deputy Indian agent under Sir William Johnson, a number of magistrates and freeholders of the two provinces, and five hundred and seven Indians, comprising delegates from fourteen different tribes. The business of the conference was conducted mainly by Governor Bernard, who in its management evinced no small degree of talent and tact. It was closed on the 26th of October, and the result was a release by the Minisink and Wapping Indians of all lands claimed by them within the limits of New Jersey for the sum of one thousand pounds. Deeds were also obtained from the Delawares and other Indians, and it was declared "that by these two agreements the province of New Jersey is entirely freed and discharged from all Indian claims." At least, such was the opinion of Governor Bernard and the Indians; but the Assembly the ensuing March, in answer to the Governor's speech, mention a small claim of the Totamies and some private claims still outstanding. The minutes of this interesting conference are printed at length in Smith's "History of New Jersey." The amicable relations thus happily begun remained undisturbed for several years.

In 1764 a frontier guard of two hundred men was again kept up some time in consequence of disturbances in Pennsylvania, but the alarm soon subsided. In 1769, Governor Franklin attended a convention held with the Six Nations by several of the colonial Governors, and informed the Assembly on his return that they had publicly acknowledged repeated instances of the justice of the New Jersey authorities in bringing murderers of Indians to condign punishment, declared that they had no claim whatever upon the province, and in the most solemn manner conferred on its government the title of Sagoyighiviyogstha, or the "Great Arbitrator," or "Doer of Justice," a name which the Governor truly remarked reflected high honor upon the province.*

IX.—TEEDYUSCUNG.

Teedyuscung, the last king of the Delawares, was in many respects a very remarkable and noble character. Although he took up the tomahawk against the whites in 1755, and was the chief leader in that struggle, it was because he believed he had a just cause. He was made king of the Delawares west of the mountains in 1756. In May of that year he and his Indians left their headquarters at Wyoming and repaired to Diahoga, a strong Indian town at the Forks of the Susquehanna, now Athens, Pa. In July, 1756, he visited Bethlehem, at the invitation of the Governor, preparatory to the first conference held at Easton, and is spoken of by Reichel as follows in his "Memorials of the Moravian Church:—"

"Capt. Newcastle returned to Bethlehem on the evening of the 17th. With him came Teedyuscung and upwards of thirty other Indians, men, women, and children, pursuant to the Governor's invitation; this was the first appearance of the chief within the settlement since he had taken up the hatchet. On the 18th he met Maj. Parsons in conference in Justice Horsfield's office. It was a memorable interview, in as far as on that occasion Teedyuscung for the first time proclaimed his kingship. His private counselor, Tapescawen, or Tapescohung, Newcastle, Capt. Insley, from Fort Allen, and a few others, were present; John Pompsire interpreted. Producing a string of wampum whereby to confirm what he desired to say, he dictated this message to the Governor in reply to the invitation he had received to meet him at Tulpehocken: 'Brother the Governor of Pennsylvania, I have received the word by your messenger kindly. Upon it I have come, as you have given me good words, which are called council-fire. At the Forks of Delaware we will sit down, and wait there, and shall be ready. I am exceeding glad that there are such thoughts and methods taken in respect to our women and children. I shall, I hope, be ready to let you know a little further when we shall meet. This what I have now in short spoken is not only from me, but also from my uncle the Mohawk [the Six Nations], and from four other nations [the Delawares, Shawanese, Monseys, and Mohicans], which in all make ten; and these ten have but two heads of kings between them.'"

Teedyuscung and his companions were escorted to Easton on the 19th, pursuant to the Governor's order issued to Maj. Parsons. On July 24, 1756, three members of the council were sent to notify Teedyuscung that the Governor was come. On attempting to use John Pompsire, "one of the best and discreetest of the Jersey Indians," as interpreter, the king objected, and signified as his choice Indian Benjamin, "an impudent, forward youth who had enlisted in the Jersey companies and afterwards deserted, going over to the enemy at Diahoga." Upon this Pompsire declared he would not be concerned in interpreting if Benjamin were allowed to speak. He carried his point, and subsequently became the king's favorite interpreter.

After the treaty Teedyuscung loitered for a while at Fort Allen. Aug. 17, 1756, he returned to Bethlehem with a few of his associates, for the twofold purpose of enticing his niece Theodora away and of prevailing with the Christian Indians to accompany him to Diahoga; he set out the next day for the fort without having accomplished his object. On the 21st his wife and children arrived. The king, they stated, had gone to the Minisink to arrest his Indians in their depredations in that quarter.†

Monday, Nov. 8, 1756, the second treaty with Teedyuscung was opened at Easton. Besides the Governor, William Logan, and Richard Peters, of his council, there were present, of the commissioners, Benjamin Franklin, Joseph Fox, William Masters, and John Hughes; of the officers of the Pennsylvania provincial forces, Lieut.-Col. Weisser, Maj. Parsons, Capt. Withershold, Capt. John Van Etten, and Capt. Reynolds; several other officers and a large number of gentlemen and citizens from New Jersey and Philadelphia. Teedyuscung was attended by sixteen of his nation, four Indians of the Six Nations, two Shawanese, and six Mohicans. John Pompsire was interpreter. The king opened the conference by stating that he had kept the promise made by him at the last treaty, having since then informed all the Indian nations of the disposition of the English for peace. On being asked by the Governor of Pennsylvania whether he, the Governor, or the province had ever wronged him, and why he and his Indians had struck the English, the chief proceeded to state that the false-hearted French king had tampered with the foolish-hearted young men of his people, but chiefly they had taken up the hatchet because the English had defrauded them of their land. "I have not far to go for an instance," continued the speaker: "this very ground that is under me" (striking it with his foot) "was my land and my inheritance, and is taken from me by fraud. I mean all the land lying between Tobiccon Creek" (a stream heading near Quakertown and emptying into the Delaware fifteen miles east of that place) "and Wyoming." The Governor hereupon offering him redress, Teedyuscung closed the conference by stating that he was not empowered to accept it; that he would meet the Governor at some future time; and then he would lay before him the extent of his grievances, and they could treat for a settlement of all disagreements and for a lasting peace.

This opportunity came at the third treaty of Easton, July 27 to Aug. 7, 1757. Teedyuscung having demanded a secretary to take down the minutes for his revision, the demand was reluctantly granted him, and he chose Charles Thomson, "master of the public Quaker school in the city of Philadelphia,"—the same Thomson who was afterward secretary of Congress and author of the "Enquiry," in which he calmly and truthfully sets forth the injustice of the treatment of the Delawares in the land transaction of 1737. After an exchange of the compliments usually preliminary to business on such occasions, and the utterances of mutual assurances of regret for the past and good hopes for the future, the king stated that the purchase of lands by the proprietaries from Indians who had no right to sell, and their fraudulent measurement subsequently, whether by miles or by hour's walk, had provoked the war. This charge he demanded should be closely investigated, and, on evidence appearing that injury had been done to the Indians, they should have redress. "In that case," he said, "I will speak with a loud voice, and the nations shall hear me." Hereupon he stated his purpose to settle with his countrymen in Wyoming, adding that he would build a town there such as the white men build, and provide for the introduction of the Christian religion among his countrymen and for the education of their children. In conclusion, he demanded that the deeds by which the lands in dispute were held should be produced, that they be publicly read, and that copies be laid before King George and published to all the provinces under his government. "What is fairly bought and paid for," he went on to say, "I make no further demand about; but if any lands have been bought of Indians to whom these lands did not belong, and who had no right to sell them, I expect satisfaction for these lands. And if the proprietaries have taken in more lands than they bought of true owners, I expect likewise to be paid for that. But, as the persons to whom the proprietaries may have sold these lands, which of right belonged to me, have made some settlements, I do not want to disturb them or to force them to leave them, but expect full satisfaction will be made to the true owners for these lands, though the proprietaries, as I said before, might have bought them from persons who had no right to sell them."

After some hesitation on the part of the province,—in consequence of difference of opinion as to the propriety of complying with the Delaware's request, in as far as Sir William Johnson had been commissioned by royal appointment to hear the particulars of the charge brought against the proprietaries and the proprietaries' defense, and in consequence of Teedyuscung's reluctance to treat with the baronet and his Indians, some of whom, he said, were parties to the unauthorized sale of lands,—the deeds relating to the purchase north of the Tobiccon were produced and read. Agreeably to his request, furthermore, copies of them were promised him to dispatch to Sir William Johnson, to be transmitted by the latter to King George for his determination. Upon this the Delaware rose to his feet, and, taking up two belts tied together, spoke as follows: "I desire you would with attention hear me. By these two belts I will let you know what was the ancient method of confirming a lasting peace. This you ought to have considered, and to have done; but I will put you in mind. You may remember when you took hold of my hand and led me down, and invited my uncles (several of whom are present), with some from each of the Ten Nations, when we had agreed, we came down to take hold of one of your hands, and my uncles came to take hold of your other hand. Now, as this day and this time are appointed to meet and confirm a lasting peace, we,—that is, I and my uncles, as we stand, and you, as you stand, in the name of the great king, three of us standing,—we will all look up, and by continuing to observe the agreements by which we shall oblige ourselves one to another we shall see the clear light, and friendship shall last to us, and to our posterity after us forever. Now, as I have two belts, and witnesses are present who will speak the same by these belts, brothers, in the presence of the Ten Nations, who are witnesses, I lay hold of your hand" (taking the Governor by the hand), "and brighten the chain of friendship that shall be lasting, and whatever conditions may be proper for us to agree to may be mentioned afterwards. This is the time to declare our mutual friendship. Now, brother the Governor, to confirm what I have said, I have given you my hand, which you were pleased to rise and take hold of. I leave it with you. When you please I am ready, brother, if you have anything to say as a token of confirming the peace, I shall be ready to hear, and, as you rose, I will rise up and lay hold of your hand. To confirm what I have said I give you these belts."

"We now rise and take you into our arms," replied the Governor, "and embrace you with the greatest pleasure as our friends and brethren, and heartily desire that we may ever hereafter look on one another as brethren and children of the same parents. As a confirmation of this we give you the belts." Gave a very large white belt, with the figures of three men upon it, representing His Majesty King George taking hold of the king of the Five Nations with one hand, and Teedyuscung, the Delaware king, with the other, and marked with the following letters: "G. R., 5 N., D. K.," for "King George, Five Nations, Delaware King."^{*}

By the request of Teedyuscung, he was permitted to spend the winter of 1757-58 at Bethlehem. Reichel gives the following account of his sojourn in that place: "He accordingly had a lodge built him near 'The Crown.' Here he held court, and here he gave audience to all the wild embassies that would come from the Indian country, from the land of the implacable Monsey, from the gates of Diahoga, and from the ultimate dim Thule of the Alleghany or Ohio country. Occasionally he would repair to Philadelphia or to the fort to confer with the Governor or with the commandant on the progress of the work of peace he was apparently solicitous of consummating without delay. Thus the dark winter months passed; and when the swelling maple-buds and the whitening of the shad-bush on the river's bank foretold the advent of spring, there was busy preparation going on in Teedyuscung's company over the water for their long-expected removal to the Indian El Dorado on the flats of the Winding River."

In the spring of 1758, "Teedyuscung's town" was finished; it stood a little below the site of Wilkesbarre. Scull's map of 1759 notes it as "Wioming." Early in 1758 he removed to this town, which, agreeably to his request and the conditions of treaty, had been built for him and his followers by the English in the historic valley of Wyoming, on the east side of the Susquehanna. Here he lived not unmindful of his long-cherished object, and here he was burned to death on the night of April 19, 1763, while asleep in his lodge.

The Iroquois, it is said, were the instigators of this cowardly act, for they hated the man who testified against their arrogant assumption and opposed their lust of power. "As long as he lived he was a standing rebuke to their designing oppression, and, although they no longer dreaded his arms, they feared his words, which left their guilty consciences no peace." Hence it was resolved in council that he ought not to live; and when news was brought back to Onondaga that the lodge of the Delaware king and the lodges of his men of war had disappeared in flames, the perfidious Six Nations triumphed in having destroyed an enemy whose spirit they had failed to subdue."

Teedyuscung had three sons, Amos, the eldest, Kesmitas, and John Jacob. The first, Tachogankhelle, was baptized at Gnadenhütten by Bishop Cammerhoff, Dec. 14, 1750. He was then twenty-two years of age. His wife, Pingtis, a sister of Agnes Post, was baptized the same day, and received the name of Justina. She was a Jersey Delaware.

CHAPTER VII.

PARTITION-LINE BETWEEN EAST AND WEST JERSEY.

I.—ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NORTH STATION-POINT.

THE settlement known as the Quintipartite Agreement, whereby the province of New Jersey was separated into its eastern and western divisions by its proprietors, on the first day of July, 1676, was ratified and confirmed by an act of the Legislature passed on March 27, 1719. This agreement and act established the division-line between the two sections of the province upon what was subsequently known as Lawrence's line, although this line was not actually run out till 1743, when John Lawrence was employed to survey it under the direction of the proprietors of East Jersey.

Soon after the passage of the act of 1719 commissioners appointed by royal patent proceeded to ascertain and determine the northern station-point described in the grant of the Duke of York, at which, according to the Quintipartite Agreement, the divisional line from the east side of Little Egg Harbor was to terminate on the Delaware in latitude forty-one degrees and forty minutes. The manner in which this duty was performed by the commissioners and surveyors-general is shown by the following document, called

"THE TRIPARTITE DEED.

"THIS INDENTURE Tripartite, made the twenty-fifth day of July, in the fifth year of the reign of George, over Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, etc., Anno Domini, 1719, between Robert Walter, of the City and province of New York; Isaac Hicks, of Queen's County, in the said province, Esq.; Alain Jarret, of the City and province aforesaid, Esq., surveyor for, and in behalf of, the said province of New York, of the first part; John Johnson, and George Willocks, of the Eastern division of the province of New Jersey, Esq., and James Alexander, surveyor-general of the said Eastern division, of the second part; and Joseph Kirkbide and John Beading, of the Western division of the said province, and James Alexander, surveyor-general of the said Western division, of the third part: Whereas His said Majesty, the King, by Letters Patent under the great seal of the Province of New York, did Commissionate, authorize and appoint the said Robert Walter and Isaac Hicks Commissioners, and Alain Jarret surveyor of the province of New York; that the said Commissioners and surveyor, or surveyors, appointed, or to be appointed, upon the part or behalf of the province of New Jersey, carefully and diligently inspect and survey all such of the streams of waters that form the river Delaware, which they, the said Commissioners, or the surveyor, or surveyors, may esteem necessary to be inspected or surveyed; in order to find out and determine which of the streams is the Northernmost branch of Delaware river, and that then, when such branch is so discovered, the surveyor, or surveyors, according to the best of their knowledge and understanding, discover and find out that place of the said Northernmost branch of Delaware River that lies in the latitude of 41 degrees and 40 minutes, which is the North partition point of New York and New Jersey; and for the better preserving and perpetuating the knowledge of the said partition point, the said Commissioners and surveyors, by the said Letters Patent are required to take notice of the most remarkable and conspicuous places near to the said North partition point, whether they be rocks, hills, gullies, ponds, runs, or streams of water; and observe upon what course and distance such remarkable places bear from the said North partition point; all which the said commissioners are required by the said Letters Patent distinctly to certify under their hands and seals, unto the governor, or commander in chief of the province of New York, to be filed and recorded in the secretary's office of the said province of New York: All which by the Letters Patent, bearing date the first day of May, in the fifth year of his said Majesty's reign, and in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and nineteen, and remaining upon the records of the said province of New York, may more fully and at large appear: And whereas his said Majesty by other Letters Patent under the great seal of the province of New Jersey, did commissionate and appoint the said John Johnson and George Willcocks Commissioners for the Eastern division of the said province of New Jersey, Joseph Kirkbride and John Reading commissioners for the Western division of New Jersey, and James Alexander, surveyor-general of both divisions of the province of New Jersey aforesaid; in conjunction with the Commissioners and surveyor or surveyors appointed, or to be appointed, upon the part and behalf of the said province of New York; that they the said commissioners and surveyors carefully and diligently inspect and survey all or such of the streams of water that form the said river Delaware, which they the said Commissioners, or surveyor, or surveyors, may esteem necessary to be inspected or surveyed, in order to find out and determine which of the streams of water is the Northernmost branch of the said river, and that then when such branch is so discovered, the said surveyor or surveyors carefully, according to their best knowledge and understanding, discover and find out that place of the said Northernmost branch of Delaware river that lies in the latitude of 41 degrees and 40 minutes; which is the North partition of New Jersey aforesaid, and the point, as well, of the line of partition or division between the Eastern and Western division, as that place where the line of partition or division between New York and New Jersey terminates; and for the better perpetuating and preserving the knowledge of the said North partition point, the said Commissioners and surveyors for the province of New Jersey are required by the said Letters Patent to take notice of the most remarkable and conspicuous places near to the said North partition point, whether they be rocks, hills, gullies, ponds, runs, or streams of water; and observe on what course and distances such remarkable places bear from the North partition point; all which the said Commissioners and surveyors are further required as aforesaid, distinctly to certify under their hands and seals unto the governor or Commander in Chief of the province of New Jersey aforesaid, to be filed and recorded in the secretary's office thereof; all which by the said last recited Letters Patent, bearing date the last day of March, in the fifth year of his Majesty's reign, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and nineteen, and remaining upon the public records of the said province of New Jersey, may fully and at large appear.

"Now this Indenture witnesseth, that the said Commissioners and surveyors, as well upon the part and behalf of the province of New York as upon the part and behalf of the province of New Jersey, in pursuance of the trust reposed in them by the several and above recited Letters Patent, under the great seals of the respective provinces of New York and New Jersey; having carefully and diligently inspected and informed themselves which of the several and respective branches of the said river of Delaware is the Northernmost branch thereof, do find, and therefore by these presents do certify, and declare, that that stream or river which is commonly called or known by the name of the Fishkill is the Northernmost branch of the said river Delaware: And further, that they the said Commissioners and Surveyors, according to the best of their knowledge and information, do esteem and believe the said Fishkill to be the biggest and deepest stream that forms the said river Delaware: And whereas the said Allain Jarret and James Alexander having taken repeated observations, as well along adjoining to the said Fishkill, or the Northernmost branch of the Delaware river, as in sundry other places, in order to discover that place in said Northernmost branch that lies in the latitude of 41 degrees and forty minutes; and that they the said surveyors, according to the best of their skill and understanding, having discovered the same to be upon that place of the said Fishkill, or Northernmost branch of the Delaware aforesaid; therefore they the said commissioners and surveyors do certify by these presents, to all whom it may concern, that the said North partition, or division point, upon the Northernmost branch of the river Delaware, between the provinces of New York and New Jersey (which likewise is the North partition point between the Eastern and Western divisions of New Jersey) the latitude of 41 degrees and 40 minutes, upon the East side of the said Fishkill branch, is upon the low land in the Indian town called Casheigtouch; which Indian town is distant from Thomas Swartwout's house, at a place known by the name of Pinpeck, near to Mahackamack river; 29 miles and a quarter, upon a straight course, North 44 degrees 20 minutes West, by the magnetic position; or a course North 52 degrees 20 minutes West, by the true position, from John Dicker's house, at the place called Tetendal, by said Mahackamack river, about 29 miles and three-quarters, upon a course North 35 degrees West, by the magnetic position; or upon a course North 43 degrees West, by the true position, and upon the several courses by the Indian paths, from said Dicker's about 35 miles and a half; which point of intersection of the latitude of 41 degrees and 40 minutes upon the said Fishkill, or Northernmost branch of the river Delaware, is distant 38 chains (reckoning four perches to a chain) from the mouth of a brook known by the Indian name of Lamackamuck, and at all times coming to be called or known by the name of Station Brook; which falls from the hills at the entering in of the Indian paths to the said town, Casheigtouch, upon a course nearly North 5 degrees 45 minutes West, by the magnetic position; and upon a course North 13 degrees 45 minutes West, by the true position; which point of intersection is 89 chains and a half, reckoning four perches to a chain, from a large stone or rock, the greatest length of its superficies being about eleven feet and three inches, and its broadest part about seven feet three inches; lying partly in and partly out of the water upon the bank of the said branch called Fishkill; upon a course South 10 degrees 45 minutes East, by the true position; which stone is marked with the letter M, and is 137 chains distant from the mouth of the said brook, upon a course North 78 degrees 40 minutes East, by the true position; at which stone or rock the lowland ends, and the hills come close to the said branch or river Fishkill; the courses and situation of the said brook, and of the said river and hill, from the said brook to the stone aforesaid, will better appear by the draught to these presents annexed: In testimony whereof the said parties to these indentures have put their hands and seals, the day and year first above mentioned

II.—ACTION OF THE COMMISSIONERS FULLY APPROVED.

The year following the establishment of the north station-point by the commissioners and surveyors,—viz., April 9, 1720,—their action was fully concurred in and ratified by the proprietors of West Jersey, as the following extract from the minutes of their proceedings of that date will attest:

"The managers appointed by law for the running and ascertaining the division-line between the Eastern and Western divisions of this province—viz., Isaac Sharp, James Logan, Thomas Lambert, and John Reading—met this day with the Council, and agreed with them that the whole sum of five hundred pounds (mentioned in a former minute, made the sixth of May last) be forthwith raised, in order for the prosecuting of the said affair according as the law directs, with all expedition, for which an advertisement is prepared, signed by the said managers or Commissioners, and James Logan is desired to procure the same to be printed and published without delay. And whereas the Northern or Station-point upon Delaware was last year fixed by the Surveyor-general, Joseph Kirkbride, and John Rendling, appointed Commissioners by the governor under the great seal, which said point being fixed, there remains now on the part of this division only to run the partition-line between the Eastern and Western divisions of this province: In order thereto, it is agreed by the Commissioners that notice be given to the managers or Commissioners of the Eastern division of the resolutions of the managers of this division; and that they may be desired to agree on a certain day to meet the Western managers at Nathan Allen's, or Researcher's, to concert measures for the running of the said line, according to the tenor of the act; accordingly, a letter is wrote, subscribed by the managers, directed to the managers of the Eastern division, desiring them, with the surveyor-general, to meet them at Nathan Allen's on the 28th instant, which letter is delivered to David Lyel, one of the said Eastern managers, who happened to be here present; and all the managers and receivers are desired to use their utmost diligence in receiving or collecting all the moneys they can, according to the tenor of the said advertisement, and that each produce their accounts against the next meeting, in order to have a general account framed for the last year according to the direction of the said act."

III.—SURVEY OF THE PARTITION-LINE.

Although the West Jersey proprietors were anxious at this time to participate in running the partition-line, it appears that they were not able to raise the necessary funds, and so let the matter drop, paying only their proportion of the expense of establishing the north station-point. After many years of delay the East Jersey proprietors assumed the responsibility, and in 1743, through their commissioners, Andrew Johnson and John Hamilton, employed John Lawrence to run the division-line. The following is a copy of Mr. Lawrence's commission:

"WHEREAS by an act of the General Assembly of the province of New York, passed in the fifth year of the reign of King George the First, John Hamilton and David Lyel, George Willcocks and John Harrison, and the survivor of them, were appointed Commissioners or managers for the Eastern division of New Jersey, with power to appoint the surveyor-general, and such other surveyors and fit able persons as should be judged necessary for running the partition-line between the Eastern and Western divisions of New Jersey: And whereas the said John Hamilton is the only surviving Commissioner appointed by the said act; and whereas the said act gives power to the governor for the time being to appoint other persons in the place of such of the Commissioners aforesaid as should refuse to serve or should die; and by virtue of that power Andrew Johnson, Esq., has been appointed a Commissioner; we therefore the said John Hamilton and Andrew Johnson (by virtue of the power vested in us) as aforesaid, and by and with the advice of the council of proprietors of the Eastern division, have appointed John Lawrence, deputy-surveyor, upon oath, to run, mark, fix and ascertain the said partition-line, pursuant to the said act of Assembly, and to make return thereof to us with all convenient expedition; with power to him to employ and chuse fit and able persons, upon oath, to assist him in running the said partition-line, and marking and raising monuments on the same; and in performing the said work he is to observe the instructions herewith delivered to him.

"Given under our hands and seals at Perth Amboy, the 26th of August, 1743.

"ANDREW JOHNSON [L.S.].

"JOHN HAMILTON [L.S.]"

The following is a copy of the oath taken by Mr. Lawrence before a magistrate:

"I will well and truly execute the within Commission to the best of my skill, judgment, and knowledge.

"So help me God.

"JOHN LAWRENCE."

From the instructions accompanying the commission we make the following extracts, certified as a correct copy:

"1st. With this you will receive a Commission to you for running the partition-line between East and West Jersey, to the execution of which you will be sworn, as in the draft of the oath on the back thereof.

"2d. You are to employ Martin Ryerson, or Gershom Mott, or some other, as an assistant surveyor, if you think proper; and also proper chain-bearers and markers; all which are to be sworn, or affirmed, truly to perform the office you employ them in, and to have a certificate of those oaths or affirmations indorsed on the back of your signed by the magistrate who administers the oath or affirmatⁿ to them, before you proceed to the work. Only in case when you are on the work, by reason of sickness or otherwise you find occasion to employ more or other persons than at first you intended, you may proceed with them (till you come near the habitation of a magistrate, and then cause them to be sworn or affirmed before him, that they have hitherto well and truly executed, and that they will well and truly execute, the office you have employed them in to the best of their knowledge: And you are to direct the chain-bearers in chusing to hold the stake they are next to put in the ground in the same hand with the chain, and within three or four inches of the end that they are to push in the ground, and stretch the chain at setting it in the ground, and to direct the marker to mark the trees, as shall hereafter be mentioned.

"The foregoing are true copies and extracts:

"JAMES PARKER."

In running the partition-line, Mr. Lawrence started at the designated point on the east side of Little Egg Harbor, and ran a random line to the north station-point, at Cocheaton. He then found the station-point established and marked by the commissioners in 1719, and, taking his bearing, returned, making his corrections and marking the true line southward to the place of beginning. We take a few extracts from his field-book while running the line through Sussex County.

["Extracts from the original field-book of John Lawrence taken 22d August, 1841, during the progress of a trial between Ira Fuller and Jonathan Oliver. The extracts commence near the Musconetcong, on the random line, and continue to the Delaware. Also the return line from the Delaware River to the Musconetcong."]—By Mr. D. Ryerson.]

RANDOM LINE, }

- 94 M^s.—A Red Oak abt 2 feet diameter on the N. side of the mountain near the foot on the S. side of Musconetcong river, at 59 ch. The river about 75 L. wide, bears abt N. 50 E. At 70 the top of a high hill.
- 95 A White Oak abt 9 inches diameter; the ground descends Westward; at 48 ch. a small brook, running Eastward; at 52 an Indian Wigwam 1 ch. East.
- 96 A Red Oak abt 18 inches Diameter, 11 L. Westward on a hill; the ground descends N. ward.
- 97 A Red Oak abt 1½ foot diameter. The ground descends part Northernly and part N. Easterly. At 37 a Grass Pond 6 ch. wide and abt 40 long; bears abt N. E.; an old beaver dam abt 10 ch. below; S. W. a branch of Pequest called Alamoche.
- 98 A Red Oak in a small plain abt 16 inches diameter, 60 L. East of the line, At 67 a branch of Pequest, runs abt W. and abt 30 L. wide.
- 99 A White Oak stake in a plain on the N. side of a large branch of Pequest. At 16 ch the N. edge of a plain, the Mountain begins.
- 100 An Ash Saplin abt 4 L. diameter, on the N. side of some low swampy ground. Left off and went to a house belonging to Richard Green.

OCT. 10th, 1743.

At 60 ch. a bog meadow abt 10 ch. wide and 80 ch. long; bore about W. A neck of land about 10 ch. wide; the point seemed to be about 10 ch. West.

* The numbers in the margin represent miles from the southern point at Little Egg Harbor. The chains mentioned in the lines are so many chains, or eightieth parts of a mile, over the last mile figure represented in the margin, or so many chains of the next mile run.

- 101 A Maple standing in a large swamp on the South side about 10 inches diameter. At 10 a brook about 25 L. wide; at 23, the N. side of the meadow, a White Oak under the edge of the hill.
- 102 A White Oak ab't 12 inches diameter. The ground descends N. Easterly.
- 103 A Black Oak ab't 14 inches diameter, and 20 ch. S. Easterly on the edge of a hill, on the N. side of a swamp. At 65 ch. a round about 5 ch. East. At 74 ch. a notch in the mountain. Bore N. 88° W. the last half mile. Good Land.
- 104 A Spanish Oak ab't 18 inches diameter near the foot of a very steep hill; the ground descends Northerly. At 58 ch. a branch of Tockhockanetconk (Paulinskil) about 6 foot wide; bears ab't West; crossed it about $\frac{1}{2}$ ch. E. of a large spruce pine. At 67 Tockhockanetconk about 70 L. wide. Bore S. W.
- 105 A White Oak ab't $1\frac{1}{2}$ foot diameter. The ground descend East-erly—steep.
- 106 A White Oak Saplin about 5 In. diameter, 4 ch. S. of a large pond of water, by estimation 100 Acres.*

7 S. 78 W. 4.
8 N. 66 W. 36.
9 S. 86, W. 53 to the line

- 107 In the aforesaid Pond.
- 108 A Black Oak ab't $1\frac{1}{2}$ foot diameter, 1 ch. S., the ground southerly; at 45 a Red Oak saplin marked E. & W. with a blaze and 3 notches, done this summer. At 61 a small brook, runs S. Easterly. Pretty good swamp.
- 109 A White Oak ab't 10 Inches diameter; the ground descends S. Easterly. At 15 a brook about 6 feet wide. Bore about S.S.E.
- 110 A Red Oak ab't 2 feet diameter. At 41 a small log on the N. side 9 ch. above. Now we begin to ascend the Pahaqualin Mountain; it bore S. 28 W. At 70 a very steep ascent—a mere body of rocks.
- 111 A crooked Spani-h Oak among the steep rocks the southerly side of the mountain.
- 112 A Spanish Oak on the Northerly side of the mountain, about 3 inches diameter, 18 foot westward of the mile end.
- 113 A pine tree 1 foot diameter $1\frac{1}{4}$ ch. southward. At 20 links Eastward the ground descends N. Easterly. At $12\frac{1}{2}$ a brook 40 links wide, ab't S. 80 W. Good low Lands, 10 or 12 ch. wide on the N. side of brook.
- 114 An Ash ab't 6 In. diameter standing in a small gully. At 58 ch. Delaware River. Bore about S. 85 W., 5 ch. wide. At the bank on Delaware a Black Oak ab't 15 Inches diameter, leaning over the river, marked 114 and 58 ch.; stands 10 L. W. of the river. In Pa Hendrick Van Gorder's house about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile, and Abram Cavanaugh's the place where the line comes to the river on the south side; at 114, 75 ch. Bower Decker's house. Bore E. 30 L. Continued 150½ miles to Station Point, near Cochecon on Delaware."

TRUE LINE }

- Began where the random line crossed Delaware River at the end of 114 m. 58 ch., thence run a perpendicular N. $89\frac{1}{4}$ E. 69, 10 L. to the true line. Course N. 9, 19 W. 22 ch. The 115th mile an Elm about 1 foot diameter in a small lousy gully. Running S. 9, 19 E. 66 ch. from the 115th mile. Flatbrook about 50 Ls. wide, a pleasant stream; course S. 9, 19 E.
- 114 A forked White Oak about 3 feet diameter, 14 ch. southerly of Flatbrook in the low lands on the Northerly side of the Pahaqualin Mountain.
- 113 A pine ab't 1 foot diameter, 45 Ls. west of the line on Northerly side of the mountain.
- 112 A Spani-h Oak ab't 1 foot diameter, on the Northerly side of the mountain.

* Swartwood Pond.

† This refers to the distance from Little Egg Harbor. Hence Cochecon, or the north station-point, is 36 miles above where the Lawrence line strikes the Delaware River.

- 111 In the edge of a pond on the S. side of the mountain.
- 110 A hickory about 9 In. diameter, 20 Ls. W. of the line. At 67 a large Spanish Oak marked with a blaze and 3 notches; supposed to be a corner tree of a survey made ab't 2 years ago—ab't 3 feet diameter.
- 109 A hickory about 9 Inches diameter; about 15 Ls. West a heap of stones at the mile end. At $74\frac{1}{2}$ two Beach trees marked in line, the E. side of a run of water.
- 108 A White Oak ab't 1 foot diameter. Ground descends N.W.
- 107 In a large Pond. (Saturday laid by—very rainy, some snow.)

OCTOBER 23d, 1743.

- 106 Offset from White Oak saplin in the random line aforesaid 63.34 to a Black Oak ab't $1\frac{1}{2}$ foot diameter, 25 lin. Southwardly of the end, with a store at the foot of it. At 63 good land about 8 ch. wide upon Tockhockanetconk (Paulinskil). At $65\frac{1}{2}$ the brook—two dogwoods 5 In. diameter, growing from one rock marked for side lines; on the N. side brook crooks.
- 105 A White Oak about 2 feet diameter, on the hill on S. side of Tockhockanetconk ab't 14 ch. Valley about 4 chains wide. Good land on a branch. At 40 another valley—tolerable good land Eastward of the line.
- 104 A Spanish Oak ab't $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet diameter. Ground descends steep Northerly 75 Ls. S. E. of mile end. At 14 ch. a small run of water; at 50 a red oak marked, on top of the hill in the line. Last half mile good land.
- 103 A hickory ab't 8 In. diameter. Ground descends Southerly.
- 102 A heap of stones on a cluster of rocks on the Westerly side of a hill. A White Oak ab't 8 In. diameter about 18 Ls. Westerly of the stones. At 60 a brook about $\frac{1}{2}$ ch. wide issuing from Pquest spring through the meadow—said spring about 20 ch. W. and said brook about 5 ch. above the meeting of another brook near as big—very difficult to get over.
- 101 A White Oak ab't 12 In. diameter on the edge of a hill of limestone.
- 100 A White Oak ab't 1 foot diameter, 6 feet S. W. of a heap of stones at the mile end. At 58 Pequest, 50 Ls. wide. N. B.—the last half run through Robert Chapman's land.
- 99 A hickory ab't 16 In. diameter on the S. by E. side of a large rock 2 ch. Westward of the mile end.
98. A hickory ab't 16 In. diameter, 2 ch. Northerly of a heap of stones. At 20 ch. the brook Alamuche.

It will not be necessary to follow these field-notes farther, as nothing of greater interest than the mile-marks occur in the remaining few miles of the line through Sussex County. The surveyor records the fact that "every mile the true line inclines towards the random line $60\frac{23}{100}$ links." The line-trees in the random line were marked with three notches on two sides. The side-trees were marked with one blaze looking towards the lines. The mile-trees were marked respectively with the number of each mile and with three notches on four sides. The course of the line is $9^{\circ} 45'$ west, according to the magnetic position.

IV.—TRANSFER OF ESTATES FROM EAST TO WEST JERSEY.

The effect of the establishment of the partition-line between the eastern and western divisions of New Jersey was to unsettle many titles to lands which had previously been given by the respective proprietors. Many grants made by the West Jersey proprietors were found to be in East Jersey, and vice versa. It was, however, mutually agreed that in such instances equivalents should be given to the owners out of any of the unsurveyed lands on the other side of the partition-line, and this became to be carried into effect soon after the Lawrence line was surveyed. The minutes of the proceedings of the proprietors about with instances of such transfers, a few examples of which we give from the West Jersey records, relating chiefly to Sussex County :

" FEBRUARY 17, 1745.

" Whereas, information was given to this board by John Reading, deputy surveyor, that two surveys formerly made by him, the one for Samuel Nevill, of 1700 acres; the other for Joseph Sacket, of 500 acres, happen to fall on the East side of the line run by John Lawrence for the division-line of this province; therefore craves leave to relocate the like quantity of land in some other place of the said Western division.

" Granted accordingly."

" AUGUST 3, 1749.

" Information being given to this board by John Reading, Esq., that the line run by John Lawrence cuts off a tract of land formerly surveyed to Thomas Lambert, deceased, from the Western division; for which reason the devisees crave leave to relocate in some other part of the said division the quantity of — acres in lieu thereof.

" Leave granted accordingly."

" AUGUST 7, 1752.

" Thomas Wetherill applied to this board for a warrant to take up 25 acres of land, in lieu of 25 acres, being the one-fourth of 100 acres surveyed to Thomas Wetherill, Isaac De Cow, John Lyon, and Gershom Mott, which by the running of the line between East and West Jersey by John Lawrence, lies on the East side. John Reading, Esq., assured this board that the above 25 acres did fall to the East side of said line; therefore a warrant was ordered, which was granted accordingly."

" FEBRUARY 1, 1757.

" Joshua Opilko laid before this board one survey of 140 acres, made by Samuel Green for said Joshua Opilko, situate in the County of Sussex, and is recorded in B. B. 212, 213, which appears on the East side of the true Quintipartite line run by John Lawrence; 73 acres of which he has since purchased an East Jersey proprietary right (to) and laid; therefore craves a warrant to locate the same 140 acres elsewhere; and a warrant was granted accordingly."

" FEBRUARY 4, 1762.

" The agent of the London Company, by John Beaumont, applied to this board for a warrant to relocate the quantity of 150 acres, in part of 168 acres that were formerly surveyed to the said Company in the Counties of Sussex and Morris; which said land was laid out to said Company some time in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty, and recorded in the Surveyor-general's office, in Lib. M. fol. 284, and upon the report of John Rockhill, deputy-surveyor, it appears that 150 acres, part thereof lieth to the Eastward of the Quintipartite line; therefore it is ordered that a warrant issue from this board to the said Company, by the directions of their agents, for to relocate the said quantity of 150 acres. A warrant was ordered, which was granted accordingly."

We also take the following extracts from the warrants and surveys of the West Jersey proprietors :

" Extract from 158 acres surveyed for John Hackett, the return whereof is dated 10th of March, 1759, beginning at a stone corner, it being the South East Corner of a tract of land containing 400 acres, and is surveyed for the said John Hackett and stands near or in the division-line late run by John Lawrence from thence, &c. Witness my hand the 12th day of September, 1759. 59

V.—MOVEMENT FOR A NEW PARTITION-LINE.

Up to the time of the settlement of the boundary-line between New Jersey and New York, in 1772, the quintipartite division of New Jersey was accepted and acquiesced in by the proprietors of both the eastern and the western sections. In a petition presented to Governor Burnett, in August, 1725, the proprietors of West Jersey say, "That it is only by force of this agreement and partition, executed as aforesaid, that the proprietors of the Western division are limited to the Western part of the said province, on the side of the Delaware; and that the proprietors of the Eastern division are limited to the eastern part of the said province towards Hudson's river and the sea; for had no such division been agreed on, as is recited in all the respective deeds of conveyance to the proprietors, those of the Western division might with an equal right have claimed the lands towards Amboy, etc., and those of the Eastern might have claimed the lands towards Burlington. But the said Quintipartite indenture being executed as aforesaid, before the sales to the proprietors were made and recited in all the deeds of conveyance, became an absolute limitation, so that neither on the one part nor the other any purchaser could claim otherwise than according to that limitation, by which their lands were actually conveyed.

"That notwithstanding this legal, clear, and absolute partition, which is binding on every proprietor of the Eastern division, and at least on all the ninth parts of the Western division, sold by Edward Byllynge, or his trustees, and from which those who are skilled in law well know it is impossible legally to recede without the joint concurrence of every individual interested in the purchases made under Edward Byllynge and trustees, and under Sir George Carteret; for it is well known that no majority without the whole will in those cases determine the point; yet there have been some persons found from time to time who, on partial views to themselves, have labored to introduce some other sort of division, and considerable numbers have been so far unhappily imposed upon as to imagine a change thereof might be practicable; from which unfortunate deception attempts have been made to alter it, and some lines for that purpose have been run and settlements thereupon made without due regard to the bounds of the respective divisions, which introduced such confusion that the value of lands near the boundaries have been much lessened and the people discouraged from making improvements, where the right to the soil itself was liable to be questioned as not lying within the division under which it was purchased."

The petition from which the above extracts are taken is signed by "John Ladd, for himself and Col.

John Allford; John Budd, for himself and Boulton; John Kay, William Cooper, Francis Rawle, Jr., Charles Brogden, Samuel Lippincott, John Snowden, Jr., Isaac De Cow, for himself and Samuel Barker; Matthew Gardiner, Isaac Pearson, William Panceoast, William Biles, Isaac Watson, William Rawle, Thomas Sharp, for himself and John Dennis; John Estaugh, for the London Company; John and William Dimsdale, Peter Rich, Benjamin Hopkins and self; William Bidle, Hugh Sharp, Henry Hodge, Robert Rawle, George Budd; James Logan, for proprietors,—William Penn's family, 12; John Bellers, 1; Amos Stuttle, 1; myself, one-third; Richard, for Nath. Stanbury; Mary Willson."

No formidable effort was made to change the Lawrence line for fifty years, or until after the boundary-line between New Jersey and New York had been settled. This line, as will appear in another chapter,* was established, not at the north station-point, as ascertained and defined in the tripartite indenture agreed upon by the commissioners both of New York and New Jersey, and in accordance with the express stipulation of the original grant of the Duke of York, but was brought down to the present termination of the State line on the Delaware at Carpenter's Point, taking off from New Jersey over two hundred thousand acres of land. When this line became fixed, the proprietors of the western division of New Jersey began to agitate the question of changing the quintipartite or partition-line to correspond therewith, alleging that, at whatever point the boundary-line terminated on the Delaware, the partition-line should terminate there also. Hence originated the proposed line of 1775. In January of that year the proprietors of West Jersey presented a petition to His Excellency Governor Franklin and to the council and Assembly of New Jersey, praying that the partition-line so long established between the respective sections of the province might be changed. The petition set forth,—

"That in and by a certain deed of indenture Quintipartite, made the first day of July, Anno Dom. 1676, between Sir George Carteret, of the first part; William Penn, Esq., of the second part; Gawen Lawrie, of the third part; Nicholas Lucas, of the fourth part; and Edward Byllynge, of the fifth part, then sole owners and proprietors of the whole province of New Jersey; they the said Sir George Carteret, William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, Nicholas Lucas, and Edward Byllynge did agree to make a partition between them of the said province.

"That in pursuance of the said agreement, an actual partition of the said Province was made between the said proprietors, and mutually released to each other, viz.: One share or portion thereof to Sir George Carteret, called East New Jersey; and the other part thereof to the said William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, Nicholas Lucas, and Edward Byllynge, called West New Jersey; the line which said partition was by the said proprietors, parties to the said indenture Quintipartite, mutually understood, intended, agreed upon and fixed, to be a straight line, to run from the most Northernly point or boundary of the province of New Jersey, on the Northernmost branch of the river Delaware, unto the most Southernly point of the East side of a certain inlet, harbor, or bay, on the sea coast of the province of New Jersey, commonly called and known by the name of Little Egg Harbour."

After reciting briefly the history we have gone over in a former part of this chapter, the petitioners say,—

* Chapter XVII., on the "Boundary-Line Controversy."

"That your petitioners being the present owners and proprietors of the said Western division of New Jersey, under the aforesaid Byllynge and trustees; having long anxiously waited for an event whereby the true point of partition between the said divisions might be permanently fixed and determined, and which by the said last mentioned act, confirmed by his Majesty and Council, is now happily established, have frequently and pressingly made overtures and proposals to the proprietors of the Eastern division to have the said Quintipartite Line exactly and truly run. . . . Your petitioners therefore . . . do earnestly entreat the kind Interposition of the legislature of this province, and submit to their wisdom to frame and pass such a law for the final settlement of the said line. . . ."

This, on account of the Revolutionary war, was laid over, and was never acted upon by the Legislature. A petition of similar import and intent was presented to the Legislature in October, 1782, signed by Joseph Reed, for the West Jersey Society and himself; Jonathan D. Sergeant, Clement Biddle, Daniel Ellis, and Ebenezer Cowell, "a committee specially appointed to this service by the Western proprietors." The proprietors of East Jersey sent in a counter-memorial in June, 1783, setting forth the history of the Quintipartite Agreement and defending it as a final settlement of the partition-line in the words following:

"That Charles the Second, as King of England, was entitled to the continent of North America, from the north latitude of twenty-five degrees to sixty-seven and a half degrees, by virtue of the first discovery and subsequent possession thereof by subjects of the Crown of England, properly authorized; which right then was and always since has been universally acknowledged, and is the foundation of every title to land within this State.

"That Charles the Second, being so entitled, granted to his brother James, Duke of York, all that tract of country which now comprehends the States of New York and New Jersey.

"That the Duke of York, being so seized, did on the 24th of June, 1664, by proper deeds and assurances in law, grant and convey to John Lord Berkley and Sir George Carteret, their heirs and assigns forever, part of the said tract, lying and being to the Westward of New York Island, and bounded on the East by the main sea and Hudson's river, on the South by the ocean, on the West by Delaware bay and river, and extending Northward as far as the Northernmost branch of the said bay or river of Delaware, which is in 41 degrees and 40 minutes of latitude; and from thence in a straight line to Hudson's river, in 41 degrees of latitude; which said tract was afterwards known by the name of Nova Cesarea, or New Jersey.

"That Lord Berkley being so seized of an undivided moiety, or half part of New Jersey, did on the 18th of March, 1673, convey the same to John Fenwick in fee, in trust for Edward Byllynge; and that the said John Fenwick, on the 10th of March, 1674, did by the consent and direction of and in conjunction with the said Edward Byllynge, convey the said undivided moiety, or half part of New Jersey, unto William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, and Nicholas Lucas, in trust for the said Edward Byllynge, excepting and reserving a tenth part of the said undivided moiety to the said John Fenwick, his heirs and assigns, and that the said John Fenwick did convey the aforesaid tenth part of said undivided moiety unto John Eldridge and Edmund Warner, who afterwards conveyed the same unto the said William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, and Nicholas Lucas, the better to enable them, in conjunction with the said Edward Byllynge, to make partition of the entire province of New Jersey with Sir George Carteret.

"That William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, Nicholas Lucas, and Edward Byllynge, being thus seized of Lord Berkley's undivided moiety, or half part, entered into an agreement with Sir George Carteret for the partition of the whole tract, and accordingly a division was made and a line of partition settled by an indenture Quintipartite, dated the 1st of July, 1676, by which deed the parties thereto art expressly declaring that the said tract granted as aforesaid by the Duke of York, extends to the Northward as far as the Northernmost branch of the bay or river Delaware, which is in 41 degrees and 40 minutes of latitude, do determine that the line of partition shall be a straight line down from the most Northernly point, or boundary, on Delaware, of the said tract granted as aforesaid, to the most Southwardly point of the East side of Little Egg Harbour, and all the parts, shares, or portions of the said tract to the Eastward of the said line of partition, are by the said deed released, confirmed and conveyed unto the said Sir George Carteret; and in the same manner all the parts of the said tract to the Westward of the said line are released and confirmed unto the said William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, Nicholas Lucas, and Edward Byllynge.

"That the Quintipartite deed having fully established the division of the province, both Sir George Carteret and the Western proprietors contented themselves with knowing the position of the extreme points without removing the intermediate line, as there was little necessity for it at that time; few, if any, of the settlements or surveys extending so far back in the country as to render the exact track of the line necessary to be known.

"That on the 6th of August, 1680, the Duke of York did by grant confirm the province of West Jersey unto the said Edward Byllynge, William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, Nicholas Lucas, John Eldridge, and Edmund Warner, according to their several parts or portions, and by the said grant fixed the North bounds on the Northernmost branch of Delaware in the latitude of 41 degrees and 40 minutes, and reciting and referring to the Quintipartite deed gives the limits accordingly.

"That Sir George Carteret by his last will and testament divided his estate in New Jersey to certain trustees therein named, with directions to sell the same; that accordingly it was sold by them on the 2d of February, 1682, to William Penn and eleven others, each of whom shortly after sold a moiety of the same unto Robert Barclay and eleven others; which twenty-four persons constituted the general proprietors of East Jersey, and under whom by assent conveyances your memorialists and others the proprietors of East Jersey now hold.

"That on the 14th of March in the same year, 1682, the Duke of York, by grant, did also confirm the right of the said twenty-four persons, proprietors to East New Jersey, and in the same manner reciting the North bounds, fixes them as before on the Northernmost branch of Delaware, in latitude 41 degrees and 40 minutes, and referring to the Quintipartite deed, gives the same limits and bounds as are therein mentioned.

"That in process of time, the country being more populous and the settlements more numerous, much uneasiness was occasioned by reason of sundry vague and fruitless attempts for dividing the provinces of East and West Jersey, and running the line of partition; and also by reason of the precise spot not being ascertained where the North Station point in the latitude of 41 degrees and 40 minutes would; that to remedy these evils the legislature on the 27th of March, 1719, passed a law for the running and ascertaining of the said line, and for the preventing of any further disputes concerning the same; whereby after reciting and confirming the Quintipartite deed, commissioners or managers were appointed both from the Eastern and Western divisions for raising and collecting from the different proprietors, according to their shares of the property, such sums of money as should be deemed necessary for defraying the expense of finding the North station point upon Delaware and of running the necessary lines of partition."

The memorial then goes on to recite in brief the history which we have already given relating to the finding, marking, establishing, and recording the north station-point, the running of the Lawrence line therefrom to the designated point at Little Egg Harbor, in September and October, 1743, and its acceptance as an absolute settlement by the proprietors both of East and West Jersey. The memorialists then give the following interesting bit of history respecting the settlement of the boundary-line with New York:

"That the division-line between the provinces of New York and New Jersey remained a long time unsettled, by reason of the latitude of 41 degrees on Hudson's River not being properly ascertained; and also by reason of the zealous and violent pretensions of each party to the property and possessions of the other, whereby such disturbances arose and disorders were committed on the borders of both provinces as to demand the interposition of their respective legislatures whereupon in the year 1761 acts were passed in both provinces for settling the property of lands affected by the partition line to such a mode of decision as his Britannic Majesty should think proper.

"That in consequence of the said acts, his Britannic Majesty thought proper to appoint seven Commissioners for the determining of the said matters in dispute, who meeting at New York on the 16th of July, 1760, did determine that the boundary-line between the two provinces should be a straight and direct line from the mouth of Mahackamack, on its junction with the Fishkill, or Delaware, to the latitude of 41 degrees on Hindon's river.

"That the said controversy with New York then was deemed, as it always had been since the year 1719, only to affect the property of the proprietors of East Jersey and those holding under them: inasmuch that the then legislature, upon application made by the Eastern proprietors, refused to defray from the public treasury any part or portion of the expence of settling the said boundary-line; and the West Jersey proprietors thought themselves so little interested in the settling thereof that they even refused to join in the said application to the legislature, declaring that their stations were already fixed and that so they must remain; by which means the proprietors of East Jersey were solely burthened with the great charge and expence of settling the said boundary, and which amounted to more than the sum of six thousand pounds, although the expences of their opponents in the province of New York were defrayed by the public at large.

"That by the said determination and decree of the Commissioners at New York, the said boundary-line terminated on Delaware at a different place from the station agreed on in 1719, to the surprise and astonishment of many; though others endeavored to account for it by the Commissioners all being crown officers and some of them notoriously under its influence, and that this new station gave large tracts of land to the government of New York, to grant as it thought proper, and which it has since done.

"That the proprietors of East Jersey very much disapproved of the said alteration on Delaware River, but as they imagined, as they still do and always shall, that it only affected them with respect to the boundary with New York, they, after much dispute thereon, did on certain conditions acquiesce, knowing the little probability of better success in a future contest between private individuals on the one part and a royal government on the other.

"That the said alteration of the boundary on Delaware cut off from East Jersey near two hundred thousand acres of land,* which had always been esteemed part of New Jersey, in every transaction respecting the same, from the first grant thereof by the Duke of York to the late determination and decree; and that the East Jersey proprietors submitted to these losses and hardships, although very grievous and vexatious; hoping that thereby there would be a termination of a tedious, disagreeable, and expensive dispute, and that from thence forward they would enjoy peace and tranquility."

With regard to the new line of partition proposed by the western proprietors, the memorialists say,—

"That supposing the quantity of lands surveyed by the Western proprietors to the Eastward of the Quintipartite line, run by Lawrence, to be equal to the quantity surveyed by the Eastern proprietors to the Westward thereof, then, if a settlement was to take place in which the pretended line was to be deemed the true one, the Eastern proprietors would have to render an equivalent for all lands surveyed in the said angle before the year 1719, which lands so surveyed would amount to many thousand acres, and which quantity as an equivalent by the said act might be located by the Western proprietors on any lands whatsoever surveyed since the year 1719, and also on many tracts surveyed before that time, and sold as aforesaid, many years ago to bona fide purchasers.

"Your memorialists therefore first beg leave to observe that, as the assigus of Sir George Carteret and Lord Berkeley were each entitled to notities, or equal half parts of New Jersey, so it was therefore intended that the line of partition should make the two divisions equal; and this was the idea and intention of the contracting parties to the Quintipartite deed; but from the ignorance and infant knowledge of those times with respect to the geography of this country, they imagined that the division in the said deed made, from the North station point, in the latitude of 41 degrees and 40 minutes, to Little Egg Harbour, would nearly effect that object, as in those days every one expected that the same North point would bound the claims of New York; that this idea and opinion that the divisions were and ought to be equal to each other was maintained and preserved for many years after the execution of the Quintipartite deed, and was never once doubted or opposed until Dr. Cox, who had purchased some shares of West Jersey propriety, about the year 1687, maintained to the contrary."

The memorialists conclude their petition by hoping "that it will be evident to all that there cannot be any just ground or pretense for the late claim of the West Jersey proprietors, and that it would be much more consonant to reason and equity if, since the late determination and decree at New York, the proprietors of East Jersey were to demand a part of what has hitherto been deemed West Jersey. . . . For since two hundred thousand acres of land, which by the said division were intended to be part of East Jersey, have been taken from the same, whereby the equality of the two divisions has been destroyed, . . . your memorialists, the proprietors of East Jersey, are advised that they have a just and equitable claim to demand and receive from the West Jersey proprietors the quantity of one hundred thousand acres, being the one-half of the said quantity cut off as aforesaid by the New York boundary-line."

VI.—THE KEITH LINE.

The straight line on the map of New Jersey extending from the eastern side of Little Egg Harbor to the South Branch of the Raritan, forming in part the bounds of the counties of Burlington, Monmouth, Middlesex, and Somerset, is known as the Keith line. In 1683 an agreement was entered into between Robert Barclay, Governor, and the proprietors of East Jersey, on the one part, and Edward Byllinge, Governor, and proprietary of West Jersey, on the other part, for running the partition-line between their respective divisions, by which agreement the deputy Governors were authorized to make as "equal a division of the said province as they can." Accordingly, in pursuance of the said agreement, Lord Niell Campbell, Governor, and Capt. Andrew Hamilton and John Campbell, of East Jersey, and John Shene, deputy Governor, and Samuel Jennings, Thomas Olive, George Hutchinson, Mahlon Stacy, Thomas Lambert, and Joseph Pope, of West Jersey, all of whom were proprietors of their respective divisions, and by their conduct acquiescing in the said equal division, did enter into bonds to stand to the award of John Reid and William Emley, who were appointed to determine the said line of partition, and "who accordingly did award that the said line should run from Little Egg Harbor North Northwest and 50 minutes more Westerly," which was more than twelve degrees to the westward of the quintipartite or Lawrence line, and was so run because "John Reid and William Emley, as well as the parties to the said bonds, were, by living in New Jersey, better acquainted with the quantity of land in each division than the parties to the quintipartite deed." The line so awarded was afterwards run, in 1687, by George Keith, surveyor-general of New Jersey.

VII.—A FEW ATTESTED FACTS AND FIGURES.

We append herewith a statement of the quantity of land in the respective divisions of New Jersey, and

* Two hundred and ten thousand acres, sworn to by Edward Bancker, Jr., before James Duane, Esq., mayor of New York, July 28, 1784.

the difference in each according to the different lines of partition, fixed and proposed, made from actual survey and attested upon oath:

- "The angle or gore of land which East lost in the controversy with New York amounts to about 210,000 acres.
- "The remaining quantity of land in New Jersey, being the whole amount of the State, is about 4,375,970 acres.
- "Therefore, supposing a line was drawn dividing the State into two equal half parts, and which would be the line of partition between East and West Jersey, each division would then contain about 2,187,985 acres.
- "Supposing Keith's line, extended to the Delaware River, to be the line of partition between East and West Jersey. The quantity of land in East Jersey would then be about 2,211,930 acres.
- "The quantity in West Jersey 2,161,940 acres.
- "And East Jersey would then contain 53,890 acres more than West Jersey.*
- "Supposing the Lawrence line to be the line of partition. The quantity of land in West Jersey would then be about 2,689,680 acres.
- "The quantity in East Jersey 1,686,290 acres.
- "And West Jersey would then contain 1,003,390 acres more than East Jersey.†
- "Supposing a line to be drawn from the Mahackanack (proposed line of 1775) to be the line of partition. The quantity of land in West Jersey would then be about 3,119,560 acres.
- "The quantity in East Jersey 1,356,710 acres.
- "And West Jersey would then contain 1,862,850 acres more than East Jersey.‡
- "The angle or gore of land between Keith's and Lawrence's line contain about 528,640 acres.
- "The angle or gore between Lawrence's line and a line to be drawn from the Mahackanack would contain about 429,580 acres.
- "Personally appeared before me James Duane, Esq., Mayor of the City of New York, Evert Bancker, Jun., one of the surveyors of this city, appointed by authority, who being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposes and saith, that he, this deponent, has with great care and attention made the calculations and comparisons hereto annexed, respecting the quantity of land contained in New Jersey, and in the angles or gorges made by the different lines in the said computation mentioned; that the above computation was made from Mr. Ratzer's general Map, compiled the most part from actual survey; and that he doth verily believe the number of acres above specified to be as true and just as computations made from Maps of that scale will admit; and that he has not knowingly added to or diminished from any of the above numbers.

"Sworn this 28th day of July, 1781.

"EVERT BANCKER, Jun.

"JAMES DUANE, Mayor."

CHAPTER VIII.

SUSSEX AND WARREN COUNTIES IN THE REVOLUTION.

I.—THE SITUATION IN 1774 AND 1775.

SUSSEX COUNTY being undivided at the time of the Revolution, our history of this period will of course cover the territory now included in Warren County. This large and respectable portion of New Jersey was perhaps more exposed than any other to the savage allies of Great Britain during the struggle for independence, owing to its frontier situation along the Delaware River, which had been the theatre of attacks upon the infant settlements during the latter part of the colonial period. Here, however, had been nurtured a brave and hardy people, whose experience in savage warfare had rendered them familiar with military discipline and the use of arms. They were a people, moreover, who had inherited from their Huguenot, Dutch, Scotch-Irish, and Puritan ancestors a native love of liberty, and who were not without some training in the ideas and principles of self-government.

Such were the people of these counties when the premonitory notes of the Revolution began to be sounded in 1774. They were about thirteen thousand in number, and had among them men capable of taking the lead in any emergency, as well as a large majority who were ready to follow wherever patriotism and duty might call them in support of a cause which was then uniting the people of every colony in resistance to the oppressive measures of the British government. It may be said, in general terms, that the people of this portion of New Jersey were as patriotic, forward, and active, both in the incipient stages of the struggle and in the actual conflict of arms, as any portion of the province, or, indeed, as any portion of the colonies at large. Leading men of these counties were represented in the first movements looking to the establishment of a general body which should exercise advisory jurisdiction over public affairs during the crisis that all felt was impending.

The resolutions adopted in 1774 by the several counties of New Jersey were very similar in tone and form, and very much like those adopted generally by towns and counties throughout the colonies. Those passed by a meeting of citizens of Sussex County were drawn up by Hon. John Cleves Symmes, of Walpack, afterwards a colonel in the army, a member of the Continental Congress, and a judge of the Supreme Court of New Jersey. We find these resolutions recorded as follows:

SUSSEX COUNTY RESOLUTIONS.

"At a meeting of a number of Freeholders and Inhabitants of the County of Sussex, in the Province of New Jersey, at the Court House in Newton, in the said County, on Saturday, the 16th of July, A.D. 1774.

"Hugh Hughes, Esquire, Chairman.

"1st. Resolved, That it is our duty to render true and faithful allegiance to George the Third, King of Great Britain, and to support and maintain the just dependence of his Colonies upon the Crown of Great Britain, under the enjoyment of our Constitutional rights and privileges.

"2d. Resolved, That it is undoubtedly our right to be taxed only by our own consent, given by ourselves or our Representatives; and that the late Acts of Parliament for imposing taxes for the purpose of raising a revenue in America, and the Act of Parliament for shutting up the port of Boston, are oppressive, unconstitutional, and injurious in their principles to American freedom, and that the Bostonians are considered by us as suffering in the general cause of America.

"3d. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting that firmness and unanimity in the Colonies, and an agreement not to use any articles imported from Great Britain or the East Indies (under such restrictions as may be agreed upon by the General Congress hereafter to be appointed by the Colonies), may be the most effectual means of averting the dangers that are justly apprehended, and securing the invaded rights and privileges of America.

"4th. Resolved, That we will join, with the greatest cheerfulness, the other counties of this Province in sending a Committee to meet with those from other counties, at such time and place as they shall appoint, in order to choose proper persons to represent this Province in a General Congress of Deputies sent from each of the Colonies.

* And 20,945 acres more than one-half of the State.

† And 501,605 acres more than one-half of the State.

‡ And 931,275 acres more than one-half of the State.

"5th. Resolved, That we will faithfully and strictly adhere to such regulations and restrictions as shall be agreed upon by the members of said Congress, and that shall by them be judged expedient and beneficial to the good of the Colonies.

"6th. Resolved, That the Committee hereafter named do correspond and consult with the Committees of the other counties in this Province, and meet with them in order to appoint Deputies to represent this Province in General Congress.

"7th. Resolved, That we do appoint the following gentlemen our Committee for the purpose above mentioned: Hugh Hughes, Nathaniel Pettit, Thomas Van Horne, Thomas Anderson, Archibald Stewart, Abia Brown, John B. Scott, Esquires, Messrs. E. Dunlap, Mark Thompson, William Maxwell."

The provincial convention to which the above-named delegates were appointed convened at New Brunswick on July 23, 1774, when the persons named in the following commission were duly chosen to represent the province of New Jersey in the General Congress which convened in Philadelphia, Sept. 5, 1774:

"To James Kinsey, William Livingston, John De Hart, Stephen Crane, and Richard Smith, Esqs., and each and every of you :

"The Committees appointed by the several counties of the Colony of New Jersey to nominate Deputies to represent the same in the General Congress of Deputies from the other Colonies in America, convened at the City of New Brunswick, have nominated and appointed, and hereby do nominate and appoint, you and such of you Deputies to represent the Colony of New Jersey in the said General Congress.

"In testimony whereof the Chairman of the said several Committees have herewith set their hands, this twenty-third day of July, in the fourteenth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord George the Third, and in the year of our Lord, 1774.

At this date, although the people of the colonies were ardently fired with the spirit which subsequently brought forth the Declaration of Independence, and were determined to maintain their rights as British subjects, a separation from the mother-country was not contemplated. The first Continental Congress, which convened in September, 1774, and that which followed it, in May, 1775, breathed an earnest desire to settle the controversy amicably, and the cry for reconciliation and redress was continued with more or less frequency until it was lost in the "clash of resounding arms." The blood spilt at Concord and Lexington convinced the people that all attempts at reconciliation were futile, and cemented the colonies in one grand and united purpose to declare and maintain their independence.

The last visible link connecting the people of Sussex and Warren with royalty was broken by the action of the board of freeholders in the following order, adopted May 10, 1775:

"Ordered, That the Sheriff be paid the sum of four pounds, it being money advanced by him to discharge the Judges' expenses of two Supreme Courts; and this Board orders that, from henceforth no Judges' expenses shall be paid by this County."

This was simply giving the Crown-appointed judges of the county notice to quit,—that from henceforth their services were not desirable and would not be paid. This has been called Sussex County's declaration of independence. Certainly it has the merit of being brief and thoroughly practical.

II.—"THE SPIRIT OF '76."

The spirit of New Jersey at this time, no less than that of the whole country, is well set forth in the following extract:

"They had tried petitions in vain; now they would try powder. The Provincial Congress in that year ceased petitioning the king of Great Britain, but continued to press their petitions on the 'King of kings' in behalf of 'the lives and properties, the religion and liberties, of their constituents, and of their remotest posterity.' Accordingly, the ministers of Trenton were invited to officiate, 'in order that the business of the day might be opened with prayer for the above purposes.' In that Congress you will notice the names of Chetwood, Boudinot, Ogden, and Van Cortlandt, of Essex; Nathaniel Heard and Schurman, of Middlesex; William Hard, William De Hart, Jonathan Stiles, Peter Dickinson, Jacob Drake, Elias Cook, and Silas Condit, of Morris; Frederick Frelinghuysen and Hendrick Fisher, of Somerset; Archibald Stewart, Edward Dumont, William Maxwell, and Ephraim Martin, of Sussex; with good men too numerous to mention from these and other counties. Whether they adopted the rule which was in force in the Assembly in 1672, I do not learn,—'that every member of the House shall during the debate behave himself with gravity and decency; and any member who during any debate shall deviate from the subject-matter thereof, or attempt to ridicule any other member on the contrary side of the matter, shall pay half a crown.' But, with or without rules, these men did behave with gravity and decency, and went to work as men who had not merely the 'religion and liberties of their constituents in their keeping,' but the 'remotest posterity' also. Every resolution was like the full pulsation of liberty, which was then beating in the heart of America. 'The high and mighty exalted William Franklin,'† as Philip Livingston, Jr., called the Governor of New Jersey, tried to rein them up, but found that the people had fed so lustily on what they called 'popular rights' as in mettlesome mood to take the bit in their teeth and run where and as fast as they listed, the driver to the contrary notwithstanding. Without consulting the Governor, they organized regiments and commissioned officers, and, among others, 'the field-officers of the first regiment of Sussex County.'‡

† Governor Franklin soon became an open loyalist, and was deposed from his office.

‡ Oct. 20, 1775.—Prov. Cong. N. J., p. 66.

Saltpetre was at a premium, and they wanted it to be 'good merchantable saltpetre,' so that the powder made from it would not 'hang fire.' Moreover, their proceedings were enlivened by sundry evidences that New Jersey abhorred Tories and was successful in bringing some of them to repentance. These sturdy men were not careful to inquire whether the Tory was a minister, an esquire, or anybody else. Two esquires in Sussex were thus dealt with. If a Tory, he must repent or perish. Meanwhile, the people of Sussex astounded this Congress by two petitions, signed by a great number of persons, praying that 'all who pay taxes may be admitted to vote.' The farmers of Essex also showed some signs to be considered in petitioning that 'money at interest, lawyers, etc., be taxed.' It also appears that the farmers of Morris County had been so greatly agitated by the 'alarming account of the battle of Lexington' as to incur a debt of one hundred and eighty pounds 'in raising of minute-men, in May last.' The fathers of Sussex County showed 'an eye to the main chance' in petitions to restrain shopmen from raising the price of their goods. In fact, the whole province was in a ferment: Tories were called to repentance; strollers, vagabonds, horse-thieves, and other nuisances were summarily abated; the freemen of the State gathered around the altar of Liberty, and 'pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor' to the defense and triumph of popular rights. They hardly knew what was to come of it; but, having put their hand to the plow, they did not look back."

III.—SUSSEX COUNTY COMMITTEE OF SAFETY.

Sussex County was not slow in organizing. Committees of Safety were established in all her townships. Delegates from these formed a County Committee of Safety, which met in the court-house at Newton once a month. The proceedings of this committee, with the exception of the minutes of a single meeting, found and preserved by the late Benjamin B. Edsall, Esq., have unfortunately been lost. We quote Mr. Edsall's remarks respecting this document, and the leading facts derived from it, found in his "Centennial Address," as follows:

"This committee exercised a general supervision over the township organizations, provided means for promoting the popular cause, and procured the oath of abjuration to be administered to every citizen of the county, carefully noting down the names of those who refused, with the grounds upon which they based such refusal, and causing the recusants to be presented by the grand inquest of the county, to the end that they might appear in court and openly recant or give bonds for their peaceable behavior. The minutes of the sittings of this important committee were carefully written out for the information of subordinate committees, and, with a little care, might have been preserved; but, like the great mass of local memoranda which now would be esteemed invaluable, they appear to have been regarded as possessing merely an ephemeral interest, and were thrown aside as so much rubbish so soon as they had answered the immediate purpose in hand. I esteem it peculiarly fortunate that, amid the general destruction of these important papers, the minutes of one of the early meetings of the county committee have been preserved and are now in my possession. I found the manuscript among some loose papers in the clerk's office, cast aside as of no account, and left to moulder undisturbed amid dust and cobwebs. The proceedings which this ancient document discloses took place at the session of the County Committee of Safety held at the court-house on the 19th and 11th days of August, 1775,—about eleven months before the declaration of independence was made by the representatives of the United Colonies. At this meeting delegates appeared from all the townships except Hardyston,—viz., William Maxwell, Benjamin McCullough, and James Stewart, of Greenwich; Edward Demont, Samuel Hazlet, and William Dehman, of Mansfield; John Lowry, John McMurtry, and William White, of Oxford; Abraham Besherrer, Nathaniel Drake, and Andrew Waggoner, of Knowlton; Casper Shafer, of Hardwick; Archibald Stewart, Robert Price, John Stoll, Thomas Anderson, Jacob McCollum, Philip Dodderer, and Jacob Stoll, of Newton; Jacob Dewitt and Joseph Harker, of Wantage; Abraham Van Campen, Daniel Depue, Jr., Moses Van Campen, Joseph Montague, Emanuel Hoyer, John C. Symmes, and John Rosenkrans, of Walpack; Samuel Westbrook, Abraham Brokaw, and Henry Hoyer, of Sandyston; Henry W. Cortright and John Cortright, of Montague. William Maxwell, of Greenwich, was chosen chairman, and Thomas Anderson, of Newton, clerk. Returns were called for from the several townships of the names of those who refused to sign the Articles of Association for the respective townships. In Greenwich seven persons were returned as having refused to sign, four of whom were Quakers, who declared it to be against their conscience to take up arms; one gave no reason, and the remaining two would 'take time to consider.' From Mansfield two names were returned, but no reason for refusal assigned. In Sandyston all signed except two, 'who are willing to do so when opportunity offers.' In Montague every citizen signed, and in Wantage all agreed except Joseph Havens and one or two more Quakers, 'who are Whigs and are willing to contribute.' The other towns, says the record, 'not having had the Association particularly carried to the inhabitants, ordered that the committee of said towns wait upon the people and make return at the next meeting of the committee.'

"What report was made from 'the other towns' is not now known, but may be inferred from the returns just given. These items afford us an insight into the state of feeling which pervaded the county at that early stage of the conflict, and conclusively refute the gross imputations which have been recklessly and maliciously cast upon the patriotism of our Revolutionary citizens.

"At this meeting means were taken to raise by tax the county's quota of ten thousand pounds,* ordered by the Provincial Congress of New Jersey for the purpose of raising money to 'purchase arms and ammunition, and for other exigencies of the province.' Casper Shafer was appointed collector of the county, to take charge of the funds to be raised under the authority of the Committee of Safety. It was also ordered 'that the captains of the respective companies of militia send an account to the next meeting of the committee of all persons upwards of sixteen and under fifty years old in their several districts who refuse to sign the muster-rolls, that their names may be forwarded to Provincial Congress.'

"Capt. John McMurtry and Lieut. William White, of Oxford township, being desirous to go to Boston, where the Americans were rallying under the standard of Washington, then just appointed commander-in-chief of the Continental forces, requested the committee to certify as to their 'place of abode, character, and reputation,' which was at once complied with.

"On motion, it was Resolved, nem. con., That any person thinking himself aggrieved by any merchant or trader in this county taking an exorbitant price for any article of goods make application to the chairman of the town committee where such merchant or trader resides, who is to call a meeting of said committee as soon as convenient thereafter, which said meeting is to consist of five members at least. And the said committee, when convened, shall notify the said merchant or trader to appear and show why he has taken so great a price; and if it shall appear that he has taken an unreasonable profit, or shall refuse to attend or give any satisfaction in the premises, that he be cited by the said committee to appear at the next meeting of the county committee, there to be dealt with according to the rules of the Continental Congress."

"A memorial on this subject was also drawn up and ordered to be presented to the Continental Congress, praying that the latter body would make inquiry and ascertain if the Philadelphia and New York merchants of whom the traders in this county purchased their goods were not at the bottom of the system of extortion, speculating upon the public necessity by affixing exorbitant prices upon their merchandise."

It appears that about this time there were good reasons for such a precaution, prices having so gone up that fifty bushels of wheat were exchanged for one bushel of salt; calico was sold at fifteen shillings a yard, while rye would only bring one shilling eight pence a bushel. "Only one pair of shoes a year could be afforded, which were generally purchased about Christmas, and which the fair owners carefully preserved from dilapidation through the summer by going barefoot, like the enchanting goddesses that figure in ancient mythology."

The committee further ordered that the "colonels of each regiment and battalion in the county issue orders to the several captains to make strict inquiry into the state of their several companies, with regard to firearms, and make a return of all deficiencies." It was also ordered that a sum not exceeding forty pounds be applied to the purchase of ammunition for the battalion under the command of Col. John C. Symmes, and that said amount be immediately raised in "the three townships on the northwest side of the Pahaquala Mountain" and credited to them "in the quota of said towns of the money to be raised in the county agreeably to the directions of the Provincial Congress." On motion of Thomas Anderson, it was

Resolved, That it be recommended to the committee of Knowlton to get the Association in their town signed as speedily as possible, and to suppress any riot there in its infancy, as threats of a riot from that town have been reported."

It is said that in this township resided some troublesome Tories, who at this early stage of affairs sought to organize their confederates in resistance to the Articles of Association. But these loyalists soon fled to the British lines, and their property was confiscated to the State.

On motion of John Cleves Symmes, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted by the Sussex County committee:

"WHEREAS, There are some men who, after having signed the Association, have basely turned their backs upon the sacred cause of liberty and vitely aspersed her true sons, and wickedly endeavored, and do endeavor, to sow seelition, create confusion, and fill the minds of the good people of the county with groundless fear and jealousy, to the great detriment of the public cause, therefore this Board take the same into consideration.

Resolved, nem. con., That if any person or persons in any of the towns in this county shall hereafter asperse any of the friends of liberty in this county on account of their political sentiments, or shall speak contemptuously or disrespectfully of the Continental or Provincial Congresses, or of any of the committees of and in this county, or of any measures adopted or appointed to be pursued by the Congresses or committees for the public good and safety, on complaint being made thereof to one of the committee of the town where such person shall reside, the chairman shall, with the consent of the majority of said committee, at the next meeting, issue an order to the captain of the next company of militia to send a party of five or six men of his company to take such offender or offenders on proof being made of the fact laid to his or their charge; and forthwith bring him or them before the said committee; and if such offender or offenders, on proof being made of the fact laid to his or their charge, shall refuse to retract or express sorrow and contrition for his or their offenses, and will not promise amendment in future, the said chairman shall, a day or two previous to the next meeting of the county committee, direct said captain to send a party of his men, as aforesaid, to take said offender or offenders and bring him or them forthwith before the county committee, to be dealt with according to his or their deserts."

This county committee was one of the most forward and active bodies of patriots in New Jersey.

On June 3, 1775, the Provincial Congress passed the following:

* The county's proportion was five hundred and ninety-three pounds five shillings four pence.

"The Congress, taking into consideration the spirited exertions of the counties of Morris, Sussex, and Somerset in raising of minute-men, do approve of and thank them for their zeal in the common cause, and will take the same into further consideration at the next meeting."

IV.—THE PROVINCIAL CONGRESS.

The following are the names of members of the Provincial Congress of New Jersey from Sussex County:

May and June, 1775.—Archibald Stewart, Edward Dumont, William Maxwell, Ephraim Martin.

August, 1775.—Edward Dumont, William Maxwell, John B. Scott, Hugh Hughes, Mark Thompson, William Sorocross.

October, 1775.—William Maxwell, Ephraim Martin, Thomas Potts, Abba Brown, Mark Thompson.

May, 1776.—Ephraim Martin, Casper Shafer, Thomas Potts, Isaac Van Campen, John Cleves Symmes.

These men and their associates from the other counties, acting in the Provincial Congress, changed the government of New Jersey from the colonial form to a constitutional government, or State. From August, 1775, the Provincial Congress became a legislative body, and soon superseded the regularly-appointed Legislature under the king. Probably the fact that Governor William Franklin was a royalist and sided against the cause of the patriots hastened these measures sooner in New Jersey than elsewhere. The colonial Governor had not only the power of proroguing the Legislature, but the members of Assembly were elected upon writs issued by him and his council to the sheriff of each county; and, as these officers were appointed by the Governor and held during his pleasure, it became necessary to provide a different mode of elections. Hence, on Aug. 12, 1775, the Provincial Congress passed an ordinance that the inhabitants of each county qualified to vote for representatives to the General Assembly (who were persons worth fifty pounds in personal and real estate) should meet at their respective court-houses, on the 21st day of September then next, and by a plurality of votes elect any number, not exceeding five, with full power to represent each county in a Provincial Congress to be held at Trenton on the 3d day of October then next. The chairman of the meeting chosen by the voters present and any five or more freeholders were required to sign certificates of election. The persons elected in pursuance of this ordinance, for Sussex County, at the court-house in Newton, were those whose names are given above under the date of October, 1775.

The Provincial Congress met at the time and place appointed, and so continued to meet, according to the exigencies of public business, till August, 1776. Many ordinances were enacted by this body,—ordinances for organizing the militia, for raising money by taxation, for issuing New Jersey scrip, for arresting and punishing Tories, for dealing with contraband vessels upon the coast; in short, for everything necessary to carry on the machinery of the provincial government during those trying and perilous times. Too much credit cannot be given to the intelligence, patriotism, firmness, and wisdom of the men who guided the bark of State through those boisterous waves and anchored her safely in the harbor of assured and triumphant republicanism. They were men of great capacity as well as of great courage and determination.

The regular Legislature met for the last time in Burlington, Nov. 15, 1775, the members from Sussex being Nathaniel Pettit and Joseph Barton. They enacted two or three laws, but made no attempt to interfere with the Provincial Congress. The regular Legislature was prorogued by Governor Franklin until the 3d of January, but it failed to meet on that day, and Franklin then summoned it, by a proclamation in the name of the king, to meet on the ensuing 20th of June. But the Provincial Congress, on the 4th of June, by a vote of thirty-eight to eleven, resolved that the proclamation ought not to be obeyed. On the 16th of June the Provincial Congress ordered the arrest of the Governor by a still more decisive vote, there being forty-two ayes to ten nays. He was taken into custody, and afterwards, by order of the Continental Congress, sent as a prisoner to Connecticut, where he remained till regularly exchanged. We give from the minutes of the Provincial Congress the resolution and the votes in this famous case of gubernatorial impeachment:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Congress, the said William Franklin, Esquire, has discovered himself to be an enemy to the liberties of this country; and that measures ought to be immediately taken for securing the person of the said William Franklin, Esquire.

"The said resolution passed as follows:

"Yea: Mr. A. Clark, Camp, Condit, Drake, Cook, Woodhull, Green, Frelinghuysen, Paterson, Witherspoon, Hardenbergh, Linn, Hat, Melchior, Covenhoven, Mott, Josiah Holmes, Sparks, Cooper, E. Clark, Hugh Ellis, Elmer, Harris, Bowen, Hand, Lemling, Savage, Hathorn, Bloomfield, Wetherill, Dunan, Sergeant, Conits, Demorest, Quackenbush, Martin, Shafer, Van Campen, Symmes, Dickinson, John Holme.

"Nays: Mr. Drummond, Dickinson, Allen, Taylor, Joseph Holmes, Hughes, Post, Van Buskirk, Brown, Potts."

V.—ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF 1776.

Hitherto the Provincial Congress had taken no measures to form a State constitution, but, on June 21, 1776, agreeably to the recommendation of Continental Congress that each colony should adopt a provisional form of government, it was resolved, by a vote of fifty-four affirmatives to one negative, "that a government be formed for regulating the internal police of this colony, pursuant to the recommendations of the Continental Congress of the fifteenth of May last." The members from Sussex County in the Congress at this time were John Cleves Symmes, Isaac Van Campen, Thomas Potts, Ephraim Martin, and Casper Shafer. A committee of ten members, of which Rev. Jacob Green, of Morris County, was chairman, was appointed to prepare a draft of a constitution. John Cleves Symmes was a member of this committee, with another eminent lawyer,—Jonathan Dickinson; so, also, was Dr. John Witherspoon, president of Princeton College; and probably these men had the most to do in preparing the draft which was submitted and adopted as the first constitution of New Jersey.

VI.—THE PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE OF SAFETY.

The Committee of Safety of the Province of New Jersey was organized in October, 1775, and convened at Princeton. Samuel Tucker, Hendrick Fisher, Lewis Ogden, Joseph Holmes, Isaac Pearson, John Pope, Abraham Clark, Azariah Dunham, John Dennis, Augustine Stevenson, Ruloff Van Dyke, John Cleves Symmes, John Hart, John Mehelm, Samuel Dick, John Combs, Caleb Camp, Edmund Wetherby, and Benjamin Manning were members, Samuel Tricker president, and Abraham Clark secretary. Little of local interest appears in the minutes of this body, excepting a few commitments for Toryism, treason, etc., until July 5, 1777, when, upon the recommendation of a letter from John Cleves Symmes, the committee began its sittings in Newton, Sussex Co. The board met in the court-house on Saturday evening at nine o'clock, and adjourned till Monday morning, July 7th. It was "agreed that letters be written to Maj. Samuel Meeker and Samuel Kuykendal, Isaac Martin, Jacob McCollom, and George Allen, Esqs., to appear before the board and give a list of persons in this county who are disaffected or dangerous to the present government." The committee made their report on the 9th of July, presenting a list of twenty-eight names, sixteen of whom were in the township of Hardwick, eight in Knowlton, one in Wantage, three in Newton, and one in Oxford. This number was considerably reduced when it appeared, upon examination, that six or seven of the accused parties were Quakers, who had refused to take the oath on religious ground, but were "willing to be bound by surety;" and they were so bound, in the sum of three hundred pounds.

On July 12, 1777, Thomas Anderson, Esq., of Newton, was made a member of the board. At this time John Troop, Peter Saunders, and James Moody (the latter the notorious Lient. James Moody, of whom we shall give an account hereafter) were recruiting for the British in the State. The board ordered Col. John Munson (and some other officer, whose name is left blank in the minutes) forthwith to apprehend them. It appears from the minutes of August 11th that John Troop and Peter Saunders were apprehended and brought before the board:

"Lient. John Troop, of the 3d Battalion of New Jersey Volunteers, in the enemy's service, having been apprehended by order of the Governor and Council of Safety as a spy or recruiting for the enemy, was brought before the Council and examined.

"Ordered, That the said Lient. John Troop, with his examination, be sent to Gen. Washington.

"Ordered, That Henry Shooppe and Peter Saunders, suspected as spies from the enemy, taken with Lient. Troop, be remanded to prison in order to determine whether they will take their trial or go on board the Navy of the United States."

"August 16, 1777.—Ordered, That Mr. Camp pay Col. Morgan the sum of £26 lrs. 3d. for apprehending and securing John Troop and others."

The Council of Safety held regular sessions at Newton till Aug. 21, 1777, when they adjourned to meet in Princeton.

During the early part of the Revolution many prisoners were confined in the Sussex County jail. On Oct. 12, 1777, the council agreed "That His Excellency the Governor be advised to write Maj. Samuel Meeker, of Sussex, directing him to raise a party of twenty men, two sergeants, and two corporals, to do guard-duty over the prisoners, disaffected persons, etc., at New Town, in Sussex County."

Pursuant to a resolution of Congress recommending to the executive authorities of each State the appointment of proper persons in each district to recruit men, apprehend deserters, etc., Isaac Martin, Benjamin Kuykendal, Capt. Emanuel Hover, and William Carr were appointed for said purpose for Sussex County. Nov. 17, 1777, "His Excellency was pleased to lay before the board a letter from Maj. Meeker respecting the prisoners in Sussex gaol, and the provisions necessary for their support. The board, being of the opinion that there is no necessity of keeping a guard for securing the prisoners above mentioned, agreed that Col. Symmes be desired to direct Maj. Meeker to discharge the guard now kept for that purpose, and to settle with Maj. Meeker as to the cattle and flour he has purchased for their support. That as to the British prisoners confined in said gaol, Col. Symmes will acquaint the commissary of provisions with their confinement, and procure his directions concerning them. As to the deserters from the Continental army, he will inform the magistrates and endeavor to have them carried to their respective corps."

The following order shows that Sussex County was a good place for taking care of Tories, even within one mile of the jail at Newton:

"The board being informed that His Excellency Gen. Washington, by a letter of the 20th instant, that he considers Capt. Archibald Kennedy as a state prisoner, and that therefore he does not think that he has any right to interfere in the matter; and the board conceiving the said Capt. Kennedy disaffected to the present government, and his residence at his present place of abode dangerous to the State:

"Ordered, That he remove within eight days of the date hereof into the County of Sussex, and there remain within one mile of the court house at Newtown till the further order of the board respecting him."

VII.—INDIAN RAIDS DURING THE REVOLUTION.

The Minisink county, which had suffered severely from Indian hostilities during the French war, was not less exposed during the war of the Revolution to the merciless sway of the tomahawk and scalping-knife. The same savage foes lurked upon the frontiers, familiar with all the old war-paths from the Niagara to the Delaware, and ever ready to renew their bloody work at the instigation of their British allies.

In 1777 a party of savages slaughtered two or three families north of the Neversink and then crossed into Montague, where they tomahawked a family named Jobs, and next attacked the dwelling of Capt. Abraham Shimer, who, with the assistance of three or four negro servants and by his own indomitable resistance, compelled them to retire. In a few days they returned and captured a Mr. Patterson and his two small boys; the narrative of the father's sufferings and of the fate of his sons is thus given in the "New Jersey Historical Collections:"

"Mr. Patterson, being carelessly guarded while a prisoner, had several opportunities of escaping; but, as he hoped to save his sons, he continued with the Indians until within one day's journey of the Niagara frontier, where he was confident a cruel death awaited him. In the night, while the Indians were asleep, he took two horses which they had stolen from him, and escaped. The second day, being without food, he killed one of them. The other, alarmed at the scent of blood, broke loose, and Mr. Patterson, going in pursuit, not only lost him, but was unable to find the spot where his slaughtered companion lay. In the course of this day he heard the Indians yelling in pursuit. He, however, eluded them, and traveled on by the sun five days without any food except buds and roots and a snake and a toad which he killed, when he arrived at the head-waters of the Susquehanna. There he crooked a pin for a hook, and, attaching it, with a worm, to the end of a line made of the bark of slippery-elm, caught five fish and ate them raw. This appeased his hunger and gave him strength to construct a rude raft, on which he floated down to the Wyoming settlements, and from thence returned home. The sons were adopted by the Indians, became domesticated among them and thoroughly savage in their habits. Elias, the younger, when a man, returned to Montague and married, still retaining many of his Indian customs. Here he resided until 1838, when he and his wife left for the Tuscarora reservation."

These acts made it necessary to call out the Sussex militia and to man again the block-houses in the "three river townships," stretching from the Water Gap to Carpenter's Point. This region was for two years the scene of active military operations, and was so well defended by the Sussex militia as to confine the atrocities of the savages almost exclusively to the adjacent territory of New York and Pennsylvania. Among the officers who commanded in this region were Cols. Hankinson and Seward, Majs. Meeker and Westbrook, and Capts. Cortright, Harker, Shafer, Beckwith, Rosenkrans, Bockover, Hover, and Winter. These men not only had charge of the garrisons, but commanded scouting-parties, which were kept constantly active along the frontier, sometimes penetrating into New York and Pennsylvania.

In the autumn of 1778, Brant, the famous Mohawk chief, made a descent from the borders of Canada into the Minisink valley, at the head of about a hundred Indians and Tories. "They confined their atrocities chiefly to the settlements north of the Jersey boundary." They first fell upon the family of Mr. Westfall, and killed one man. Then they attacked the house of Mr. Swartwout, who was at home with his sons, the women having been removed to the fort. They all endeavored to escape, but one of the sons was shot down between the house and barn. Another ran to the river, half a mile off, swam it, and was shot on the opposite shore. The father, an old man, and two of his sons, assisting him, ran on together; but, finding they would soon be overtaken, the father told his son James, a very active, strong man, to run and save himself, which he did. The Indians pursued him half a mile over fenees and across lots, when he gained the fort and they gave up the chase. The father and the other son were soon overtaken and dispatched. No attempt was made by Brant to take the fort. After murdering a few families he left the valley and returned northward. In July, 1779, he reappeared with a larger force, and effected the destruction of the Neversink settlement, at what is now Port Jervis, in Orange Co., N. Y. The scene of massacre enacted here beggars description. One writer says, "While the inhabitants were attending the funeral of a deceased neighbor at the church, and when the procession was leaving for the burying-ground, the Indians came down upon their settlement, and before they had time to reach their homes the flames of the church gave signs of their narrow escape, and the smoke of their mills, barns, and houses foreshadowed the doom of Neversink. Some of the whites—the number is unknown—were massacred in the most merciless manner; others—and among them mothers with their children in their arms or by their sides—fled to thickets, swamps, and standing grass for concealment and safety. Mrs. Van Auken lay concealed all night in a ditch overgrown with grass and flags, while the mountains and valleys echoed to each other the savage war-whoop, and tortured her with fear that her family was cut off by the barbarous foe. On their approach to the heart of the village the Indians found the rising hope of the colony in the school-house, under the tuition of Jeremiah Van Auken. The teacher soon fell a victim to their fury, and was dragged, a corpse, from the school-house, and also some of his little pupils. Meanwhile, the rest of the boys fled to the woods for safety, while their sisters stood trembling and weeping by the lifeless remains of their teacher. At this instant a savage whoop was heard that reverberated through the forest and seemed like the signal to renewed deeds of cruelty. But even in the bosom of an Indian there still glowed one spark of sympathy that kindled at the scene. A brawny form sprang from the woods, where he had witnessed the tragical event, and with utmost speed approached the little group, with his horn by his side and his brush in his hand, and, dashing his paint-brush across their aprons, cried, 'Little girls, hold up that mark when you see an Indian, and you are safe,' and, uttering a terrible yell, he plunged into the forest and disappeared. It was Brant. The life-mark was upon the little girls. The ruthless savage, when he saw it, smiled and passed by. The will of the chief was law: the innocent ones were safe. But their brothers,—must they be cleft by the tomahawk? The thought was more than their tender hearts could endure; yet what could they do to save them? Benevolence is ever prompt to devise and ready to execute. The dispersed flock was soon collected, and each one took her brother under her garments; and all were safely protected by the apron with the mark of the paint-brush held up whenever an Indian was seen." The writer who penned the above account in 1844 says, "One eye-witness still survives to tell the story,—Mr. Van Inwegen."

Rev. Mr. Kanouse mentions a Sacks family who were killed, with the exception of an elderly maiden lady, a sister of Gen. Bevier. This lady saved herself from the stroke of the tomahawk by holding up a large Bible like a shield over her head, and into this the blow was struck that must have cleft her skull. The Bible with the gash of the tomahawk has been preserved in the Bevier family of Ulster County.

The incident of the humanity of Brant reminds us of his education at Dartmouth College, and of the fact that he was a Mason and always respected his obligation with friend or foe. It is said that in the engagement at Minisink, which followed soon after the events above described, Brant saved a soldier by the name of Wood, whom he had engaged in a desperate hand-to-hand encounter. Just as Brant was about to strike him down Wood gave the fiery warrior the Masonic grand hailing-cry of distress, whereupon Brant, true to his obligation, seized Wood by the hand, led him beyond the line of fire, and bade him put his trust in God and seek safety by flight. These incidents are worth remembering in the lives of savage men, showing that they are not wholly bad.

At the time of this fearful massacre Brant bore the commission of a British colonel. His headquarters were in Canada, whither he had gone with Sir John Johnson and the Mohawk tribe at the outbreak of the Revolution. He was not in the massacre of Wyoming, as some suppose; that revolting slaughter was led on by Col. Butler, a noted British Tory, who also lived in Canada and was sent upon that expedition by the military authorities at Fort Niagara. The following affidavit, made before a justice of the peace of this county, will throw some light upon the operations of Col. Butler:

"July 8th, 1778, Wallpack, Sussex County.—Personally appeared before me Timothy Symmes, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas for this County, one James Green, one of the inhabitants of Wyoming, who being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposed and said, that he was one of the men destined to defend a fort in Kingston, and that the enemy commanded by Col. Butler and one of the English Lieut.-Colonels and the King Owago, an Indian Commander, with part of the six tribes of Indians, 800, who fought well without taking to trees, but lay flat on their bellies to fire and to load. Said Green says that these men, to the amount of twelve hundred, as he heard, came within three or four miles of the fort, with offer of good quarters upon their surrender, and threatening men, women and children with immediate death if one gun was fired against them: he says he thinks no answer was returned by this flag; about two or three hours after the same flag came in again. He says he knew the man well. He was Daniel Engerson, whom they took prisoner at the first fort. He brought much the same proposals he brought before, which were still rejected: to a challenge they sent in to our people to fight Col. Butler, returned for answer that he would meet their officer at a particular place at a set time to hold a conference. He further saith that Col. Butler, Dennis and Durrene, with all the men they had, which were three or four hundred, marched to the place appointed at the appointed time, and not finding the enemy there, they waited about an hour, and then they marched up the river until they met the enemy, when a battle began on the right wing, which extended to the left in about one minute, and continued very smart on both sides; but our people were partly surrounded on the left wing in the space of ten minutes, when the left wing of our people fled to the amount of about twenty men; the others of our people fought about an hour, when they were surrounded by superior numbers, and some killed and some drove into the river, where many perished; some got to an Island in the river, where they found Indians plenty to murder them. He says he has since seen one Bill Hammon, who was taken on the island with six or seven more, who were made to sit down when the Indians tomahawked them, one after the other; but before it came to his turn, he said he jumped up and ran and made his escape by swimming off the lower end of the island. Said Green says that the night after the battle he saw the fires and heard the noise of a Grand Canotaco amongst the Indians, who, the said Green judges, were burning their prisoners alive; he says it was the judgment of others besides himself; for the flag, who were the next day in the fort, told them that he did not know that there was a prisoner alive among them, and that he had seen an hundred and ninety-four scalps in one heap. He further saith that the fort was surrendered or evacuated the next day after the battle, when the people fled towards the Delaware River, and in the night sent back George Cooper and James Stiles, who went to the top of the mountain and saw the houses from the lower part of Wyoming, about half way to the upper end, in flames, and it was supposed they went to burn the whole settlement.

"Sworn before me,

"TIMOTHY SYMMES."

The following is an affidavit of Capt. Joseph Harker of Sussex County:

"July 22, 1779, at the mouth of the Lackawack, a battle was fought by a party of militia from the County of Sussex, aforesaid, and the County of Orange, commanded by Col. John Hathorn, of the State of New York, and a party of Indians and Tories under the command of one Joseph Brant."

The New Jersey Gazette of May 3, 1780, speaks of a party of Indians which were discovered at Minisink commanded by "one Daily, a white man, formerly of Somerset County." "Some of the Jersey militia passed the Delaware and engaged them; a very severe conflict ensued, which ended in the defeat of the Indians." Daily was left dead on the field, and Capt. Westbrook, a lieutenant, and one private were killed. The same paper of June 7, 1780, publishes a letter from a gentleman in Sussex County which describes another skirmish west of the Delaware.

VIII.—SUSSEX STEEL AND CANNON-BALLS.

Sussex County should be proud of the fact that she furnished Congress with cannon-balls and steel during the latter part of the struggle for independence,—at least, with the means for manufacturing them. Her mines of ore and furnaces had been famous for a long period before the war, particularly the old iron-works at Andover. These works had been erected by an English company, who continued to operate them not only till the breaking out of the war, but down to the beginning of 1778, being protected by the British army which occupied Philadelphia. Congress had its eye upon these works, and instructed the Board of War to make an examination of them with reference to their availability for making steel and cannon-balls for the use of the army. This they did, and also found, by consultation with Col. Fowler, that they might be procured of the proprietors and turned over to the use of the government. The Board of War made their report Jan. 15, 1778, whereupon Congress passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Board of War be authorized to direct Col. Flower to make a contract with Mr. Whitehead Humphreys, on the terms of the former agreement, or such others as Col. Flower shall deem equitable, for making of steel, for the supply of the Continental artificers, and works with that necessary article; and as the Iron made at Andover Works only will with certainty answer the purpose of making steel, that Col. Flower be directed to apply to the government of New Jersey to put a proper person in possession of these works (the same belonging to those who adhere to the enemies of the States), upon such terms as the government of the State of New Jersey may think proper; and that Col. Flower contract with said person for such quantity of iron as he shall think the service requires.

"Resolved, That a letter be written by the Board of War to the Governor and council of the State of New Jersey, setting forth the peculiarity of the demand for these works, being the only proper means of procuring iron for steel, an article without which the service must irreparably suffer; and that the said Governor and council be desired to take such means as they shall think most proper for putting the said works in blast, and obtaining a supply of iron without delay."

New Jersey promptly answered this call, March 18, 1778, by the following resolution adopted by the Legislature:

"The council have taken into consideration the resolution of Congress of the 16th of January last, and the letter from the Board of War accompanying the said resolution, recommending it to the Government of the State to cause the Andover Iron-Works, in the county of Sussex, to be put in blast for the purpose of procuring iron to be made into steel; it being represented that the iron made at the said works is the most proper of any in America for that purpose; and having also taken into consideration the application of Col. Benjamin Flower, commanding general of military stores, agreeing to the said resolve, who, at the same time, recommended Col. John Patton as a proper person to carry on the said works; and considering that it is not yet ascertained that the estate in said Andover Iron-Works is confiscable to the use of the public, or whether the owners thereof have committed any act of forfeiture; and at the same time being desirous that the public service may be promoted by the use of said works;

"Resolved, That it be recommended to Col. Patton to agree with the present owners of the said works to take the same, to wit: the furnace and forges on lease, hereby assuring him that, in case the said estate shall be legally adjudged to be forfeited, or otherwise come under the particular direction of this government, such agreement shall be confirmed to the said Col. Patton, or to such person or persons as the Legislature shall approve, for any period not exceeding three years from the date hereof. But if the said owners shall refuse to let the said works for the use of the public, the Legislature will then take the necessary steps for putting them in the possession of a proper person in order to have them carried on for the purpose above mentioned.

"Ordered, That Mr. Hoops wait on the House of Assembly with the foregoing resolution and desire their concurrence therein.

"Which message being read and considered:

"Resolved, That the House do concur in the resolution contained in the said message."

Under these authorizations the old Andover Iron-Works changed owners. Passing from the control of those who had no interest in the American cause, and who had probably used them in aid of the enemies of the country, they came into the hands of men whose fervid patriotism was fitly symbolized in the glow of their rekindled fires. "At once mine, furnace, and forge seemed to catch the patriotic spirit of their new occupiers; the fires glowed with an intense heat, and the anvils rang louder and clearer, as if conscious that they were forging arms with which brave men were to defend their homes and their country. Miners and forge-men, wood-choppers and colliers, urged on by citizen soldiers and patriotic officers, were all engaged in procuring iron and steel for the use of the Continental army; while through the valleys and the gorges came the echo of the sound of the hammers, as, swung by stalwart arms, they rang upon the anvils and kept time to the song of the forge. This music fell like a death-dirge upon the ears of British loyalists and their Tory allies."^{*}

War had made terrible ravages in New Jersey; her brave sons had been slain in battle, her towns had been sacked, and her churches and farmhouses given to the flames; her State treasury was bankrupt and her people impoverished; yet her means for the defense of liberty and country were not wholly exhausted. Her mineral wealth was beyond the reach of invading armies, and her iron-mines, entrenched in her rock-bound hills, defied the power of England. "And now, at the call of liberty, out of the deep caverns of the mountains, as from a mighty arsenal, poured forth the true metal of war, and old Sussex in the hour of need furnished both the soldier and his sword."

The Andover works were held by the government till the close of the war, and for five years furnished iron and steel for the Continental army.

CHAPTER IX.

I.—TORYISM—LIEUT. JAMES MOODY.

OCCASIONAL references are made to Tories in these counties during and previous to the commencement of the war. For instance, Oct. 25, 1775, one was commissioned as a captain of militia of Sussex County, but on July 18, 1777, the same man appears to have been fined and imprisoned for speaking seditious words,[†] and in the New Jersey Gazette of March 14, 1780, we find an advertisement which indicates that this man had proved a Tory and that his estate was confiscated and sold for the aid of the cause which he had betrayed. In that paper, and in the one of March 29, 1780, are to be found advertisements of confiscated estates in Sussex which indicate that Toryism was a sin which Sussex patriotism did not "look upon with allowance." The published minutes of the Council of Safety contain the names of penitent Tories from Sussex County, some of whom were pardoned unconditionally, and others on condition of enlisting in the Continental army. At a council held at Morristown, Aug. 14, 1777, a proclamation had been issued permitting such a pardon on condition of enlistment in the army or navy. Thus Toryism was converted into an efficient auxiliary of patriotism.

Mr. Edsall has called attention to the fact that in Sussex County the men who were found wanting in the hour of need had nearly all been eager for a remission of the burdens imposed upon the country by the British Parliament and had petitioned for relief, but when they found that redress was to be attained only by an appeal to the sword a portion of them lacked the nerve to take up arms. Others, such as the Friends, had religious scruples, and a third class, looking upon the colonies as too weak to contend successfully against the mother-country, were eager to place themselves upon the stronger side, and to win that royal regard which turning their arms against their own neighbors and brethren they believed would ultimately secure them. Mistaken men! Charity may cover the faults of those whom timidity caused to shrink from danger; we may also forbear to judge harshly the conduct of men who could not conscientiously fight; but traitors and fratricides, who acted as spies and robbed and plundered their neighbors, who plotted with the Indians, piloting them to the abodes of the white settlers, and who aided and abetted the massacre and slaughter of their brethren, are deserving the severest condemnation and execration of their fellow-men.

There was probably not a Tory leader of any note belonging to Sussex County during the Revolution. True, there were some bands of outlaws and robbers who infested the mountains and availed themselves of the rocky fastnesses for concealment and security, and some holding British commissions who sought to recruit the royal army from the disaffected portion of the population, but as a general rule they were led by foreigners. The following statement, taken from Mr. Edsall's "Centennial Address," will show that a comparatively small proportion of the population of the county adhered to the British cause: "The county of Sussex in 1776 contained not far from thirteen thousand inhabitants, of which, according to the usual ratio, two thousand six hundred were males over the age of twenty-one years. Of all this number, ninety-six only were attained for joining the army of the king and their property confiscated to the State; while, of those who were not freeholders, there certainly was not more than an equal number who refused to take the oath abjuring their allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain. Adding both these classes together, we have about two hundred disaffected persons in two thousand six hundred,—a proportion of only one in fourteen. Probably no county in the State can show a greater preponderance of patriotism."

LIUT. JAMES MOODY.

The most noted Tory in Sussex County during the Revolutionary period was Lieut. James Moody, erroneously called "Bonnell" Moody. We have before us his narrative, published in London in 1783, wherein most of the achievements attributed by tradition to "Bonnell" Moody are related and well authenticated. The title of the work is, "Lieut. James Moody's Narrative of his Exertions and Sufferings in the Cause of Government since 1776: Authenticated by Proper Certificates." Among the certificates appended is one signed by "William Franklin, late Governor of New Jersey," and one by Cortland Skinner, the British brigadier-general in whose brigade Moody served, both as an ensign and as a lieutenant. We give the latter entire, as follows:

"I do hereby certify that Mr. James Moody came within the British lines in April, 1777, and brought in with him upwards of seventy men, all of whom, except four, entered into my brigade; that in June following he was sent into the rebel country for the purpose of enlisting men for His Majesty's service, with orders to continue there until a favorable opportunity offered for him to disarm the rebels and arm the loyalists, and, with what men he could collect, to join the royal army, but he was prevented from putting that plan into execution by our army's taking a different route from what was expected; that Mr. Moody, being thus disappointed, assisted by two of his neighbors, soon after embodied about an hundred men, with whom he attempted to join the British army, but was unsuccessful; that afterwards he made two successful excursions into the rebel country, and brought with him from Sussex County about sixty able-bodied recruits, nearly all of whom entered into my brigade; that after this time he made many trips into New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and brought with him many good men, and gained many articles of important intelligence concerning the movements of Col. Butler, the real state of the rebel country, the situation and condition of the rebel armies under command of their generals, Washington, Sullivan, etc.; and that while Mr. Moody was under my immediate direction he also destroyed a considerable magazine of stores near Black Point, taking prisoners two colonels, one major, and several other officers, and broke open the Sussex County jail, rescuing a number of loyalists that were imprisoned in it, one of whom was under sentence of death; besides performing many other services.

"I also certify that in the month of October, 1777, the said Moody was mustered as an ensign, but received no pay as such till April, 1778; that he continued his exertions under my directions till 1780, about which time he was taken from the regiment, which prevented his being appointed to a company in it, as it was in general believed the commander-in-chief intended doing something better for him; that I have every reason to believe Mr. Moody received nothing from government to reward him for his extraordinary services, or to indemnify him for his extraordinary expenses, till 1780; that from the time of his joining the army, in April, 1777, till his departure for Europe, in May, 1782, he did upon every occasion exert himself with the utmost zeal in support of His Majesty's cause in America; and, on the whole, that I believe all that is related in his printed narrative to be true, without exaggeration.

"LONDON, January 30, 1783.

"CORTLAND SKINNER,*
"Brig-Generel, &c."

Moody was neither a native nor a resident of Sussex County, nor is it anywhere stated to what part of New Jersey he belonged, although tradition has assigned him to Hunterdon County. He tells us that previous to going into the army he was "a plain contented farmer, settled on a large, fertile, pleasant, and well-improved farm of his own, in the best-cultivated and happiest country in the world." He came to New Jersey to arrest Governor Livingston, but, finding that Mr. Livingston had gone to Trenton to meet the Assembly, he left his men in Sussex County, where one of them was captured by Maj. Robert Hoops, to whom he revealed the plot, and the scheme for capturing the Governor was thwarted. This was in May, 1780, and seems to have been the first incident that gave Moody notoriety in Sussex. His next project was an attempt to blow up the magazine at Suckasuny, about fifteen miles back of Morristown. "But this," he says, "also proved abortive; for, notwithstanding his having prevailed on some British prisoners, taken with Gen. Burgoyne, to join him in the enterprise, the alarm was now become so general, and the terror so great, that they had increased their guard around this magazine to the number of one hundred and upwards." He had not more than seven men at any time during his operations in Sussex County.

* Cortland Skinner was attorney-general and Speaker of the House of Assembly under the provincial government; he resided at Perth Amboy. At the commencement of the Revolution he accepted a commission from the British as brigadier-general of a partisan or Tory brigade, and was engaged in raising recruits in New Jersey. He went to England at the close of the war.

It is possible that Moody may have occupied certain caves and hiding-places, and possibly "Moody's Rock" may have been one of them. He speaks of having been pursued and sought, according to the strong language of Scripture, as "a partridge in the mountains." "But," he says, "wandering in deserts and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth, by the blessing of God, he still eluded all these researches." His exploit of opening the jail at Newton is thus related:*

"Returning again to Sussex County, he now heard that several prisoners were confined on various suspicions and charges of loyalty in the jail of that county, and that one of them was actually under sentence of death. This poor fellow was one of Burgoyne's soldiers, charged with crimes of a civil nature, of which, however, he was believed to be innocent. Mr. Moody took with him six men, and late at night entered the country town. . . . The inhabitants of the town were but too generally disaffected. This suggested the necessity of stratagem. Coming to the jail, the keeper called out from the window of an upper room and demanded what their business was. The ensign instantly replied he had a prisoner to deliver into his custody. 'What! one of Moody's fellows?' said the jailer. 'Yes,' said the ensign. On his inquiring what the name of this supposed prisoner was, one of the party, who was well known to the inhabitants of that place, personated the character of a prisoner and spoke for himself. The jailer gave him some ill language, but, notwithstanding, seemed highly pleased with the idea of having so notorious a Tory in his custody. On the ensign's urging him to come down and take care of the man, he peremptorily refused, alleging that, in consequence of Moody's being out, he had received strict orders to open his doors to no man after sunset, and that, therefore, he must wait till morning. Finding that this tale would not take, the ensign now changed his note, and in a stern tone told him, 'Sirrah, the man who now speaks to you is Moody. I have a strong party with me; and if you do not this moment deliver up your keys, I will instantly pull down your house about your ears.' The jailer vanished in a moment. On this Mr. Moody's men, who were well skilled in Indian war-whoop, made the air resound with such a variety of hideous yells as soon left them nothing to fear from the inhabitants of New Town, which, though the county town, consists only of twenty or thirty houses. 'The Indians! the Indians are come!' said the panic-struck people; and happy were they who could soonest escape into the woods. While these things were thus going on the ensign had made his way through the casement, and was met by a prisoner, whom he immediately employed to procure him a light. The vanished jailer was now again produced, and most obsequiously conducted Mr. Moody to the dungeon of the poor wretch under sentence of death. . . .

"There is no possibility of describing the agony of this man when, on being so suddenly aroused, he saw before him a man in arms. . . . The first and the only idea that occurred to him was that, as many of the friends of government had been privately executed in prison, the person he saw was his executioner. On Mr. Moody's repeatedly informing him of his mistake, and that he was come to release him in the name of King George, the transition from such an abyss of wretchedness to so extravagant a pitch of joy had wellnigh overcome him. Never before had the writer been present at so affecting a scene. . . . In such circumstances, it was with some difficulty that the ensign got him away. At length, however, his clothes were got on, and he, with all the rest who chose to avail themselves of the opportunity, was conducted into safety, notwithstanding a warm pursuit of several days."

Moody gives no details of the "warm pursuit," but says the prisoner whom he rescued "was afterwards actually executed on the same sentence on which he had before been convicted, though he left the world with the most solemn asseverations of his innocence as to the crime of which he had been accused, excepting only an unshaken allegiance to his sovereign."

For his daring hardihood in intercepting the dispatches sent to Washington in the spring of 1781, Moody was made a lieutenant, having, as he says, "served more than a year as a volunteer without any pay, and almost three years as an ensign." At one time (May 18, 1781), while attempting his capture on the Hudson River, about seventy men were in pursuit of him. He had no other means of escape than to climb the steep side of a hill. Long before he had reached the summit a number of the men had so gained upon him as to be within fifty yards, and he received one general discharge of musketry, and "thought it little short of a miracle that he escaped unwounded. The bullets flew like a storm of hail around him; his clothes were shot through in several places; one ball went through his hat, and another grazed his arm. Without at all slackening his pace he turned and discharged his musket, and by this shot killed one of his pursuers. Still they kept up their fire, each man discharging his piece as fast as he could load; but, gaining an opportunity of soon doubling upon them, he gave them the slip, and in due time arrived once more safely in New York."

For some time he was a prisoner under Benedict Arnold when the latter had command at West Point, and was kept in what he describes as a most sickly and loathsome prison-pen, excavated in the side of a rocky ledge and covered with loose plank so disjointed that the rain poured in and made the bottom of it a pool of mud, while it kept him for several days drenched to the skin and obliged him to lie at night in a bed equally saturated with water, which consisted of straw and some blankets, barely kept above the wet and muddy bottom of the cell by a few boards laid across sticks. His fare consisted of dumplings made of musty flour and boiled in a vessel with tainted meat. He petitioned to Washington for relief, and that noble-hearted patriot sent an order for the amelioration of his wretched condition.

The only description which Moody gives of himself is incidental. He had a friendly loyalist in New Jersey whom he sometimes induced, for convenience, to personate him. This man, he says, came one night to the house of a certain "pompous and important justice of the peace" and raised an alarm. The justice came out, and, espying, as it was intended he should, a tall man, his fears convinced him that it was Moody, and he instantly betook himself to the woods. The next day the rumor was spread abroad that Moody was in that part of the country, and the militia was brought down from the fort, where he really was, with a view of capturing him where he was not; and so he gained his coveted opportunity for waylaying the mail or express containing all the dispatches of Washington relating to the interview with Count Rochambeau. Afterwards, at two or three different times, he intercepted and seized the messengers bearing important letters and dispatches. He had in command under him a younger brother, who captured the mail in Pennsylvania. The name of this younger brother we nowhere find, although he was subsequently hung in Philadelphia.

The greatest plot of Moody, perhaps, was his attempt to rob the archives of Congress through the aid of one Addison, an Englishman, who had been employed as clerk in the State-House under Secretary Thomson. This Addison entered into the plot as an assumed loyalist, agreeing to meet Moody and his party and give them access to the State-House, where the papers and records were kept. Instead of doing so, however, when Moody and his party, after encountering incomparable perils, had reached Philadelphia, and were, as they supposed, within reach of the coveted prize, Addison betrayed them into the hands of the authorities. Moody, more shrewd than the others, had foreseen this, and had taken the precaution to conceal his agency in the matter, remaining behind at the ferry-house after crossing the Delaware, and sending his brother and the others forward with Addison. Some little delay occurred in making the arrest of the younger Moody and the others, during which the lieutenant, passing himself off for an officer in a New Jersey brigade (by which was understood a patriot officer) and being fatigued, sought rest in an upper chamber of the ferry-house. He was in this situation, lying upon a bed, but anxious and vigilant, when the military surrounded the house. What followed we give in his own language:

"Seizing his pistols, he instantly ran down stairs and made his escape. He had not got a hundred yards from the house when he saw the soldiers enter it. A small piece of wood lay before him, in which he hoped at least to be out of sight, and he had sprung the fence in order to enter it. But it was already lined by a party of horse, with a view of cutting off his retreat. Thus surrounded, all hopes of flight were in vain, and to seek for a hiding-place in a clear, open field seemed equally useless. Drowning persons are said to catch at straws: with hardly a hope of escaping so much as a moment longer undiscovered, he threw himself flat on his face in a ditch, which yet seemed of all places the least calculated for concealment, for it was without weeds or shrubs, and so shallow that a quail might be seen in it. Once more he had reason to moralize on the vanity of all human contrivance and confidence; yet, as Providence ordered it, the improbability of the place proved the means of his security. He had lain there but a few minutes when six of his pursuers passed within ten feet of him, and very diligently examined a thickety part of the ditch which was but a few paces from him. With his pistols cocked, he kept his eye constantly on them, determining that, as soon as he saw himself to be discovered by any one of them, he would instantly spring up and sell his life as dearly as might be, and, refusing to be taken alive, provoke, and if possible force, them to kill him. . . . From the ditch they went all round the adjacent field, and as Lieut. Moody sometimes a little raised his head he saw them frequently running their bayonets into some small shocks of Indian corn-fodder. This suggested to him an idea that if he could escape till night, a place they had already explored would be the surest shelter for him. When night came he got into one of these stacks, . . . where he remained two nights and two days without a morsel of food, for there was no corn on the stalks, and, which was infinitely more intolerable, without drink."

The sequel is that on the fifth day after his escape from the ferry-house he reached a point up the Delaware where he found a boat, and, taking advantage of the flood-tide, rowed up the river till he thought he was out of danger, and by the assistance of friendly loyalists made his escape again to New York. His brother, whose fate he greatly lamented, was imprisoned in the new jail-dungeon at Philadelphia, and was executed, at the age of twenty-three, Nov. 13, 1781.

Moody was invited to England by Sir Henry Clinton, and there wrote his "Narrative," which was published in London in 1783.

II.—PROMINENT MEN OF SUSSEX AND WARREN IN THE REVOLUTION.

We incorporate into this chapter on the Revolution some brief notice of the men of Sussex and Warren who were prominent actors in the scenes of that period.

GEN. WILLIAM MAXWELL, the chairman of the Sussex County Committee of Safety, was a brigadier-general in the army of Washington, and a noble soldier and patriot. He served in the French war of 1755-59 as an officer of provincial troops, was with Braddock when that general was defeated at Fort Du Quesne, and fought under Wolfe at the taking of Quebec. He was afterwards attached to the Commissary Department and was posted at Mackinaw, holding the rank of colonel. As soon as he heard that the colonies had resolved upon resistance to the Crown he resigned his commission in the British army and marched on foot to Trenton, where he tendered his services to the Provincial Congress, then in session. They were accepted and a colonel's commission bestowed upon him, with orders to raise a battalion to march to Quebec. He succeeded in enlisting a fine body of men, and was engaged in recruiting when the Sussex County Committee of Safety was formed, in August, 1775. He took up his line of march according to orders, but the defeat of Montgomery occurred before he could possibly reach Quebec, and nothing remained but for him to return to headquarters. He was soon after raised to the rank of brigadier-general, and served with distinction in the battles of Germantown, Monmouth, Brandywine, Springfield, Wyoming, and elsewhere. His personal frankness and the absence of all haughtiness in his manners made him a great favorite with the soldiers, but his merits, as is too often the case, excited envy. Some of the officers who boasted a more aristocratic lineage than he could claim showed much jealousy of his advancement, and in 1782, when one of this class succeeded in obtaining promotion over him, he resigned his commission. He enjoyed in a high degree the special regard of Gen. Washington, who frequently eulogized him in his letters. Unfortunately for biographical purposes, Gen.

Maxwell's house took fire just after the close of the Revolution, and all his valuable papers, together with his correspondence, were destroyed.

The following inscription, written by his friend and compatriot Governor Howell, of New Jersey, is placed over the remains of this gallant officer in the graveyard of the First Pre-byterian church of Greenwich township:

"Beneath this Marble
Lies the body of
BRIGADIER-GENERAL WILLIAM MAXWELL, Eldest son of John and Anne Maxwell, of the township of Greenwich, County of Sussex and State of New Jersey, who departed this life
On the 4th of November, in the year of our Lord, 1796,
In the 63d year of his age.
In the Revolutionary War which established the Independence of the United States
He took an early and active part;
A distinguished military partisan,
He rose through different grades of the American Army
To the rank of Brigadier-General;
A Genius Patriot,
He was a firm and decided Friend
To the Constitution and Government of his Country;
In private life he was equally devoted to its service,
And to the good of the Community of which he was a member,
An honorable and charitable Man,
A warm and affectionate Friend,
A zealous advocate of the Institutions, and
An active promoter of the Interests of the Christian Religion."

CAPT. JOHN MAXWELL, a brother of the general, was another of the brave and noble patriots of Sussex. In the darkest hour of the Revolutionary conflict, when Washington had been forced to evacuate New York and was retreating hither and thither through the Jerseys, when his worn-out troops dropped off daily, and when his forces became so reduced in numbers that it is said he could call every man under him by name, Maxwell appeared with one hundred men, recruited in Greenwich and the neighboring townships, and tendered their service to the great chieftain. It was upon this occasion that Washington, surprised and gratified, exclaimed, "What! one hundred men, good and true, from Sussex!" importing thereby that he was agreeably astonished,—that, while the people of the counties which were peculiarly exposed to the ravages of the British troops were falling away from him, those in the interior had not caught the infection, as he supposed might be the case, but remained in adversity, as they had been in prosperity, "good and true."

This anecdote, which involves a great compliment, has been distorted by the slanderers of Sussex patriotism into a precisely opposite meaning, having been adduced as proof that Washington did not think there were a hundred honest patriots in Sussex!* Nothing, probably, could have been further from the opinion of Washington, or, at least, if he had such an opinion, nothing could have been further from the facts, as the records of the times abundantly show.

* Edsall's "Centennial Address."

We quite agree with Mr. Edsall that, even had Washington doubted the integrity of the people of this section, he would not have proclaimed it in the face of a body of men deserving the highest commendation for the prompt and ready manner in which they came to his succor in a dark and trying moment. Washington was neither precipitate in forming a judgment, nor was he ungrateful for even the smallest services rendered him by any of the people of the colonies. He often went out of his way to notice and commend very humble persons for the smallest offerings of help or intelligence that could assist in any way the great cause which lay so near his own heart. He was, indeed, the most remarkable man in this respect whom America has ever produced, and was loved and venerated by thousands for that very trait of character. Those, therefore, who distort his meaning in this instance, reflect dishonor upon the memory of Washington.

"Capt. Maxwell's company proved a valuable accession to the American army; they were efficient in aiding to turn the tide of the Revolution at Trenton, and did good service in the conflict at Assanpink and in the sanguinary battle at Princeton."

The following inscription upon the tombstone of this sterling patriot, in the Greenwich churchyard, briefly recites his history and records his worth :

"In Memory of
JOHN MAXWELL, Esq.,
Second son of John and Anne Maxwell.
He was born in the County of Tyrone, Ireland,
Nov. 25, A.D., 1739,
And at an early age emigrated with his father
To New Jersey.
He was a Lieutenant in the First Company raised in Sussex County, for the defense of his adopted Country
In the Revolutionary War;
And soon after, in the darkest hour of her fortunes, joined the army of General Washington as a Captain of a Company of Volunteers.
He was engaged in the battles of Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, and Springfield,
And ever distinguished himself as a brave and able officer.
Having served his Country in various Civil and military offices,
And faithfully discharged his various duties
As a Soldier, Citizen, and a Christian,
He closed a long and useful life at his residence
At Flemington,
February 15th, A.D. 1828,
In the Eighty-Ninth Year of his Age."

THOMAS ANDERSON, clerk of the Sussex County Committee of Safety, was born about 1742 or 1743, and was consequently about thirty-three years of age at the time the Declaration of Independence was signed. After the war broke out he remained in the county, ferreting out the Tories and bringing them to the alternative either of giving their adhesion to the cause of liberty or of submitting to such pains and penalties as could be legally inflicted upon them. In this work he was heartily assisted by Evi Adams, Esq., of Wantage, and James Davidson, Esq., of Greenwich. During a considerable portion of the war he acted as assistant deputy quartermaster-general, and attended to forwarding flour, chopped feed, hemp, etc., from this county for the sustenance and use of the army. The three points to which supplies from Sussex were sent were Trenton, Morristown, and New Windsor. Cavalry-horses worn down in the service were assigned to Mr. Anderson, who had to procure keeping for them proper to recuperate and refit them for the army. This office was one of great importance, and he discharged its duties with skill and fidelity. There were few wagons in the county, and it was necessary to procure some from a distance. Teams also were scarce and difficult to be obtained. The roads were new and ill adapted to transporting purposes, yet Mr. Anderson persevered until it was found impracticable to forward supplies with the means at command. In this emergency Washington sent an order to Moore Furman, Mr. Anderson's principal, empowering him to confiscate teams whenever necessary, and, where forage could not be procured by purchase, to impress supplies of that also. This delicate duty Mr. Anderson discharged with firmness, the public service demanding extraordinary measures. If there were complaints of individual hardships, the general good was promoted.

The army-supplies raised in Sussex and forwarded to the various military posts were of great service in strengthening the sinews of war, and all who were engaged in this useful business were quite as effectually rolling on the ball of the Revolution as those who "spent their dearest action on the tented field."

Mr. Anderson was appointed in 1785 the first surrogate of Sussex County, which office he held by successive reappointments until his death, in 1807. He was also acting clerk of the county from 1770 to 1777.

Among the papers left at his death have been found some documents which will doubtless be of great interest to the present generation. We print a few of them below. The first is a literal transcript of the order of Gen. Washington, above referred to, respecting the impressment of teams and forage for the use of the army :

"To MOORE FURMAN, Esq., Deputy Q. M. Genl.:

"The present critical and important conjuncture requiring every possible effort to forward the Stores and Provisions for the use of the Army, and the present embarrassment in the Quartermaster General's Department rendering it impracticable to provide competent means in the ordinary way, you are hereby authorized and empowered to impress as many teams in the State of New Jersey as you may find necessary for the purpose above mentioned, with respect to those articles which are under our direction. And in order that an adequate supply of forage may had, you will provide by purchase, impress or otherwise the Quantity necessary, for which this shall be your warrant.

"Given at Head Quarters,

"ROBINSON HOUSE, State of New York,

"July 30, 1780.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

Another of these documents shows that Robert Morris, chief justice of New Jersey, and John Cleves Symmes, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of Judicature, commissioned Mr. Anderson "to take especial recognizance, administer oaths," etc., in Sussex County. The commission is dated New Brunswick, April 10, 1778, and signed by Robert Morris and John Cleves Symmes.

It would appear that in 1765 the stock of leather had become exhausted in Sussex County. Mr. Anderson, taking a benevolent interest in his relative, Mr. Joseph Collier, sends him to Trenton for a new supply, with the following letter addressed to Mr. Stacy Potts, of that place, offering himself as security for his friend:

"Sir:
"Altho' most a stranger to you, and a Young Fellow just beginning the world, and nothing Before Hand, and thank God, but little Behind Hand, I have, upon my relation's, Mr. Joseph Collier's request, made bold to write you in his behalf, and Desire you'll let him have six or Eight Pounds worth of Leather, and take me for his Security for that sum; and In so doing will much oblige

"Your Humble Servt.

The original of which the following is a copy was addressed to Mr. Anderson by Joseph N. Shippen, asking his advice as to how two negroes could be saved from the death-penalty—then in force—for stealing. The writer seems to have been very much in earnest to save the lives of these unfortunate criminals, and writes:

"Dr. Sir,—The bearer has a Nigro of Ben Dupin's and another of mine, under a commitment to Sussex Goal, from Mr. Van Horne, for a theft from Mr. Hoops, which cannot be tried conveniently unless he was at home, and then, I imagine, we might have them tried by three or four Magistrates, and an end made to the affair without taking their lives. Pray send me your advice what will be the best way for me to act in the matter, and I will thankfully reward you for it and whatever trouble you may take in obliging me. One thing more, I beg that you will please to order such refreshments for him while he is there as you think proper. I will pay it. I am sick in bed, unable to ride up or I would come myself and consult the matter fully with you.

"Know, however, that I will most assuredly reward you to your satisfaction. I cant at present tell you the affair exactly, but will as soon as I can see you. Excuse this very incorrect scrawl, as I write in the greatest pain lying in my bed.

"I am Dr Sir,

"Your ready Friend and very Humble Servt.

"JOSEPH N. SHIPPEN.

"OXFORD, 27 June, 1770."

COL. JOHN CLEVES SYMMES was a leading member of the Sussex Committee of Safety, and one of the eminent men of the State. In the fall of 1776 he repaired, with the battalion under his command, to Morris County, and formed part of the brigade under Col. Jacob Ford. On the 14th of December of that year, while quartered at Camden and charged with the duty of covering the retreat of Washington through New Jersey, Col. Ford received intelligence that eight hundred British troops, commanded by Gen. Leslie, had advanced to Springfield, four miles from Chatham, and he ordered Col. Symmes to proceed to Springfield and check the approach of the enemy if possible. Accordingly, Col. Symmes, with a detachment of the brigade, marched to that village and attacked the British in the morning. This was one of the first checks Leslie met with after leaving Elizabethtown, but others soon followed, and his further progress in that direction was effectually stopped. In the skirmish at Springfield, Capt. Samuel Kuykendal, of Sussex County, had his hand split from the middle finger to the wrist by a musket-ball,—a wound which finally deprived him of the use of his arm. We find in the records of the county, at Newton, that on Feb. 22, 1782, Col. Symmes appeared before Guisbert Sutfin, one of the justices of the peace for Sussex County, and made affidavit that the contents of a certificate of disability given by him to Capt. Samuel Kuykendal was true; whereupon the court made the following order:

"The Court having taken the same into consideration, are of the opinion that the said Samuel Kirkendall (Kuykendal) is entitled to receive the half-pay of a Captain from the said seventeenth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, mentioned in the said certificate of Col. Symmes; and the Court is also of opinion that the said Capt. Samuel Kirkendall (Kuykendal) is capable of doing Guard or Garrison Duty in the Corps of Invalids, and order that a Certificate do issue accordingly."

Timothy Symmes, John McMurtry, and Isaac Martin were the judges on the bench when this order was made.

Col. Symmes was made one of the judges of the Supreme Court of New Jersey soon after the battle of Springfield, and retired from active duty as a military officer. He was, however, prominent in civil and judicial affairs till after the close of the Revolution, when his eminent services were transferred to another field of usefulness and honor.*

CAPT. JOSEPH HARKER, another member of the Sussex Committee of Safety, was in active service, and distinguished himself at the battle of Minisink, July 22, 1779.

MAJ. SAMUEL MEEKER was also engaged in the battle of Minisink, in which he was wounded.

After the fearful massacre of July 20, 1779, perpetrated by Brant upon the defenseless settlers along the Neversink, intelligence was immediately conveyed by dispatch to both Sussex and Orange Counties. Col. Tustin, of Goshen, summoned the officers of his regiment, with all the men they could muster, to rendezvous next morning at Minisink. They promptly attended to the order, and Maj. Meeker and Capt. Harker, of the Sussex militia, with a force of men under their command, also appeared at the place of rendezvous. A council of war was immediately held. The enemy, it was then reported, was five hundred strong, two hundred of whom were Tories painted like Indians, and the whole under the command of Brant.

It was thought by Col. Tustin inadvisable, with the small force there assembled, to attempt pursuit, but the impetuous and daring Meeker mounted his horse, and, brandishing his sword, exclaimed, "Let the brave men follow me; cowards may stay behind!" This energetic action decided the question, for, as none wished to be considered cowards, all fell into line and went in pursuit of the enemy. They marched about seventeen miles that day, and camped upon the ground which had been occupied the night before by the Indians and Tories. On their way they had been reinforced by a small detachment under Col. Hathorn, of Warwick. Here it was discovered that the force of the enemy was fully as great as had been supposed, and the more cautious of the officers declined further pursuit until their numbers should be increased by reinforcements. Among those who advised this was Col. Hathorn, who now, as senior officer, had assumed command of the expedition. Maj. Meeker made another appeal to the courage of the party, which had the effect of overturning all dissuasive arguments, and it was decided to pursue and attack the Indians at all hazards.

On the morning of the 22d the march was resumed, and on the summits of the hills skirting the Delaware the Indians were discovered strolling leisurely along about three-fourths of a mile ahead. The purpose was now formed to push on and attack them opposite the mouth of the Lackawaxen, where they had forwarded their plunder, and where there was a place for fording the river. But the wily Indians, under cover of the hills, passed to the right and concealed themselves in a ravine, over which the militia forces passed without suspicion, and were soon surprised by discovering that the enemy whom they pursued was in the rear. This gave the Indians an opportunity to cut off part of their force, so that only about eighty men were left to bear the brunt of the battle. They hastily formed into a hollow square on as favorable ground as they could select, and fought with great coolness and determination till their ammunition was exhausted, when no resource was left them but to club their guns and face the savage enemy as best they could. Strength and endurance finally gave way before overpowering numbers, and of the eighty men engaged in the action forty-four were killed or died of their wounds in the surrounding forest. Maj. Meeker was wounded, but not fatally; he was afterwards major in Col. Van Dyck's regiment of New Jersey troops, Oct. 9, 1779. Col. Hathorn and Capt. Harker were among the survivors.

MOSES DEWITT, another Sussex County man, was also conspicuous in this battle. Dr. Wilson, in describing the action, says, "Several attempts to break into our lines had failed, but just as the fire began to slacken one man, who had guarded the northeast angle of the hollow square, and who had kept up from behind a rock a destructive fire upon the enemy, fell, and the Indian and Tory crew broke in upon our ranks like a resistless deluge."

Mr. Edsall, commenting upon this statement, says, "I have authority for saying that the man who thus held the Indians in check was Moses Dewitt, of Wantage. Nor did he fall as represented; his musket, by repeated discharges, became too hot for handling, and, seeing at a little distance a comrade who had a gun which he was not using (for he seemed intent only upon sheltering himself from the enemy), Dewitt started to get that unemployed gun; in doing so he exposed his person, and the balls immediately rattled around him like hail. He fled for his life; a number of the enemy pursued him; they fired at him repeatedly; but soon a ravine presented itself. He turned into it, and the Indians fortunately lost his trail. Venturing out as soon as he dared, he laid his course for the nearest block-house. Upon reaching the river-flat he overtook two of his comrades, one of whom could not walk, having cut and lacerated his feet by running upon the rough stones and rocks. Dewitt had a canvas jacket, which he took off, rent in twain, and bound it around the man's feet. Still he could not travel; and so to drag him to as good a place of concealment as could be found without loss of time, and to take care of themselves, were their only alternatives, and they fortunately proved effectual. Soon after they reached the fort a horse was procured, and under cover of night their crippled comrade was found and his life saved."

Mr. Edsall mentions the names of Daniel Talmage, Capt. Stephen Mead, and Nathan Wade, of Sussex County, who fell in the battle of Minisink, and thinks it not improbable that at least one-fourth of the whole who perished there were citizens of Sussex, although no credit has been given to the county in the various histories of the engagement which have been written.

On July 22, 1822, the bones of those who fell in this action, after lying forty-three years in the wilderness, were interred with suitable ceremonies in the cemetery at Goshen, Orange Co., N. Y.

COL. KENNEDY and COL. GARDINER both commanded regiments of Sussex militia during the struggle for independence.

MAJ. ROBERT HOOPS, ABRAM BESHERER, and THOMAS DUNN were likewise in active service.

COL. JOHN ROSENKRANS and MAJ. SAMUEL WESTBROOK were also actively engaged during the war. Col. Rosenkrans accompanied Gen. Sullivan in his campaign against the Indians of the Upper Susquehanna and Genesee valley in 1779. Gen. Maxwell also commanded a brigade in that memorable campaign. One battalion of Col. Rosenkrans' regiment was led by Maj. Samuel Westbrook against a party of Indians, April 19, 1780. In this action Capt. Peter Westbrook was killed.

COL. JOHN SEWARD.—This officer had command of the Second Regiment of Sussex Volunteers during the war of the Revolution. His father, Obadiah Seward, came from Wales, and settled on Black (now Lamington) River, in Somerset Co., N. J. Here John Seward, the subject of this notice, and grand-father of the late eminent statesman, William H. Seward, was born, May 22, 1730. His wife, Mary

* Battle of Connesshaugh.

Swezy,* was born in the same neighborhood, April 3, 1733. They were married at Roxbury, N. J., by Rev. Mr. Byram, March 22, 1751. Mrs. Seward died at the residence of her son, Dr. Samuel Swezy Seward, in Florida, Orange Co., N. Y., Feb. 29, 1816, aged eighty-three.

Col. John Seward was a member of the board of freeholders from Hardyston township, from 1767 to 1779. He was present with the board for most of these years, notwithstanding his active service in the Revolutionary army.†

At the breaking out of the Revolution he entered the service as captain of a company in the Second Regiment of Sussex Volunteers. He was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, Feb. 28, 1777, and subsequently to colonel of his regiment. He remained in the service till the close of the war, as appears from an old roll made out by Joseph Gaston, paymaster of the Sussex regiment. Col. Seward was very active during the Revolutionary struggle, and was noted as an excellent shot with the rifle. He was present when the lead statue of King George gracing Bowling Green, in the city of New York, was taken down to be run into bullets by the Whigs of the Revolution. He was trusted by the officers of the army, and respected as a brave man by his neighbors. That he was feared by the British and Tories is attested by the fact that for the safety of his family and himself his house was barricaded and otherwise kept in a state of defense, and by the still more significant fact that fifty pounds of British gold was offered for his head. He died on his farm near Snufftown, Hardyston township, Sussex Co., Dec. 29, 1797, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

The children of Col. John Seward were nine in number, as follows:

1. Polly, born 1752; married Capt. Richard Edsall, 1771; died eight months after at Merritt's Island, Warwick, N. Y., aged nineteen. She was buried at the Reformed Dutch church in Warwick. Capt. Edsall had command of a company in Col. Seward's regiment of Sussex men in the Revolutionary army.

2. Obadiah, born 1754; married, and resided on a farm near Hurdstown, Morris Co. He was a lieutenant and afterwards a captain in his father's Second Sussex Regiment. He died about 1792, leaving his property to his son John.

3. Nancy, born 1756; died 1762.

4. Infant daughter, born 1758.

5. Elizabeth Swezy, born 1759; died 1795.

6. Hester, born 1762; died in infancy.

7. John, born June 10, 1765; became a colonel of militia after the Revolution, and on the decease of his father inherited his estate in Hardyston. About the beginning of the century he sold his lands and moved, first to Ohio and subsequently to Hillsborough, Ill., where he reared a large family and became a wealthy landholder. When an old man, nearly fifty years ago, he came on a visit with his wife to their relatives in Sussex and Orange Counties.

8. Samuel Swezy, born Dec. 5, 1768. (Dr. Samuel Swezy Seward, father of William H. Seward, who removed to Florida, Orange Co., N. Y., in 1795. See sketch in medical chapter, in this work.)

9. Israel, born 1773; died 1779.

The old Col. Seward homestead is situated about one and a half miles from Snufftown, on the road leading to Vernon. It was formerly in Vernon township, but was included in a strip subsequently set off to Hardyston. The place is now known as the Margerum neighborhood, the estate being owned by the Margerum family.

III.—WOMEN OF SUSSEX IN THE REVOLUTION.

The men of the Revolution were not alone. The women of that day spoke the language of freedom and taught it to their sons, brothers, husbands, and lovers. In the New Jersey Gazette of July 12, 1780, we find the following noticeable paragraph:

"The ladies of Trenton, in New Jersey, simulating the noble example of their patriotic sisters of Pennsylvania, and being desirous of manifesting their zeal in the glorious cause of American liberty, having this day (July 4th) assembled for the purpose of promoting a subscription for the relief and encouragement of those brave men in the Continental army who, regardless of danger, have so repeatedly suffered, fought, and bled in the cause of virtue and their oppressed country, and taking into consideration the scattered situation of the well-disposed through the State who would wish to contribute to so laudable an undertaking, have, for the convenience of such, and more especially to carry their scheme into execution, unanimously appointed Mrs. Dickerson, Mrs. Cox, Mrs. Furman, and Miss Cadwalader a committee whose duty it shall be to correspond with the ladies hereafter named, of the different counties throughout the State, whose aid and influence in their several districts the ladies now met have taken the liberty to sollicit in promoting said subscriptions."

The ladies selected for this noble and patriotic work were the most respectable and influential in the several counties; among them were Mrs. Condict, Mrs. Hornblower, Mrs. Burnet, Mrs. Parsons, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Forman, Mrs. Cox, Lady Stirling, Mrs. Stockton, Morris, Bloomfield, Elmer, Boudinot, Erskine, and many others like-minded. The committee for Sussex County was composed of Mrs. Councillor Ogden, Mrs. Col. Thompson, Mrs. Maj. Hoops, and Mrs. Thomas Anderson.

This shows what an active part the women of the Revolution took in securing the liberty of the country. Their exertions in the cause were unobtrusive, yet none the less effective. It was appropriate that men should take that position in the great struggle which made their services more conspicuous, but it is not appropriate or just in us, their descendants, to overlook or forget the mothers of the land in that tribute of respect and gratitude which it is our pleasure to pay to the fathers. They beheld husband, father, brother, son, go forth to battle, yet they complained not, nor allowed the great deprivations they endured to prostrate their energies. As a general rule, they were superior to adversity. Besides discharging the household duties to which they had been accustomed, often including articles of domestic manufacture to clothe their families and the care of large families of children, they cheerfully went forth to the fields and successfully performed those hardy tasks which in civilized countries are properly imposed upon men. The following paragraph, extracted from a newspaper dated July 25, 1776, will show what the women of that period did in this State as well as in New England:

* Now spelled Swezy,—a well-known family in Sussex, Warren, and Hunterdon Counties.

"We hear from New Jersey and Connecticut that, a great part of the men being absent on military service, and the time of harvest coming on, the women, assisted by the elderly men whose age rendered them unfit for the army, have so effectually exerted themselves that they have generally got in their harvest completely, the laudable example being set by the ladies of first character in each place. And we are credibly informed that they will take the farming business upon themselves so long as the rights and liberties of their country require the presence of their sons, husbands, and lovers in the field."

The pen of the historian has borne testimony that "the women of Sussex, in self-denial, in patient endurance, and in the display, when necessary, of truly heroic qualities, were exceeded by none in the land. Here they have been known to take up the rifle to defend themselves against the Indians, or to mount the fleet charger and ride for miles through the wilderness, amid storm and darkness, to summon aid when danger was impending. Such were your mothers, citizens of Sussex,—women who possessed all the tenderness of feeling, all the shrinking modesty, which become their sex, but who scorned, as all right-minded females ought to scorn, that contemptible affectation of timidity which shrieks to see a spider crawl and swoons at the sight of a mouse."*

CHAPTER X.

TROOPS FURNISHED BY THE COUNTY DURING THE WAR.

I.—REGULAR TROOPS OF THE JERSEY LINE.

The Continental troops of the "Jersey Line," raised in 1775, embraced two battalions, known at first as the Eastern and the Western, afterwards as the First and the Second. The First Battalion was commanded by Col. William Alexander (Lord Stirling), and after his promotion to brigadier-general in the Continental army by Col. William Winds, who was previously lieutenant-colonel of the same battalion. It embraced eight companies, commanded by Capts. Joseph Morris, Silas Howell, John Conway, John Polhemus, Joseph Meeker, Andrew McMires, Daniel Piatt, and Elias Longstreet. The Second Battalion was commanded by Col. William Maxwell, and the captains of its eight companies were William Faulkner, Joseph Brearley, James Lawrie, William Shute, Richard Howell, John B. Scott, Joseph Stout, and Archibald Shaw.

Authority was given, Jan. 10, 1776, for the organization of a Third Battalion; it was placed in command of Col. Elias Dayton, the company commanders being Samuel Potter, Thomas Patterson, John Ross, William E. Inlay, Peter Dickerson, Thomas Reading, Joseph Bloomfield, and Anthony Sharp.

A second establishment of troops from New Jersey for the Continental army was made by the Congress of the United Colonies, Sept. 16, 1776, under which the quota of this State was four battalions. Their organization was effected late in November and in the following month. The battalions were commanded as follows:

First Battalion, Col. Silas Newcomb, subsequently promoted to be brigadier-general of militia; he was succeeded by Lient.-Col. Matthias Ogden.

Second Battalion, Col. Isaac Shreve.

Third Battalion, Col. Elias Dayton.

Fourth Battalion, Col. Ephraim Martin.

The company officers of the above commands were: First Battalion, Capts. Joseph Morris, Silas Howell, John Conway, John Polhemus, Andrew McMires, Daniel Piatt, Elias Longstreet, and Daniel Baldwin.

Second Battalion (first arrangement), Capts. Joseph Brearley, James Lawrie, William Shute, Joseph Stout, Archibald Shaw, James Dillon, Thomas Yard, and Ephraim Anderson; (new arrangement) Capts. James Lawrie, Joseph Stout, James Dillon, Thomas Yard, Ephraim Anderson, John Hollingshead, John N. Cumming, Samuel Reading, and Henry Luce.

Third Battalion, Capts. Peter Dickerson, Thomas Patterson, John Ross, John Doughty, John Mott, William B. Gifford, William Gordon, and Jacob Rosenkrans.

Fourth Battalion (first arrangement), Capts. Thomas Morrell, Robert Gaston, John Anderson, William Bond, James Holmes, Jonathan Kinsey, Jonathan Forman, and Abraham Lyon; (new arrangement) Capts. William Bond, John Anderson, Noadiah Wade, James Holmes, Jonathan Kinsey, Jonathan Forman, Abraham Lyon, and John Pearson.

These four battalions constituted "Maxwell's Brigade," commanded by William Maxwell, of Sussex,

* Edsall's "Centennial Address."

he having been elected brigadier-general by Congress in October, 1776.

A new arrangement of the American army was made by Congress May 27, 1778, under which the Jersey troops in the campaign of 1779 constituted three battalions. Feb. 9, 1780, Congress called upon this State for sixteen hundred and twenty men to fill the "Jersey Line" for the campaign of that year. To supply the deficiency, volunteers were called for, large bounties offered, and muster-masters appointed, Maj. John Van Vleet being master for Sussex. June 14th the act of the Legislature was amended, under which the quota of Sussex was fifty men. June 25th recruiting-officers were appointed, Capt. George Reynolds serving for the county of Sussex.

The three regiments thus raised were commanded by Cols. Matthias Ogen, Isaac Shreve, and Elias Dayton respectively. The company officers were,—
First Regiment, Cpts. Jonathan Forman, John Flahaven, Giles Mead, Alexander Mitchell, Peter V. Voorheers, John Holmes.

Second Regiment, Cpts. John Hollingshead, John N. Cumming, Samuel Reading, Nathaniel Bowman, Jonathan Phillips, William Helms.

Third Regiment, Cpts. John Ross, William Gifford, Richard Cox, Jeremiah Ballard, Joseph I. Anderson, Bateman Lloyd.

Gen. Maxwell continued commander of the Jersey Brigade until he resigned, in July, 1780. Col. Elias Dayton, as senior officer, then assumed the position, remaining until the close of the war.

The news of the cessation of hostilities was announced in the camp of the brigade April 19, 1783, and the "Jersey Line" was discharged November 3d of that year.

II.—THE MILITIA LEVIES.

At various times during the war New Jersey, by reason of its exposure to the incursions of the British army and the ravages of Tories and Indians, found it necessary to embody a certain quota of volunteers from the militia of the different counties. These were sometimes called "New Jersey levies" and "five months' levies," but were generally designated as State troops. Of these, Sussex County (which then embraced what is now Warren) furnished the following:

Under the act of Nov. 27, 1776, for the raising of four battalions, Sussex furnished two companies. These, with two companies from Somerset and four from Hunterdon, formed a battalion of which David Chambers was colonel, Jacob West lieutenant-colonel, and Enos Kelsey major. The four battalions formed one brigade, of which Gen. Matthias Williamson had command.

Under the call of Oct. 9, 1779, for four thousand volunteers for service until Dec. 20, 1779, two regiments, of ten companies each, were raised, one of which contained the Sussex County quota. The amended militia law of Aug. 16, 1775, gave this county two regiments and one battalion. "Minutemen" having been raised in Sussex, Morris, and Somerset, this ordinance also ordered, in obedience to the recommendation of the Continental Congress, that all the counties furnish them, and prescribed the proportions for each, the apportionment for Sussex being five companies.

The Provincial Congress passed an ordinance, June 14, 1776, to raise the three thousand three hundred troops called for by the Continental Congress. This force was divided into five battalions, of eight companies each, and the service limited to Dec. 1, 1776. One of the battalions contained four companies from Sussex County (the remaining half were from Morris), and was officered as follows: Colonel, Ephraim Martin; Lieutenant-Colonel, John Munson; Major, Cornelius Ludlow; Adjutant, Joseph King; Quartermaster, Joshua Gordon; Surgeon, Jonathan Horton; Surgeon's Mate, David Ervin. This was in the brigade of Gen. Nathaniel Heard.

July 16, 1776, Congress requested the Convention of New Jersey to supply with militia the places of two thousand men of Gen. Washington's army who had been ordered to march into New Jersey to form the Flying Camp. One of the four battalions thus raised contained two Sussex companies, of sixty-four men each, Col. Mark Thompson being its commanding officer.

Enactments regulating the militia were passed in 1777 and the subsequent years of the war. In 1778 the militia troops were divided into brigades. In 1780 bounties of sixty dollars (Continental money) were offered to privates for service of one month. In 1781 the militia was formed into three brigades instead of two, the troops of Sussex, with those of Essex, Morris, etc., constituting the "Upper Brigade."

III.—ROSTERS OF OFFICERS AND PRIVATES.

The troops of Sussex County, under this last arrangement, were composed of two regiments and a battalion, with the following officers:

First Regiment.—Colonel, William Maxwell, followed successively by Mark Thompson and Lieut.-Col. Jacob West; Lieutenant-Colonel, Jacob West, succeeded by Matthias Shipman and by Capt. William Bond; First Major, Matthias Shipman, succeeded by John B. Scott and Capt. John Van Vleet; Second Major, Edward Demund, succeeded by Lieut. Abr. Besherer; Quartermaster, Robert Arnold; Surgeon, Robert Cummins.

Second Regiment.—Colonel, Ephraim Martin, succeeded by Aaron Hankinson and John Seward, the latter promoted from rank of lieutenant-colonel; Lieutenant-Colonel, John Seward, succeeded by Daniel Harker; First Major, James Broderick and Francis Headley; Second Major, Samuel Meeker; Adjutant, Joseph Linn; Quartermaster, Isaac Hull, succeeded by Henry Johnson; Surgeon, Cornelius Baldwin.

Third Battalion.—Colonel, John Cleves Symmes, succeeded by Capt. John Rosekrantz; Major, Samuel Westbrook and John Cortright, each successively promoted from captaincies; Surgeon, Dr. J. Avert.

* It is impossible to give a list of all who served. Adjt.-Gen. Stryker's published reports and rosters—the most complete of any yet issued—are quite informal, after exhausting every available source of information. It is to his reports we are indebted for the compilation here presented. This list does not contain the names of those from Sussex County who served in the three companies of artillery raised in the State (commanded respectively by Capts. Frederick Freilinghuysen, Samuel Hugg, and Joshua Hinkley), or who enlisted in the navy or in the light-horse (cavalry) service. The rosters of those commands do not show from what counties the men were enlisted, and it is impossible now to identify them.

"I certify the within to be a true copy of the account of Joseph Gaston, Esq., as paymaster to the Militia of Sussex County, as allowed and stated in Liber A of accounts, folio 193, remaining in the Auditor's office.

"JOHN BEATTY, Sec'g.

"TRENTON, Novem^r 18th, 1804."

Endorsed on the back is found the following:

"n/c
Joseph Gaston with
as Paymaster."

JOSEPH GASTON, Esq., resided in the township of Hardwick. He was of Irish descent, and came originally from Western Pennsylvania. He married a sister of Judge Linn, by whom he had two daughters. One of them married Dr. Elijah Everett; the other, Rev. John Boyd, pastor of the Hardwick Church. He was esteemed as a very judicious, upright man. He died of bilious colic, about 1803 or 1804, aged about sixty-five years.*

We add the following from Col. Charles Scranton's historical address respecting Sussex (then including Warren) in the war of 1812:

"The war of 1812 again tested the heroism of the sons of the Revolutionary fathers. Our armies, under Harrison, Jackson, Scott, and other commanders, won renown; while the navy, under the gallant Perry, Lawrence, McDonough, and other equally brave commanders, made our nation famous in its naval history. I regret time will not allow me to speak at more length on this and the war with Mexico. It is for today enough to say that the old flag in every crisis had brave defenders. It has been sustained, and those who have borne its stars and stripes aloft have triumphed over every foe until now it is de facto 'The flag of our Union, the flag of the free.'

"The Second Regiment of New Jersey was in service from Sept. 6, 1812, to Dec. 9, 1814, and was commanded by Col. John Seward, of Sussex County. Attached to the regiment were two and probably three companies,—Capt. William Vliet, two officers, and sixty-five enlisted men; Capt. Alexander Reading, two officers, and sixty-five enlisted men; Capt. William Swayze, two officers, and sixty-two enlisted men. In the Third Regiment, commanded by Col. John Frelinghuysen, one company from Belvidere, commanded by Capt. Francis Dunlevy, with three officers and thirty-one enlisted men."

CHAPTER XI.

SLAVERY AND SERVITUDE IN SUSSEX AND WARREN.

I.—NEGROES AND OTHER SLAVES IN THE EARLY DAYS.

If we will go back to a period about one hundred and eighty years ago and during the century succeeding, we will find that the inhabitants of this section of country, in common with those of other portions of the State, and with every colony in the New World, considered the holding of their fellow-men in bondage as perfectly right and legitimate. It was not considered a crime, and even at that early day it had become, with this State, one of her institutions. The Quakers at Burlington, as well as the Dutch and English settlers in the Raritan, Delaware, and Mink valleys, brought servants with them; so that in 1740, it is said, three-fourths of all the corn planted and hoed or the flax raised and dressed was the labor of negro slaves. The early records of these counties show that in the first ten years of the present century a large number of the old families still held slaves upon their farms.

Under the proprietors, persons were imported into the province as "servants"; these, while they did not absolutely forfeit their personal liberty by their engagements with their masters, were still in all essential particulars bondmen, held in servitude and entirely controlled by those who had brought them into the province for their profit. It was slavery in everything save the name, for the servitude was for life, and in some instances included their children also.

In 1664 the "Concessions and Agreement of the Lords Proprietors of New Jersey," signed by Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret,* to encourage planters, promised every freeman who should embark with the first Governor, or should meet him on his arrival provided with a "good musket, bore twelve bullets to the pound, with bandeliers and match convenient, and with six months' provisions for himself," one hundred and fifty acres of land, and the like number for every man-servant or slave† brought with him provided with the same necessities. To females over the age of fourteen seventy-five acres were promised, and a similar number to every Christian servant at the expiration of his or her term of service. Those going before the 1st of January, 1665-66, were to receive one hundred and twenty acres, if master, mistress, or able man-servant or slave, and weaker servants, male or female, sixty acres; those during the third year three-fourths, and during the fourth one-half, of these quantities.‡

Many of the early settlers were sent out in the employ of the different proprietors under such agreements as would afford them the benefits of the headlands granted to each individual brought into the province. Fifty acres were allowed to each master of a family and twenty-five to each person composing it, whether wife, child, or servant, each servant to be bound three years, and at the end of that time to be allowed to take up thirty acres on his or her own account. Under this plan there was a shipment from Scotland in 1682 in the interest of Rudyard and

Groom, and another the following year, of thirty-one servants, under two overseers, on board the "Exchange," Capt. Peacock. The records show that this was the beginning of an extensive traffic in servants.

Native Indians as well as negroes were at one time held in slavery in New Jersey. "Indian slaves" are mentioned in ancient records, and there is documentary evidence to show that this slavery was legally recognized. But of its extent or the period of its duration nothing is definitely known.

The earliest instance of the holding of negro slaves in New Jersey which is found recorded is that of Col. Richard Morris, of Shrewsbury, who as early as 1680 had sixty or more slaves about his mill and plantation.§ The inhabitants of North New Jersey nearly all had slaves as early as 1690. Their increase was rapid, inasmuch as in 1790 there were eleven thousand four hundred and twenty-three slaves in the State. After 1800 their number very rapidly declined.

It is not to be wondered at that the introduction of negro slaves into this State was coeval with its settlement, when it is remembered that the mother-country not only recognized their existence as property, but also engaged in the slave-trade, and that the adjoining provinces possessed them, not even Puritanic New England being exempt.||

II.—"REDEMPTIONERS"—PERSONS SOLD FOR THEIR PASSAGE-MONEY.

Another species of servitude prevailed in this section and in the adjoining provinces, the subjects of it being known as "redemptioners." These were persons who sold themselves for a term of years to pay the price of their passage to the shores of America. These emigrants, before embarking, signed a bond to the master of the vessel authorizing him, on arrival here, to sell them into service for a term sufficient to pay the price agreed upon for passage. After gaining their freedom many of them succeeded in placing themselves in comfortable circumstances, and some even became wealthy men and large landowners. Servants of this class were first found along the Delaware River about 1662, and for a quarter-century after that time domestic or mechanical labor was seldom employed for wages. Redemptioners from German and Dutch ports were frequently brought over on speculation, and when landed were sold at public sale. The purchaser had the right to resell the services of the redemptioner, who often passed through several hands before he had served out his term. The prices paid were usually very low. In 1722, German redemptionists in Philadelphia sold at ten pounds each for five years of servitude, but in some cases they brought more than that for a single year. After the middle of the eighteenth century this form of servitude gradually died out, and finally disappeared, though there were occasional instances of its practice down to, and even after, the close of the Revolution.

† In the "Concessions" of the West Jersey proprietors this subject is treated in almost the same language, except the words "or slave" are omitted.—Historical Collections of New Jersey, p. 38.

§ Gordon (p. 29, "Gazetteer") says that in 1680 there were but one hundred and twenty slaves in the province. This conflicts with the records extant, and the conclusion of the writer is that either Gordon or the printer of his book left off one cipher.

III.—LAWS RESPECTING SLAVERY—ACTION OF THE QUAKERS.

Many of the early colonial laws relate to this subject. The settlers were forbidden, under heavy penalty, to trade with slaves save by consent of their owners. A negro, if found five miles from his home, was apprehended and whipped, the party arresting him receiving five shillings therefor. "Runaways" from another province were flagellated by the nearest constable. If convicted of conspiracy to kill a white person, of rape, murder, or arson, the penalty was "death in such manner as the enormity of the crime in the judgment of the justices and freeholders seemed meet."* The owners, however, were paid for slaves so executed, thirty pounds for males and twenty pounds for females. This was to prevent owners, to avoid the loss of what they esteemed to be their property, from being under the temptation of secreting slaves who had committed crimes. The fund for indemnifying the owners of slaves was created by an assessment made by the justices of the peace.†

The Quakers, although among the earliest to hold slaves, were not quite easy in their consciences in regard to it. The Yearly Meeting in 1696 advised Friends "not to encourage the bringing in of any more negroes," and sundry Meetings during the next twenty-five years reiterated this advice. While their action was rather in the tone of caution than of censure, it ultimately had the desired effect, for the records of Woodbridge Meeting, June 17, 1738, inform us that "it hath bin three or four years Since friends have bought of them that was Imported, and not since to their Knowlidge"‡. A report to the Monthly Meeting at Plainfield in August, 1774, states that within the jurisdiction of the Society only one negro "fit for freedom" remained a slave.§

Everything considered, it is remarkable that so few crimes were committed by the slaves. Pilfering, though common, was of a petty nature, and perpetrated mostly to obtain some disallowed luxury. Murder, arson, and the like were extremely rare; still more so cases of blacks murdering whites. Some of the first offenders in the latter regard were burned alive.|| This mode of punishment, as well as the rapidity of its execution after the commission of the crime, may have had a salutary effect in restraining the passions of the colored race.

Yet, as a rule, the negroes were peaceably disposed. And it may be noted, as an evidence in favor of the gentleness and amenity of domestic slavery in our country, that when the slaves were invited by the British, during the Revolution, to abandon their homes and seek refuge within their lines, very few of them responded. There were, in fact, slaves enough in the country to have decided the contest adversely to us had they generally joined the armies of our enemies.

The first legislative action having for its object the abolition of slavery in this State was taken Feb. 24, 1821. It was then enacted that the children of all slaves in New Jersey born subsequent to July 4, 1804, should have their freedom upon attaining to the ages of twenty-five and twenty-one years for males and females respectively. Under the operations of this philanthropic action slavery gradually declined.

IV.—ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN NEW JERSEY—STATISTICS—LAST SLAVES.

The act entirely abolishing slavery in New Jersey was passed April 18, 1846. We give the following statistics of slaves in Sussex County, taken from the census returns for sixty years, from 1790 to 1850, inclusive: 1790, 430; 1800, 514; 1810, 478; 1820, 378; 1830, 51; 1840, 13; 1850, 1. This last slave in Sussex County was Caesar Soules, an aged and faithful servant belonging to the Dewitt estate, in Walpack. When the law abolishing slavery was passed he refused to accept his freedom, choosing rather to remain at his old home and with those who had always treated their slaves kindly. Caesar died March 11, 1860, before the census for that year was taken. Some two or three years before his death Mr. Peter Dewitt, now of Somerville, N. J., kindly provided for the board and care of the faithful old servant in the family of Absalom Reamer, a respectable colored man in the neighborhood, where he spent the remainder of his days, being frequently visited and cared for by Mr. Dewitt personally. Mr. Dewitt says, speaking of that uncertain quantity, the age of a colored person, "I was never able to learn the correct date of his birth. My grandfather used to say that when he was a young married man just beginning to farm, Caesar was a boy old enough to plow, and from that circumstance I judge he was in the neighborhood of one hundred years old when he died."

The last slave in Warren County—John Wooly—is still living, in Oxford township, near Belvidere. He belonged to the estate of the late Philip Mowry, deceased; and upon the death of Mr. Mowry, who left no will, the heirs made provision for him in the sum of four thousand dollars, the interest of which is used for his support. He is now quite aged, probably ninety years old, and is taken care of by one of the sisters of Mr. Mowry, who resides on the estate.

CHAPTER XII.

THE IRON INTERESTS OF SUSSEX AND WARREN COUNTIES.*

I.—EARLY HISTORY OF THE IRON INTEREST.

The aggressive, defensive, inventive, and progressive power of a state or a nation, if it has not always been so, is in the present age of the world measured very well by its employment and consumption of one of the most common as well as most useful metals, iron. In every age it has been used by some portion of the human family, and history, ancient as well as modern, serves to show that the state or nation producing or consuming most iron in the arts of peace and of war has been the most highly civilized and powerful, as well as enjoying, from its use in various forms, the most comforts of life. Now that our country, "the United States of America," only a century old, ranks second in population in the list of civilized nations, it is a remarkable fact that it is also only second in the production of this great staple, and the child is now born who will live to see the production of iron in its various shapes in this country far exceed that of any other country,—perhaps double.

But, while we speak somewhat boastingly of our present status, it will be interesting to take a glance backward over our history as colonies and as a union of States and mark the progress made; and in doing so I shall confine myself mainly to the counties of Warren and Sussex, it being, as I understand, the main object of the compilers of this History to collect such data as will serve to illustrate the iron interest from its earliest commencement in what was then Morris County, now Sussex and Warren Counties, covering a period of over one hundred and thirty-seven years.

The first account we have of pig iron being made is at Oxford Furnace (then Morris County), then known as Upper Greenwich. Two men, Axford and Green, came into this section as early as 1730. The first named located near the present Oxford Iron-Works, Green settled near the beautiful little lakelet bearing his name, and some of their descendants are still living in the same localities.

A few years later iron ore was discovered near the present workings of the Oxford Iron Company, and Jonathan Robeson, of Philadelphia, commenced the erection of a small blast-furnace in 1741, and by March 9, 1743, made the first pig iron therefrom. The weekly product, tradition says, was from thirteen to fifteen tons, some of which was cast into cannon-balls, some into ships' ballast, some converted into bar iron at the neighboring forges on the Musconetcong River, and some cast into chimney-backs, many of which are yet to be seen in the old houses, having the lion and the unicorn with either the motto, "Honi Soit qui Mal y pense," or "Dieu mon Droit," with the words "Oxford Furnace, 1758," or such other year as the casting may have been made in. The earliest date the writer has ever seen was 1747, and the oldest pig of iron now known is of 1755.

The balance of the pig iron annually produced was carted to Foul Rift, on the Delaware River, south of Belvidere, and from there shipped in lots of from ten to fourteen tons to Philadelphia, and thence for a market, it is said, to England. The boats carrying this iron were, and still are, known as "Durham boats," taking their name from the Durham Furnace, nine miles below Easton, Pa., where they were used at an earlier period for the same purpose, that furnace having been put in operation probably a few years earlier than Oxford (I venture to digress from the special object had in view at the commencement to say that Messrs. Cooper & Hewitt are now making pig iron on the old site, at Durham, from one stack, at the rate of five hundred tons a week, where one stack one hundred and forty years ago made not over sixteen tons per week). The original stack is still standing at Oxford, and in use and modernized, somewhat larger interior, and with the aid of steam, hot blast, and anthracite fuel, frequently produces more iron in a single day than was at that early period produced in a week.

This period preceding the Revolutionary war, from 1743 to 1775, when the colonies had only from one million and a half of population in 1743 to about three millions in 1775, with small villages and families very far apart, seemed to require very little iron; its real and true value was comparatively unknown, and yet it was, as it ever has been, an indispensable metal. At the first period named, 1743, there was no village in New Jersey containing five hundred population. The roads being generally new and rough, with a scarcity of money either in specie or in currency, very little progress was made in developing the mineral wealth of the country. Very much of the then small trade had to be carried on by barter, and it was no uncommon occurrence for pig iron to be sold for bar iron, and bar iron for beef and grain to supply the workmen at the furnaces of the early period. Under these difficulties, iron-works in this country increased very slowly, and many that did start were obliged to succumb to the inevitable.

II.—ANDOVER MINE AND FURNACE.

One of the early mines opened was that at Andover, now in Sussex County. In 1714 a large tract of land, including the mine, was located by William and John Penn; subsequently it passed into the hands of an English company from Sussex, in England. The rich ore from the mine at an early day was taken to old Andover (now Waterloo), and there manufactured into bar iron. From thence it was taken down the valley of the Musconetcong to Durham, and thence shipped in flat-boats down the Delaware to Philadelphia.

* Furnished chiefly by Col. Charles Scranton.

The development of this mine primarily led to measures for the investigation of the mineral resources of Sussex County, and resulted in the great variety of minerals now mined in different sections within its boundaries.

The English company erected a furnace and forge, —the former at Andover, and the latter at Waterloo, —and in these was worked the ore of the Roseville as well as of the Andover mine. A correspondent of the Newton Herald and Democrat writes in August, 1871: "We were shown by the Hon. William M. Hitt a pig of iron from the old Andover furnace. It is said to be about one hundred and fifty years old, is six feet in length, six inches broad by four inches thick, and weighs about three hundred pounds."

This mine remained in the hands of the English company till 1778, when it passed into the possession of the colonies, and its iron was converted into cannon-balls and steel for the artillery of the American army.* In the early part of the present century John Rutherford, a large real estate operator, owned the mine; he disposed of it about 1840 to Andrew Slockbower, who, in turn, sold it to the Trenton Iron Company. They sold it, several years ago, to the Andover Iron Company, in whose possession it still remains. In the early part of 1871, Messrs. Eagle & Schults leased it of the company for a term of two years, with the privilege of ten.

The present base of operations is about one mile northeast of Andover, in an opening made a number of years since a short distance from the old mine. A new shaft has been sunk from the opening on the hill, and a tunnel excavated in the side of the hill below to connect with it. The ore is magnetic and very rich. At the places where it is taken it is mixed with "lean" ore from other mines, and produces an excellent quality of iron. Specimens of lead and silver ore are found in this mine, but not in sufficient quantities to render working profitable.

III.—THE OXFORD FURNACE.

After having been started by its founder, this furnace was carried on in turn by Messrs. Roberdau, Showers & Campbell for a number of years, and then by Conrad Davis, Esq., of this county, for three years, from 1806 to 1809. From this period, 1809, to 1831 it was idle, its ownership having in the mean time passed to Morris Robeson, Esq., son of the founder, who only carried on the business with the mills, store, and farms connected therewith. After his death his widow, Mrs. Tacy Robeson, leased the furnace and mines for a term of ten years, from 1831 to 1842, to Messrs. William Henry, John Jordan, Jr., and John F. Walle (Henry, Jordan & Co.), who at once began to reopen the mines and get ready for the manufacture of stoves, which business they carried on until 1839, they then selling out their unexpired lease, goodwill, and fixtures to Messrs. George W. and S. T. Seranton, who confined the work to the make of pig iron used almost exclusively for car-wheels, Mr. Henry withdrawing in order that he might give his time and mind to starting a new furnace at what is now known as Seranton, with anthracite coal as fuel. A few months after this change Mr. Henry's partner died, and it resulted in George W. and Selden T. Seranton, with Philip H. Mather, Esq., of Easton, Pa., and Sanford Grant, Esq., of Belvidere, visiting the present site of the city of Seranton with Mr. Henry, and there forming the nucleus of an establishment, taking into consideration all of its ramifications, second to none in the world.

The firm of George W. & S. T. Seranton continued until 1844, when the writer of this became a partner. Meanwhile, the business grew at Seranton, both George W. and S. T. Seranton moving to that place. The writer in 1847 bought their entire interest at Oxford, and in 1849 purchased of the late Hon. William P. Robeson his entire estate about Oxford, and, taking into partnership again his two brothers and Hon. William E. Dodge, the new firm of Charles Seranton & Co. erected, in addition to their other work, a car-wheel foundry, which they carried on until 1858, when both the writer of this and William Dodge sold their entire interest to George W. and S. T. Seranton. It should be stated right here that the first car-wheels made, in 1850, were carted from Oxford to Seranton over the beech-woods route, sixty-eight miles, in order to give the Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company cars to commence running coal-trains to Ithaca for the opening of its business, and for the equivalent of three cents per pound, delivered (the writer has a vivid recollection of teaming in those days). In 1858, Col. George W. Seranton was elected to Congress, and S. T. Seranton resigned as president of the Lackawanna Iron and Coal Company and removed to Oxford to take charge of the new purchases.

In 1863 the Oxford Iron Company was incorporated, since which time the company has erected an additional blast-furnace, having a capacity to produce twelve thousand tons of pig iron yearly, a rolling-mill, machine-shop, foundries, nail-factory, etc., with a capacity to produce from ores smelted here two hundred and forty thousand kegs of nails per annum, and giving employment to about seven hundred and fifty men and boys, who, with the families of the former, make up a population of about three thousand souls. The company use in this manufacture about sixty thousand tons of anthracite coal per annum, about thirty thousand tons of iron ore (which is mined here), and ten thousand tons of limestone, or much more of each mineral than was used in all New Jersey when the writer commenced work here, in 1838.

The Franklin Iron-Works are of a later origin. The original company, known as the Boston Franklinite Company, built a small charcoal furnace, which they operated, not very successfully, till 1867. In that year the property was purchased by William E. Dodge, Moses Taylor, John I. Blair, Joseph H. Scranton, and others who were stockholders of the Lackawanna Iron and Coal Company of Scranton, Pa. In 1872 the company was reorganized under a new charter, and is known as the Franklin Iron Company. In January, 1874, this company put their present furnace in blast.

IV.—COMPARISON BETWEEN THE PAST AND PRESENT.

Oxford was the only blast-furnace in Warren County up to 1846, Messrs. Cooper & Hewitt erecting two at Phillipsburg in 1847, and later erected a third furnace, now owned by the Andover Iron Company. In 1873 the Pequest Company erected a furnace in Oxford township, now owned by Messrs. Cooper & Hewitt; and in 1874 another was erected, at Hackettstown, now owned by Joseph Wharton, Esq., of Philadelphia; so that there are in Warren County, at this time, seven blast-furnaces, having an annual capacity to produce as follows:

	Furnaces.	Tons.
The Andover Iron Company.....	3	56,000
The Oxford Iron Company.....	2	16,000
The Pequest Iron Company.....	1	10,000
The Warren Furnace Company.....	1	11,000
Total.....		87,000

And in Sussex County:

The Franklin Iron Company.....	1	21,000
The Musconetcong Iron Company in Stanhope 2		35,000
Total.....	10	143,000

This in a territory embracing about seven hundred, and fifty square miles, in what was a part of Morris County up to 1753. Nearly as much pig iron is now made yearly as was made in the whole Union in 1835, and at least twenty times as much as was made in the shape of pig iron by all the colonies in 1743, the period first alluded to.

There were several charcoal blast-furnaces erected in Sussex County between 1760 and 1844,—viz., the Andover, 1760; the Franklin, 1772; the Hamburg, 1834; the Wawayanda, 1836,—all of which have passed away, and forges at Squire's Point, Change-water, Imlaydale, Hughesville, and Greenwich, in Warren County, and at Andover, Stanhope, Waterloo, Sparta, and numerous other points in Sussex County, none of which are now operative. These in the early periods used pig iron, and later iron ore, making bars direct from the ores.

I should perhaps remark right here that a very large amount of iron ore (probably over fifty thousand tons yearly) is mined in Sussex and Warren Counties and shipped to Pennsylvania for smelting, besides a large amount of zinc ores, and at this time there is used by the Warren Foundry and other foundries and rolling-mills in the two counties over forty thousand tons of pig iron yearly.

In conclusion, the writer of this will state that in his short life he is witness to the fact that, with the improved machinery brought into use in agriculture, on a farm of say two hundred acres the weight of iron and steel in use in 1838 was about ten to twelve hundred pounds, compared with about one and three-quarter tons at present, and from a consumption per capita per annum, in 1838, of about thirty-five pounds, it will reach, in the years 1880 and 1881, fully two hundred and twenty pounds, or an aggregate of five million five hundred thousand net tons! so that, whatever modus operandi, sort of locomotion or transportation or style or composition of architecture on sea or land we have had in the past, or may have in the future, we most certainly are now living in the iron and steel age.

CHAPTER XIII.

SUSSEX AND WARREN COUNTIES IN THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

I.—THE SITUATION IN 1861.

WERE it possible to recall the events of 1861 with the same vividness and reality with which they then struck the public mind, the present generation might form some conception of the stirring scenes enacted at the outbreak of the war of the Rebellion,—scenes which only those who participated in them can fully appreciate. Unhappily for the distinctness of the impression, the vision has measurably faded away in the lapse of twenty years; so that our young people of to-day know these events only by tradition or by the dim light shed upon them in history. The outburst of patriotism known as the "great uprising" which followed the attack on Fort Sumter, in April, 1861, flowed like a mighty inundation into every State, county, village, and hamlet, and into all the avenues of business, trade, commerce, and social life. The country had been waiting in solemn and anxious pause for the results of secession in South Carolina, and to see what the seceded State would do with the little garrison in her harbor and with the flag of the Union which floated above its ramparts. The moment that flag was struck and that fort fired upon the shock of impending war thrilled the whole country. The pause was at an end: action was now needed; nor were the people long in deciding what to do. Troops were called for by the President of the United States, and forthwith flags were hoisted and recruiting-stations opened in every town, hamlet, and school-district; business marched to the sound of the life and drum, and the air was filled with strains of martial music. The whole North awoke to meet the call of the government in enlisting, equipping, and sending forward troops to decide the momentous question of union or secession by the arbitrament of arms.

New Jersey was not behind the other States of the North in responding to the call. Governor Olden, her executive, was patriotic and energetic. He was greatly assisted in the selection of officers by a board of examiners composed of Adjt.-Gen. Stockton, Lieut. A. T. A. Torbert, and Gen. William Cook. Lieut. Torbert, who was at an early day assigned for duty at Trenton, rendered from the start most important service in organizing the first New Jersey regiments for the field. Governor Olden was also greatly assisted in the labors of his office by Capt. Charles P. Smith, James T. Sherman, formerly editor of the State Gazette, Barker Gummere, clerk in chancery, Col. Charles Scranton, Gen. N. X. Halsted, Hon. Joseph W. Allen, and others, all of whom labored untiringly and without compensation in behalf of the State.

The counties of Sussex and Warren, moved by the same patriotic impulse, began in season to co-operate with the other counties of the State in raising and sending forward their quotas of troops. When, in preparation for raising the first four regiments called for, twenty-four of the principal banks of the State pledged Governor Olden four hundred and fifty-one thousand dollars, Sussex Bank, at Newton, came forward with twenty thousand dollars and Farmers' Bank of Wantage with ten thousand dollars. Six days after President Lincoln's call for the first troops had been issued, Judson Kilpatrick, of Sussex,—a name now known to fame, but then a cadet lieutenant in the United States Military Academy at West Point,—addressed an urgent appeal to the Governor to be permitted to share with the troops of his State the dangers and honors of the field. From the beginning to the close of the war these counties bore a most honorable and patriotic part in the great service and sacrifice demanded of the American people to sustain the Union. The names of their soldiers are to be found on the rolls of a large number of regiments of this and other States. Such of those regiments as were most noticeable for the number of Sussex and Warren County men serving in their ranks will be here specially mentioned. It may be proper to remark that recruiting began in Newton and Belvidere immediately upon the issuing of the first call by the President for three months' men, on April 15, 1861. On the 18th,—only three days after the call,—Capt. Edward L. Campbell had raised a company in Belvidere, consisting of seven officers and fifty privates. On the 19th the company was raised to its full complement, and was taken by Capt. Campbell to Trenton, but the State authorities were not ready to muster them into the service. On the 18th of May, Capt. Campbell, with a portion of these men and other recruits, went into the Third Regiment, then organized and mustered into the United States service for three years.* In like manner, Capt. James G. Fitts raised a company in Newton, which were not mustered, but, with their leader, became Company D of the Third Regiment. These were the earliest companies raised in Sussex and Warren Counties, and the earliest in the State raised expressly for the emergency, although there were some militia organizations, already existing, which were a little in advance of them in tendering their services.

The following extract from the historical address of Col. Charles Scranton, delivered at Belvidere, July 4, 1876, on the occasion of the centennial celebration, is pertinent in this connection :

"In 1861, when the plot of treason was laid which threatened the life of our beloved country, and the seat of government itself seemed in danger, a young man whom many of you knew, the private secretary of my deceased brother, was in Washington City, where he volunteered as a private in Col. Lane's company, and served until troops arrived from Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, when he was honorably discharged, receiving the thanks of the President and Secretary of War Cameron. Capt. Joseph J. Henry was the first volunteer from Oxford, Warren Co., of this State, in the great civil war, as John McMurray and Thomas White were in the Revolutionary war, and, although afterwards entering the Ninth New Jersey Volunteers, he was the first officer from New Jersey to fall in battle. The late war is so fresh in your memories that I shall only briefly refer to it. Sumter was fired on; its garrison taken prisoners. The call for men to arms was made by President Lincoln. You all know what the response was. Most of you remember the first meeting in your court-house, where I had the honor to preside; how Campbell, Kennedy, and others rallied round the old flag and quickly formed a company and moved for Trenton. Of the meeting at Phillipsburg, and how Nuttall, Sitgreaves, Schoonover, and others flocked to the standard; and again at Oxford, how the gallant McAllister, Henry, Warner, Brewster, and other good men and true, joined the phalanx; and again at Clinton, under the brave and gallant Taylor. As aide to the late lamented good Governor Charles S. Olden I attended four meetings in as many days, and we had our quota more than full before we had a place for the men to quarter. We were without uniforms, arms, or equipments. What memories cluster around those days of April and May, 1861, and all through the terrible war! And later, as further calls for troops came, how nobly did our county of Warren respond! You knew those noble, brave young men. I knew them by the thousand in the State. I loved them and cherish their memories. Thousands and thousands fell with their face to the foe! Henry, Brewster, Lawrence, Hilton, Hicks, Armstrong, and scores of other noble heroes from old Warren fell. I shrink from calling the roll of those honored dead. Our county furnished one thousand four hundred and thirty-seven men, besides those from her to other counties and States, of whom one hundred and seventy-six fell in battle or died of disease contracted in the army, or from inhuman treatment in prisons. Of these brave men who thus died some lie in our own cemeteries, some on the field where they fell, in graves unknown, and though no storied urn or animated bust or marble shaft or granite pile marks their last resting-place here on earth, yet their memories will live in story and history, and annually as their loved ones gather flowers to strew on their tombs, or beset them with their tears, will there grow an increasing love for their memories. Fellow-citizens, soldiers, survivors of the war for the Union, very many of whom it became my duty to give an outfit for the war, as I see you before me my heart warms in admiration of your gallantry, of your honored actions towards myself while you were in New Jersey camps. Before this audience I pronounce the fact that, in all the work performed by me in feeding, clothing, and paying New Jersey men who enlisted for the war, no one, so far as I can recollect, ever gave me one single cause for reproach. I place this also on record as a fact: no volunteer (save one crazy man) ever deserted the camp where I acted. Your subordination and gallantry, with the thousands from other counties and States, under the guidance of a wise providence directing the great mind of the immortal Lincoln and his coadjutors, has made this nation in truth free."

* Capt. De Witt Clinton Blair, of Belvidere, son of the Hon. John I. Blair, raised a full company. Immediately after the news was received of being on Sumter, in Warren County, and presented them, with himself at their head, at Trenton; but no further demand being made for more troops, himself and command, after staying a few days, returned home.

Nearly every man, however, enlisted subsequently, when calls were made for more troops. He went out in the Twenty-second New York Infantry as a private and served the time of his command.

A call was made on the ladies of New Jersey to raise ten thousand dollars to purchase ten thousand rubber blankets for the soldiers. The ladies of Warren did at least one-tenth of this patriotic work.

II.—FIRST REGIMENT, COMPANY D.

Company D of the First New Jersey Infantry was raised in Phillipsburg, Warren Co., and vicinity. The regiment of which it was a part was fully organized, equipped, and officered by May 18, 1861, and on the 21st was duly mustered into the United States service at Trenton for three years. It left for the seat of war, June 28, 1861, with a full complement of men, numbering, including officers and privates, ten hundred and thirty-four. By the latter part of 1863, Company D had become so thinned as not to be able to muster its requisite number of men, and its place was supplied, Jan. 30, 1864, by a full new company sent on from Trenton. Others, when their time expired, re-enlisted in the field, and those who did not and whose time had expired were mustered out of the service. Some of the men whose term of service did not expire with that of the regiment were assigned temporarily to duty with the Fourth and Fifteenth Regiments, but were subsequently consolidated as Companies A, B, and C of the First Battalion, and were mustered out with that organization at Hall's Hill, Va., June 29, 1865.

The regiment was commanded successively by Col. William R. Montgomery, promoted to brigadier-general May 17, 1861; Col. Alfred T. A. Torbert, promoted to brigadier-general of United States volunteers Nov. 29, 1862, to brevet major-general Sept. 9, 1864; and by Col. Mark W. Collett, transferred from the Third Regiment as lieutenant-colonel, and became colonel upon the promotion of Col. Torbert. Col. Collett was killed in action at Fredericksburg, May 3, 1863. The regiment constituted one of the four regiments of the First Brigade of New Jersey Volunteers, and was attached to Gen. Runyon's division of reserve militia at the battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861. It was subsequently organized with Kearney's brigade, Franklin's division; afterwards with the First Brigade, First Division, First Army Corps, then with the First Brigade, First Division, Sixth Army Corps, and at the close of the war was assigned to the Provisional Corps of the Army of the Potomac. It participated in all the principal battles of the war in Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and was present at Lee's surrender at Appomattox, April 9, 1865.*

Its original lieutenant-colonel was Robert McAllister, of Oxford Furnace, Warren Co. He raised a company upon the first call for three years' men, and reported at Trenton early in May, 1861, and on the 21st of that month was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the First Regiment. He was subsequently (1862) colonel of the Eleventh Regiment, and later received the honors of brevet rank as brigadier general for "gallant and distinguished services at Boynton Plank Road," and as major-general "for meritorious services during the war." He shared in the first battle of the war, and participated in the last. His remarkable coolness and intrepidity won the commendation of his superiors. He was mustered out June 6, 1865.

William Henry, Jr. (of Oxford), the lieutenant-colonel of this regiment, enlisted May 21, 1861, and was the first adjutant, dating from May 31, 1861. He was subsequently promoted successively to the rank of major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel. He was wounded a number of times, reported killed at Second Bull Run, but came in the next day limping, and had the pleasure of reading his own obituary. This regiment (and the Second and Third) was mustered into service on the 21st of May; their time, consequently, expired May 21, 1864. Their long service had made them veterans, and they had arranged to return home on the expiration of their service, but this occurring in the midst of the thirty days' fights in the Wilderness, they were asked to remain and see the campaign ended, which they did, remaining in line of battle until June 4, 1864, and out of twenty-seven line-officers in this regiment, including Col. Henry, who were sound on the 21st of May, all but three were killed or wounded; and from over three hundred men engaged in the long fight but one hundred and sixty-one came back to Trenton with Col. Henry, he himself receiving the most serious wound of his life the last hour of the 4th of June.

III.—THE SECOND REGIMENT (THREE YEARS).

The honors won by the famous "Second" are due in part to Sussex County, she furnishing not only some of its best fighting material, but some of its bravest commanders on "field and staff." Company B, representing Sussex County, was organized in May, 1861, and officered by Henry O. Ryerson, Captain; John T. Whitehead, First Lieutenant; Jacob H. Hoffman, Second Lieutenant. Capt. Ryerson, when promoted major, Jan. 20, 1862, was succeeded by John A. Wildrick. Maj. Ryerson became lieutenant-colonel of the Second, July 1, 1862, and subsequently was promoted to be colonel of the Twenty-third Regiment. Capt. Wildrick also received promotion and honors in the Twenty-eighth Regiment, becoming the lieutenant-colonel of that command Feb. 11, 1863. A roster of the Sussex County members of Company B will be found in another chapter. In this connection will be given a brief sketch of the regiment in which this company so faithfully served.

Along with the First, Third, and Fourth Regiments, the Second constituted the "First New Jersey Brigade." This command reached Washington June 29, 1861. It immediately entered upon the active duties of the campaign, and at the battle of Bull Run, amid all the panic and tumult, its members performed the work assigned them without a tremor of unsteadiness.

* See roster of Company D, Second Regiment, in Chapter XV.

At Gaines' Mill, on June 27, 1862, where it was engaged at the most difficult and dangerous parts of the field, the officers and men alike bravely stood their ground amid a most galling fire from the enemy. At one time four companies (D, H, I, and K) of the Second were exposed to the full force of the rebel onset, but with serried ranks and without any support they fought till nightfall. The loss was fifteen killed, forty-eight wounded, and forty-one missing, among the number being Col. Tucker, killed, and Maj. Rycerson, wounded and taken prisoner.

In the fight at Manassas Junction, Aug. 27, 1862, the regiment did valiantly and suffered terribly, its loss being eight killed, thirty-nine wounded, thirty-one missing, and forty-five taken prisoners. Among the officers wounded was Capt. Wildrick, of Company B (Sussex County). Gen. Taylor fell in this engagement, shot through the leg.*

At Crampton's Gap (Sep. 14, 1862) the Second was in the line of battle, which "dashingly met and drove the enemy," carried the heights, and won a victory. But fifty-five of its brave members went down in this charge, although its heroism, and that of the brigade with which it fought, were recorded in "general orders" by the brigade commander, Col. A. T. A. Torbert, in which he said, "Your advance in line of battle under a galling artillery fire and final bayonet charge was a feat seldom if ever surpassed. The heights you took show plainly what determined and well-disciplined soldiers can do."

The Second Regiment, with its brigade, remained in Maryland until Oct. 2, 1862, when, after much toilsome marching, it encamped at Stafford Court-house. It there remained until it joined in the movement against Fredericksburg, in which it participated, and then went into winter quarters. In the ensuing campaigns of 1863—at Salem Church, where the regiment was in the skirmish-line; in the fighting about Chancellorsville, where it lost forty-nine in killed, wounded, and missing; its forced march to Gettysburg and engagement on the picket-line; and through the battles of the "Wilderness," in which its losses were heavy†—it fully sustained its previously-earned reputation for conspicuous bravery. In the charge to retake the "Galt House," Lieut.-Col. Wilbecke, of the Second, was killed.

Its time having expired on May 29, 1864, the regiment left the front and returned to Trenton for muster out. The regiment numbered on its return to New Jersey only three hundred and fifteen officers and enlisted men. It had left the State, in June, 1861, with a full complement of men,—ten hundred and forty-four strong. The major part of the survivors of the old Second were mustered out June 21, 1864; the remaining portion—those whose term of service did not expire with the regiment, and those who had re-enlisted in the field for "three years or the war"—were temporarily assigned to duty with the Fifteenth Regiment. Dec. 20, 1864, they were consolidated into what was known as Company A, Second Battalion, and so remained until the early part of 1865, when the Second Regiment was reorganized and fully completed by the forwarding of recruits, drafted men, etc. It was still in the First Brigade, but its history, until near the close of 1864, was that of the Fifteenth Regiment, with which it was merged, and with whose brave soldiers it fought on several hotly-contested fields. The battles in which it figured after its reorganization were Hatcher's Run, Fort Steedman, Petersburg, Sailor's Creek, Farmville; then came the surrender at Appomattox, April 9, 1865, and the end of the war. On the 24th of May it began its march northward. It was mustered out July 11, 1865, at Hall's Hill, Va.; thence proceeded to Trenton, N. J., where it was disbanded.

IV.—THE THIRD REGIMENT (THREE YEARS).

Capt. James G. Fitts recruited a company in Newton, in April, 1861, under the call for three months' troops. Inside of one hour seventy-two of the men signed the roll on Newton Green. This was the first company raised in Sussex County for the war of the Rebellion. The three months' call being filled, the company was not mustered into the service. Most of these men, however, enlisted for three years in the company subsequently raised, organized, and known as Company D, Third Regiment New Jersey Volunteers. There were in this company at its organization nine men from Warren, nine from Morris, five from Essex, one each from Orange and Hunterdon, two from Camden, and six from other points; the remainder were residents of Sussex County, and their names may be found in a succeeding chapter.

Company E, Capt. Edward L. Campbell, was raised in Warren County, part of them being three months' men, recruited by Capt. Campbell immediately after the first call of President Lincoln, but not then mustered into the service. The captain of this company, First Lieut. William P. Robeson, Jr., Second Lieut. Thomas P. Edwards, Com. Sergt. Nelson S. Easton (promoted to second lieutenant July 18, 1862), Corp. Nehemiah Tunis (promoted to first sergeant), Sergt. Abraham M. Salmon, and a number of privates, were from Belvidere.

The Third Regiment, of which these companies were a component part, was organized by May 18, 1861, and on the 4th of June was mustered into the service of the United States for three years. June 28, 1861, with a full complement of men, it left the State for the seat of war, and was one of the four regiments composing what was generally known as the "First Brigade New Jersey Volunteers." It was first attached to Gen. Runyon's division of reserves (militia), then to the First Brigade (Kearney's) of Franklin's division, afterwards to the First Brigade, First Division, First Army Corps, later to the Sixth Corps, and at the close of the war was assigned to what was known as the Provisional Corps, Army of the Potomac.

Company D participated in most of the engagements in which the regiment took part.* It was at Bull Run, "and aided materially in arresting the retreat of our forces on that fateful day." The Third Regiment was one of the first of the New Jersey commands to suffer loss from the bullets of the enemy; this was August 29th, near Cloud's Mills, when it was ambuscaded and lost six men, two of whom were killed. Eight companies of the Third were the first to reach and take possession of the rebel works at Manassas Junction. June 27, 1862, at Gaines' Farm, Va., it did some splendid fighting. "It was ordered into the woods to relieve Newton's brigade, which was sorely pressed by the enemy. At this point the woods, some four hundred yards in front of our line of battle, swarmed with rebels, who fought with the greatest desperation, handling their artillery especially in the most effective manner, and doing fearful execution on our ranks. The gallant Third, however, bravely stood its ground, opening a galling fire on the enemy, and remaining in the woods until the close of the action." Three times the rebels were driven from the woods, but as often rallied; and if success did not crown the issue of this fight, it was no fault of the "Jersey Brigade" nor any question of the valor of the Third. George W. Taylor, brigadier-general commanding the First Brigade, in his official report of this battle, says,—

"This was the first of my regiments engaged. . . . They were all this time under a galling fire, often a cross-fire, but maintained their ground until near sunset, when the whole line fell back. They had at this time expended (a large majority of the men) their last cartridge, sixty rounds to the man. . . . With their comrades falling around, they stood up like a wall of iron, losing over one-third of their number, and gave not an inch of ground until their ammunition was expended and the retrograde movement became general."

How valiant were the services of the Third in the

* The reports of the adjutant-general of the State of New Jersey show that this regiment took part in the following battles: In 1861, Bull Run and Munson's Hill. In 1862, West Point, Gaines' Farm, Charles City Cross-Roads, Malvern Hill, Manassas, Chantilly, and Fredericksburg, all on Virginia soil, and Crampton's Pass and Antietam, in Maryland. The year 1863 opened with Fredericksburg (May 3), and followed with Salem Heights, Va., Gettysburg, Pa., Fairfield, Pa., Williamsport, Md., Funktown, Md., Rappahannock Station, Va., and Mine Run, Va. The engagements of 1864—Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Spottsylvania Court-house, North and South Anna River, Hanover Court-house, Topotomoy Creek, Cold Harbor, Webber Railroad, Sulker's Gap, Strasburg, Winchester, Charlestown, Opequan, Fisher's Hill, New Market, Mount Jackson, Cedar Creek, and Middletown—were all in Virginia. In 1865, Hatcher's Run, Fort Stedman, capture of Petersburg, Sailor's Creek, Farnville, and Lee's surrender (April 9), likewise all occurred in Virginia.

Wilderness campaign may be conceived from its severe losses, the figures showing twenty-one killed, one hundred and two wounded, and thirty-three missing, a total of one hundred and fifty-six, of which Company D sustained its full share.

From this time until the expiration of its term of service, in June, 1864, the regiment did not engage the enemy (excepting the battle of Cold Harbor, June 1 and 3, 1864), only in desultory fighting, skirmishing, etc., and on the 3d of June left the front en route for New Jersey. It arrived at Trenton on the 7th. The men who there re-enlisted, with those whose term was not expired, were transferred to the Fifteenth Regiment, but Dec. 17, 1864, they were consolidated into what was known as Company A, Third Battalion, and were mustered out with that organization, June 29, 1865.

V.—THE SEVENTH REGIMENT.

This command, in which Sussex was represented by one full company (I), and Warren by Co. E, Capt. Henry E. Cooper, was raised in the summer of 1861. At the urgent request of the general government that the regiment be sent to the seat of war at once, seven companies were dispatched to Washington, September 19th, and on the 20th reported for duty at the capital. The other three companies early in October joined the regiment at that place. Early in December the regiment reported to Gen. Hooker, near Budd's Ferry, Md., and were brigaded, the Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth New Jersey Regiments being designated the Third Brigade in his division, although popularly known in this State as the "Second New Jersey Brigade."

Its first important engagement was the battle of Williamsburg, May 5, 1862. The position of the enemy was one of great strength, with Fort Magruder in the centre, flanked on either side, as far as eye could reach, with a cordon of redoubts, and further strengthened by innumerable rifle-pits and a vast stretch of tangled abatis. Their cannon swept the whole undulating plain in front of the redoubts. "The Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth were sent into a woods to the left of the road, in front of a line of field-works. The rain was falling in torrents, and the men stood half-leg deep in mire and water. Steadily advancing through the underbrush, the gallant regiments soon came upon the enemy's forces, and at once opened a vigorous fire. Here, for three hours, the conflict raged with desperate fury. The fire of the enemy was pitilessly destructive, and did not slacken for a moment. But the brave fellows into whose faces it was poured stood firmly and unflinchingly,—sometimes, indeed, pushed back a little space, but as surely hurling the rebels, bleeding and shattered, to their works. . . . At last the enemy, driven to desperation (and reinforced), rushed forward in overwhelming numbers, pouring a terrific fire into our whole line. Then, at last, that brave line wavered. Their ammunition exhausted, their muskets rusted by the drenching rain, their ranks terribly thinned, exhausted by want of food and a difficult march, these heroes of the day, before this last overwhelming onset, fell slowly back. But not defeated. They held the enemy in check, frustrating every attempt to flank our position, and so saved the division, which but for this stubborn resistance would have been swept in disaster from the field." The rebel works were finally carried and victory was ours, but purchased at great cost of life in all the regiments engaged. The casualties of the Seventh were twenty-seven killed, eighty-six wounded, and ten missing, among the wounded being the commanding officer of the regiment, Lieut.-Col. Carman. In the official report of Maj. Francis Price, Jr. (who assumed command of the Seventh after Lieut.-Col. Carman was shot), he says, "All behaved gallantly, . . . but I cannot but notice the coolness and bravery of Capt. H. C. Bartlett (Company C), Capt. L. D. Sinnes (Company I), Capt. James M. Brown (Company K), Lieuts. Witherell (Company F), Thompson (Company A), Hart (Company E), and Harrison (Company C), Sergt. Crane (Company C), Sergt. Mallory (Company C), Acting Color-Sergt. Onslow (Company F), and Private John Taylor, who all displayed unflinching courage, coupled with remarkable coolness, under the heavy fire to which they were exposed." At Fair Oaks and White Oak Swamp the Seventh behaved as admirably as at Williamsburg. At Chancellorsville it captured five stand of colors and over three hundred prisoners. Louis R. Francine had now become colonel, and Francis Price, Jr., lieutenant-colonel, of the regiment.

Gettysburg occurred soon after, and in its tempest of battle-hail the Seventh lost one hundred and fourteen officers and men, Cols. Francine and Price being among those who received serious wounds.

At Spotsylvania Court-house the Seventh, with its brigade (now known as the Third Brigade of the Third Division), charged upon Ewell's corps with "a thundering cheer," surprising and overwhelming the rebels in their trenches, capturing thirty guns and three thousand prisoners. Capt. Crane, of the Seventh, with a squad of men, succeeded not only in capturing a gun, but in manning it and turning its fire on the enemy, who showed a disposition to advance. Capt. Evans lost his life while thus engaged.

Feb. 5, 1865, the Seventh again did valiant service in the line of battle at the Tucker House, near Hatcher's Run. All the regiments of McAllister's brigade (in which was the Seventh) nobly stood their ground, but two regiments of Gen. Smyth's division, stationed on their left, gave way, leaving a gap through which the enemy might pass, enabling them to assault our troops upon the flank and from the rear, and thus endanger the Federal position. McAllister, seeing the danger, directed the Seventh New Jersey, near the left of his line, to form at a different angle, and in a position from which it could oblique its fire. The enemy, thus assailed by a terrible cross-fire, recoiled, but, after a short lull, massing his columns heavily, again dashed forward, only to be repulsed. Soon as the night closed in the rebel general Mahone, with his famous "fighting division," made a rush for the gap in our lines, but again the assailing columns were rolled back, and victory crowned the Union arms. In this engagement the New Jersey brigade kept at bay three full rebel divisions. In the official reports of the commanding general the Seventh was conspicuously mentioned for its part in this affair, as it was in many subsequent ones, until the close of the campaign, April 9th, when it was officially announced that Lee had surrendered.

In the spring of 1862, Company B was disbanded and its men transferred to the different companies of the regiment. About the same time an independent company, commanded by Capt. E. G. Sloat, was assigned to the Seventh, and became Company B. Those of the original members of the regiment who did not re-enlist were mustered out Oct. 7, 1864. The final discharge of the Seventh occurred June 4, 1865, at Washington, D. C.

The record of the Seventh is a brilliant one, and its history must occupy a prominent place in the annals of Hooker's division and of the Second and Third Corps, covering as it does nearly all the movements and battles of the Army of the Potomac.

VI.—THE NINTH REGIMENT.

In this command Warren and Sussex Counties were both honorably represented, the former by Company J, commanded, at the time of its muster into service, by Capt. Joseph J. Henry, of Oxford, who was not only the first volunteer from that township in the great civil war, but the first officer from the State of New Jersey to fall in battle; the latter county by nearly one-half of Company E.

This regiment was raised in the fall of 1861 as a twelve-company rifle corps; it remained at Camp Olden, Trenton, until the 4th of December, when it proceeded to Washington, and at once began an active participation in the movements and battles of the Virginia campaign. During the Burnside expedition, Col. Allen and Dr. Weller, the surgeon, were drowned at Hatteras Inlet, Jan. 15, 1862, but Lieut.-Col. Heckman, of Phillipsburg, Adjt. Zabriskie, and some others, being expert swimmers, escaped. Lieut.-Col. Heckman then assumed command of the regiment.

The first engagement was that of Roanoke Island, where at the outset Capt. J. J. Henry, of Company H, and Isaac V. D. Blackwell, of Company F, were killed, and Corp. John Loranee and Private John Bural, of Company K, were severely wounded. Private Austin Armstrong, of Company H (of Hope), was the first volunteer of the company (and it is thought the first in the regiment); he was the second man shot in this engagement, a ball striking him in the forehead and killing him instantly. Few cases of greater individual bravery are recorded than that of Corp. Lorance, of Carpenter's Landing, N. J. (See Foster's "New Jersey and the Rebellion," p. 210.) For its bravery in this action the Ninth Regiment was ordered by Gen. Burnside to have the words "Roanoke Island, Feb. 8, 1862," emblazoned on its banner.*

The regiment performed nobly in the battles of Newbern, Young's Cross-Roads, at Tarborough, Kinston, before Petersburg, and in all the achievements of the army in Virginia and North Carolina, in which it participated, fully sustained the honor of their State.

Col. Charles A. Heckman, of Warren County, was born in Easton, Pa., in 1822, served in the Mexican war, and in 1861 served for three months in the First Pennsylvania Regiment, then returned to Phillipsburg. Soon after, he was made major of the Ninth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and was promoted to colonel of the same, later to the rank of brigadier-general, and subsequently received a major-general's brevet. Gen. Heckman "became conspicuous as a soldier of the highest accomplishments. Insensible to fear, he was always at the head of his columns. His voice is singularly loud and sonorous, and in the noise of battle his commands pierced the tumult like the blast of a trumpet."

James Stewart, Jr., a native of Warren County (born in 1840), who finally became the colonel of the Ninth, was brevetted a brigadier-general before the close of the war. He went into service as first lieutenant of the Oxford company (H), and came home, at the close of the war, at the head of his regiment, with merited honors and a hearty welcome.

Dec. 24, 1862, a beautiful stand of colors costing seven hundred dollars, the gift of the New Jersey Legislature, was presented to the Ninth, the following resolutions, among others, passed by the Legislature, accompanying the gift:

"Resolved, That the Ninth Regiment of New Jersey Volunteers, by their patient endurance under privation and fatigue, and by their courage at the ever-to-be-remembered battles of Roanoke and Newbern (a courage evinced by the havoc made in their own unwavering columns better than by the reports of partial journals), have sustained the high reputation which, since the days of the Revolution, has belonged to the soldiers of New Jersey, and as evidence of our appreciation of that same of every manly virtue, 'patriotic devotion to country,' the Governor of the State is requested to have prepared and forwarded to said regiment a standard on which shall be inscribed these words: 'Presented by New Jersey to her Ninth Regiment, in remembrance of Roanoke and Newbern.'

"Resolved, That Col. Chas. A. Heckman, who so gallantly led his well-ordered men to the conflict, is requested, at the proper time, to report to the clerk of the House of Assembly the names of those who fell, killed or mortally wounded, on either of the said battle-fields; and that the clerk of the House is, by virtue of this resolution, ordered to enter their names, with the place where they fell, on the minutes of the Assembly of New Jersey, as men who have fallen in defense of the best government of the world," etc.

These colors, well worn and battle-scarred, were returned to the State authorities in October, 1864, accompanied by Color-Sergt. George Meyers (and one hundred and eight men of the Ninth whose term of service had expired), and a letter of transmittal to Governor Parker from James Stewart, Jr., colonel commanding, dated Carolina City, N. C., October 15th, in which he said,—

"Sir,—I herewith have the honor to forward to you for safe keeping in the archives of New Jersey the national and State colors of the Ninth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry. Three years ago they were intrusted to our hands. How well we have performed our trust our past record must show. In every engagement they have been with us, and, battle-worn and bullet-riddled as they are, we can proudly look upon them with the consciousness that not upon a single thread is there the least speck of dishonor or shame. . . . Understanding it to be your intention to furnish the regiment with new national and State emblems, we can only say we shall be gratified to receive them, and it shall ever be our utmost endeavor to preserve them as unscathed as are those we now place in your hands. I have the honor to remain, etc."

A few days later a new stand of colors was presented by the State.

The regiment was mustered out of service July 12, 1865. It had participated in forty-two battles and engagements. Eight officers offered their lives a sacrifice on the nation's altar, while twenty-three received wounds in battle. Sixty-one enlisted men were killed, and four hundred wounded. Forty-three men died from wounds, and one hundred from disease. The total loss of the Ninth from all causes was one thousand six hundred and forty-six. No fact could more strikingly exhibit the destructive nature of the campaigns in which the regiment participated than this, clearly authenticated by official reports.†

VII.—THE ELEVENTH REGIMENT.

This regiment, which contained many field- and line-officers as well as enlisted men from the counties of Sussex and Warren, was from the time it left the State for the front, in the summer of 1862, until the close of its service particularly noticeable for its bravery and patriotic gallantry. It was first engaged at Fredericksburg, and received the proud congratulations of its brave commander; again, at Chancellorsville, it shared in the honor of having saved the army in one of the most desperate struggles of the war. The heroic deeds of that day, performed by officers and privates alike, will never be fully told.‡ "They had repelled five fierce charges, mainly with the bayonet, had captured eight flags (all taken by the New Jersey troops), and taken many prisoners without losing any." Col. McAllister, Lieut.-Col.

† See sketch of the regiment in John Y. Foster's "New Jersey in the Rebellion."

‡ Sergeant Lauterman, of Company H, I considered one of the bravest men in the regiment. At Chancellorsville, after the two lines had been hotly engaged for some time, he went directly to the front and ascertained the enemy's position. His bravery was the coolest I ever witnessed. He was killed at Spottsylvania, May 12th.—Report of Adj. Schooner.

Moore, and Adj. Schoonover were among the last to leave the field, and at one time, fighting alone, were almost surrounded by the enemy. Lieut.-Col. Schoonover, in a letter written after the close of the war, says, "I think the regiment made one of its best fights at Chancellorsville, taking into consideration the mass of fugitives it met from the Eleventh Corps while going into position; its coolness deserves special mention." Gen. Hooker said, "It fought splendidly; officers and men alike deserve credit." Gen. Carr added his commendation of their brave conduct. From Col. McAllister's official report we learn that the regiment lost in this battle twenty killed and one hundred and fifteen wounded. Lieuts. Bloomfield and Kelly were among the killed.

At Gettysburg, as the Eleventh was about to fire its first volley, Col. McAllister fell, severely wounded in two places. Yet the regiment continued its fight with great steadiness, notwithstanding Capt. Kearney, Martin, Logan, and Ackerman were killed and nearly all the remaining officers were wounded, while the ranks had been terribly thinned by the fire of the enemy, its losses being twenty-four killed and one hundred and thirty wounded,—one hundred and fifty-four in all. In Adj. Schoonover's report of the battle he pays a high tribute to the bravery of the regiment, and especially mentions the gallantry of Capt. Lloyd, Lieuts. Buckley, Baldwin, and Corey, and Corp. Thomas Johnson, of Company I, who took the colors and advanced with them to the front after two color-bearers had been shot down. In the battles of the Wilderness, at Spotsylvania, and in all future engagements it ably sustained its fighting reputation. June 15, 1875, it reached Trenton, N. J., and was disbanded.

Maj.-Gen. Robert McAllister, a Warren County man, was distinguished for his patriotic services. Leaving his home at Oxford Furnace, raising a company at the outbreak of the war, he was appointed and served as lieutenant-colonel of the First, and later as colonel of the Eleventh Regiment. As ranking colonel he commanded brigades in the Third and Second Corps, and was brevetted successively brigadier-general and major-general. "Not a soldier of the schools, he yet had what is better than all the knowledge of the books,—perfect and entire fearlessness, joined with the sturdiest tenacity of purpose; and these making him a leader, and so an inspiration to his followers, gave him success in the most desperate and exhausting straits, and secured him a place by common voice among the 'fighting generals' of the war, whose hearts, as well as their hands, were in the work to which they had been called. He was hardly less distinguished for the blamelessness of his life in camp and his conscientious devotion to his duties as a Christian." Capt. Cline, of the Eleventh, says, "He was a self-denying, laborious officer. And he knew no danger. There was no affectation in his fervid patriotism, no absorbing ambition for military renown in his desire to meet the foe, but a quiet determination and an inflexible firmness which were not always seen. He was throughout a Christian officer."

COL. JOHN SCHOONOVER.

Simeon Schoonover, father of Col. John, born in 1807, resides at Bushkill, Pa., and has carried on plow- and wagon-manufacturing for many years. His mother was Sarah Heller, who was born in 1817.

John Schoonover

The children of Simeon and Sarah Schoonover are Anos, who was a captain in the Eleventh New Jersey Regiment in the late Rebellion; Elizabeth; Henry B., of Scranton, Iowa, who served as a private in the One Hundred and Forty-sixth Pennsylvania; Anna; Ellen; William R., a physician of Oswego, Ind.; Martha; Edward, of Bushkill, Pa.; and John John, subject of this sketch.

John Schoonover was born at Bushkill, Pa., Aug. 12, 1839. He obtained his education at the common school of his native place, and under the instruction of Rev. J. K. Davis, of Smithfield, Pa. At the age of sixteen he became a teacher, and for several years thereafter was engaged in teaching and preparing for college. Fired with patriotism for the welfare of his country, upon the breaking out of the Rebellion he was among the first to show his courage and devotion to the Union cause under the first call for three months' men. We quote a sketch of his career in the army from Foster, found in his "History of New Jersey and the Rebellion:" "John Schoonover joined the First New Jersey Regiment at its organization as a private, and served with the knapsack and musket for about a year, being subsequently made commissary-sergeant, in which position he remained until the Eleventh Regiment was raised, when he was made its adjutant, serving with marked credit in all the campaigns of the regiment prior to the battle of Gettysburg. He was especially recommended by Gen. Carr for gallant conduct in that battle, at which, Colonel McAllister being wounded, he assumed command of the regiment, which he retained until the 17th of September following.

"He was made lieutenant-colonel of the regiment in August, 1863, and served, most of the time in command, in all the subsequent campaigns of the Army of the Potomac. He was brevetted colonel for gallantry in action before Petersburg, and also for meritorious conduct in the campaign ending in the surrender of Lee's army. He was three times wounded,—at Gettysburg, Spotsylvania, and Cold Harbor.

"Col. Schoonover was, under all circumstances, a courageous and efficient soldier and commander, and was highly esteemed by all who knew him, not only for his soldierly qualities, but for his exalted character and genuine worth as a man."

Chaplain Cline says of Col. Schoonover, "He ever showed himself to be a man of rare excellence, of great firmness and energy, of a dauntless courage which never calculated danger when a duty was to be performed, a high sense of right, and unflinching adherence to its obligations, with intellectual endowments of a superior order, and social qualities which won the affection and admiration of all his associates. Kind-hearted to his command, never exacting from them any unnecessary work, and always ready to do everything in his power for their comfort and happiness, he was universally beloved and honored, and there was scarcely one who would not have given his life, if needs be, to save his. Brave himself and ever in the front of the battle, he took them there; and in camp his regiment was in the highest state of discipline and order."

CHAPTER XIV.

I.—FIFTEENTH INFANTRY (THREE YEARS).

This regiment was recruited in the northern part of the State, and had in its composition three companies from Sussex and two from Warren County, the remaining half of the organization being from the adjoining counties of Hunterdon, Morris, and Somerset. The regiment was rendezvoused at Flemington, N. J., during the summer of 1862, and mustered into the service on the 25th of August, under command of Col. Samuel Fowler. The other regimental officers were: Lieutenant-Colonel, Edward L. Campbell;* Major, James M. Brown; Adjutant, William P. Seymour; Quartermaster, Lowe Emerson; Surgeon, Redford Sharp; Assistant Surgeons, George R. Sullivan and George Trumppore. The names of the commissioned officers and enlisted men composing the companies from Warren and Sussex may be seen on a succeeding page.

August 27th the regiment, nine hundred and twenty-five strong, left its camp at Flemington for the front. On its arrival at the capital it was marched to Tenallytown, and there at once placed on fatigue duty in the building of roads and erection of defenses; among which latter was the construction of the formidable work named "Fort Kearney," in honor of that brave and dashing New Jersey general, who gave his life on the field of Chantilly at almost the precise time when the men of the Fifteenth commenced their work on the fortification.

The regiment moved from Tenallytown on the 30th of September to join the victorious Army of the Potomac on the battle-field of Antietam, and, by special request of the corps, division, and brigade commanders, was assigned to the First Brigade, First Division, Sixth Corps,—the already veteran "First New Jersey Brigade." From this time forward to the close of the war its history is that of the famous Sixth Corps.

Its official fighting record, as made up by the adjutant-general of the State, is as follows: Fredericksburg, Va., Dec. 13 and 14, 1862; Chancellorsville, Va., May 3, 1863; Salem Heights, Va., May 3 and 4, 1863; Franklin's Crossing, Va., June 6 to 14, 1863; Gettysburg, Pa., July 2 and 3, 1863; Fairfield, Pa., July 5, 1863; Funktown, Md., July 10, 1863; Rappahannock Station, Va., Oct. 12, 1863; Rappahannock Station, Va., Nov. 7, 1863; Mine Run, Va., Nov. 30, 1863; Wilderness, Va., May 5 to 7, 1864; Spotsylvania, Va., May 8 to 11, 1864; Spotsylvania Court-house, Va., May 12 to 16, 1864; North and South Anna River, Va., May 24, 1864; Hanover Court-house, Va., May 29, 1864; Tolopotomy Creek, Va., May 30 and 31, 1864; Cold Harbor, Va., June 1 to 11, 1864; before Petersburg, Va., June 16 to 22, 1864; Weldon Railroad, Va., June 23, 1864; Snickers'

* Lieut.-Col. Campbell, who was already in the field with the Army of the Potomac, did not join the Fifteenth until the 1st of October, when the regiment was on its march to the Sixth Corps in Maryland. Lieut.-Col. Campbell was made colonel by brevet Oct. 19, 1864, brevet brigadier-general April 9, 1865, and promoted to the colonelcy of the Fourth Regiment May 29, 1865. In Maryland, upon the illness of Col. Fowler, he took command of the Third Regiment, which position he held during most of the time it was in the service, leading it in nearly every great battle in which it participated. One who served with the regiment says, "If the Fifteenth ever performed any efficient service for the country, or by its conduct reflected any honor upon New Jersey, it was due more to Edward L. Campbell than to any other man. His bravery, integrity, capacity, and diligence stamped the regiment with a character whose value was known in many critical junctures and hard-fought battles."

The regiment received its baptism of fire at the great battle of Fredericksburg, Dec. 13, 1862. During the greater part of that bloody day the Fifteenth was posted along the line of the railroad, keeping up a steady fire and making occasional charges, but with light loss. At about four o'clock the Jersey brigade made a more determined attempt on the position in its immediate front, but was forced back with a greater loss than it had before sustained, many being taken prisoners, among whom were a number of men of the Fifteenth. This charge was the last of the regiment's fighting for the day. Its total loss at Fredericksburg was about thirty, of whom very few were killed outright. Michael Mulvey (Company G) was the first man of the regiment killed. The next morning the regiment was relieved at the front by the One Hundred and Twenty-first New York Regiment. The Fifteenth went into camp at White Oak Church, and there passed the dreary winter. The next spring, with the army under command of Gen. Hooker, the Fifteenth crossed the Rappahannock, and participated in the battle of Chancellorsville. Of the part taken by the Fifteenth in the battle of Salem Heights, May 3d and 4th, Lieut.-Col. Campbell, commanding the regiment, in his report (dated May 11th), says,—

"My command broke camp at White Oak Church, Va., on the afternoon of Tuesday, April 28th, and marched to the bank of the Rappahannock, near Franklin's Crossing, where it bivouacked until towards morning, when it was moved to the river and crossed in boats just before daylight on the morning of the 29th, taking up a position on the south bank. Remained there until the morning of the 3d of May, when I was ordered to the front at about daybreak, and was assigned a position in support of a battery on the extreme left which was hotly engaging the enemy. Remained upon this duty, taking up various positions, and part of the time exposed to a severe scattering flank fire from the enemy's line of skirmishers, until the enemy was driven from his position on the heights above Fredericksburg and the line on the left was ordered to retire towards that place, when I was left in the rear as a support to our retiring skirmishers. Everything was brought from the field without difficulty. . . . Arriving some distance out of the city, on the plank-road, I learned that the enemy was making a stout resistance in front, and that the First Brigade was about to engage him. Marching as rapidly as practicable, I arrived at the front at about five o'clock P.M., and, without halting, was immediately ordered by the general commanding the corps to engage the enemy on the right of the road, in a thick wood in which they had taken a position and effectually resisted any attempt to dislodge him. My command advanced about one hundred yards through a dense, and in places impassable, undergrowth, to within about thirty yards of the enemy's position, where it engaged at least four of his regiments, with, as I am convinced, a terrible effect, but without driving him from his well-chosen position. Just at dark, my ammunition being entirely exhausted and the enemy's fire destructive, I retired in good order, the enemy showing no disposition to follow. I have the satisfaction of saying for my command that not a man left the line of battle except the wounded, and when the rolls were called, immediately upon arriving in the open field, every man was present or properly accounted for except those who were killed, wounded, or missing in action, the latter being but five, and all probably killed or wounded. My wounded were all brought off during or after the action, except possibly the five mentioned above, not found on account of the dense undergrowth of bushes.

"On Sunday night (May 31) my command bivouacked upon the battle-field. During the engagement of Monday I was assigned to various positions, a part of the time in support of batteries. When at night the artillery was ordered towards the river, I was ordered to follow it. Recrossed the river just before daylight in the morning, and went into camp on the north bank. On Friday, the 8th inst., marched to my present place of encampment. I would respectfully call attention to the conduct of Lieut.-Col. Campbell. He was seen in the thickest of the fight, and repeatedly he went to the front alone, trying to get not only his own men, but those of other regiments, to follow. I am much indebted to our chaplain [Haines] for his services in transmitting orders, and attending to the wounded. All my officers behaved well, especially when taking into consideration that it was their first engagement."

After a few weeks of quiet the Fifteenth, with the army of Gen. Hooker, pressed northward by forced marches, arriving in the afternoon of July 21 at Gettysburg, where the great battle was already in progress. At about a half-hour before sunset the brigade was moved to the front, to hold a position from which Sickles' corps had been compelled to retire. But no further assault was made that evening. Through all the carnage of the following day, including the tremendous charge of Pickett's Confederate corps, the Fifteenth, with its brigade, stood constantly in line, ready for work, but was not ordered in. Upon the retreat of the Confederate legions, on the 5th, the Fifteenth took part in the pursuit and in minor engagements at Fairfield, Pa., and Funkstown, Md., and crossed the river into Virginia with the main body of the army. During the remainder of the year it participated in the various movements of the Sixth Corps, and in December, 1863, went into winter quarters near Bandy Station, Va.

In the spring of 1864 opened the bloody campaign of the "Wilderness." Lieut.-Gen. Grant was now in command of the armies. In this campaign the Fifteenth saw its most desperate fighting, and sustained the severest losses experienced during its term of service. May 5th it was slightly engaged, suffering some losses, as also on the 6th and 7th. On the 8th the Jersey brigade was sent to the assistance of Gen. Warren, whose corps had met with a check. "After some manoeuvring the Fifteenth, with the Third (as a skirmish-line), was selected to make an assault on the enemy and develop his position and strength. No charge was ever more gallantly delivered. With two armies looking on, it advanced across an open field; when within about three hundred yards of the front of the wood in which the enemy was posted it fixed bayonets, and with a line of glittering steel as steady as on dress-parade dashed up to the rebel position, to find them strongly entrenched and in full force. As far as rifle-shot could reach, upon each flank they opened upon the devoted little band. Notwithstanding the deadly fire, it drove the enemy out of the work in its front, captured two prisoners, and, to save annihilation, was ordered by its commander to retire. One hundred and one of its brave officers and men were left upon the field, killed or wounded. It may be doubted if a more perilous forlorn hope was ever more daringly executed."

The following day the regiment (with the First) was detached to turn the right flank of the enemy and gain possession of a cross-roads. The next morning they drove the rebel skirmish-line before them for about a mile, and struck the right of the enemy's line, strongly entrenched on the top of a hill, which position was afterwards known as the "bloody angle." The two regiments attacked vigorously, but were forced back. Later, reinforced by two more regiments, they again attacked, but could not dislodge the enemy, although they held their own position. On the 12th occurred one of the most stubbornly-contested struggles of the war. It was for the possession of the "bloody angle." In the attack the Fifteenth was on the extreme right of the front line. It charged with fixed bayonets and carried the work, capturing a stand of colors and all the rebels who did not fall or run. "It was the only regiment of the Sixth Corps which got inside the enemy's fortifications that day." But this desperate charge was at fearful cost: one hundred and fifty men of the regiment were swept away in a half hour; more than half the rank and file and seven of the most valued officers fell, killed or wounded, inside or near the hostile works. Out of four hundred and twenty-nine men and fourteen line-officers who crossed the Rapidan on the 4th, only one hundred and twenty-two men and four officers remained.*

The losses in the Warren and Sussex companies of the Fifteenth during the eleven days succeeding the crossing of the Rapidan, to the close of its fighting in the neighborhood of Spottsylvania Court-house, May 4 to 15, 1864, are given as follows:

Capt. Hamilton and many others in the above list reported as "wounded" subsequently died of their injuries.

Moving southward in the flank movement to Petersburg, the regiment became engaged at the North and South Anna Rivers, at Hanover Court-house, at Tolopotomy, and at Cold Harbor. On the last-named field it suffered a loss of twenty-five. "In the charge," says Foster, "the Fifteenth and Tenth Regiments reached a position on a hillock, which they held when the line was broken on either side of them, and which they began to intrench upon at sundown. On this little hillock they remained for the greater part of the next ten days, and from it many never came alive. The firing from the enemy was almost constant, and whenever a man raised his head above the surface he was almost certain to be struck. . . . The dust, the great heat, the confined space, and the dead bodies buried just under the surface soon rendered the place most offensive. Day after day passed, line after line of works was constructed, the number of dead and wounded increased, but still the regiment was not taken from this horrible place till, on the night of the 12th [June], it marched for James River."

In the subsequent campaign in the Shenandoah valley the Fifteenth took conspicuous part and fully sustained its reputation. It fought at Strasburg and at Winchester, losing seventy men in the two engagements. At Opequan it lost about fifty men, killed and wounded. On the 21st of August it lost seventeen more. It behaved gallantly at Fisher's Hill on the 22d, and took part in the pursuit of the flying enemy to Staunton.

October 19th, at Cedar Creek,—the famous battlefield to which Sheridan rode "from Winchester, twenty miles away,"—after parts of the Eighth and Nineteenth Corps had been surprised and routed, "the Sixth Corps moved rapidly by a flank across the track of their advance, and the Jersey brigade occupied the most advanced and difficult position, holding it firmly under severe fire." In this action all the color-guard except three were slain. Col. Campbell was wounded, and Maj. Lambert Boeman (previously of the Fifteenth, but then in command of the Tenth New Jersey) was killed. Corp. Mowder fell dead, and the rebels seized the State colors from his stiffening hand. This, the only flag the regiment ever lost, was retaken that night, and returned next day to the Fifteenth. This was the last fight of the Fifteenth in the Shenandoah valley. In December it rejoined, with its corps, the Army of the Potomac before Petersburg. It was never again heavily engaged, though a participant in the final assault of April 2, 1865. Upon the surrender of Lee the Fifteenth was sent to Danville, Va., from whence, after five or six weeks' bivouac, it was, in the latter part of May, transported to Trenton, N. J., where it was disbanded, and the surviving members (eighteen officers and three hundred and ninety-eight enlisted men) returned to their homes.*

The number of deaths which occurred in the regiment during its term of service was: From disease, ninety-nine; from wounds, two hundred and forty-seven; in rebel prisons, fifteen; total, three hundred and sixty-one.

On Tuesday, Oct. 19, 1880, the sixteenth anniversary of the battle of Cedar Creek, in which the Fifteenth New Jersey Infantry Regiment had a proud participation, was celebrated at Hackettstown, Warren Co., and for the first time its members met together since they had been mustered out of service. It was a memorable occasion,—one of the most pleasant social reunions that has ever been witnessed in this part of the State. Among the several hundred veterans present were Gen. (late Lieut.-Col.) Edward L. Campbell, Maj. E. W. Davis, Chaplain A. A. Haines, Adjt. Edmund D. Halsey, Capt. James S. McDanolds, Capt. James Penrose, Capt. Lewis Van Blarcom (who lost a leg at Spottsylvania), Sergt. Larson, and Corp. Jacob Stutz, of Company F, who each captured at Spottsylvania a Confederate flag. Chaplain Haines, of Hamburg, this county, was appointed historian and requested to prepare a complete history of the regiment. A permanent organization was effected, with the following officers: President, Gen. E. L. Campbell; Secretary, Adjt. E. D. Halsey; Treasurer, Chaplain A. A. Haines. A few prefatory sentences from the address delivered on this occasion by the latter are presented:

"COMRADES,—After fifteen years we meet again! How impressive are the circumstances which call us together! We who gather to-day, the survivors of that noble regiment that eighteen years ago New Jersey sent forth to the battle-field, are but a little band. In war and in peace has death been making inroads upon our ranks, and the brave and the noble have been leaving us. Yet what band of men are bound together by more hallowed associations? Tender and strong are the ties that link us. Words fail, and tongues of mortals cannot speak of the emotions that come from our full hearts and choke our utterance and blind our eyes, as we clasp hands once more and listen to well-remembered voices. We have passed through more than the mere baptism of blood. In thirty-six battles have bullets and shells been hurled in deadly fire upon our battalions. In thirty-six battles have we seen our comrades pour out their precious blood for the land they loved, and often from our own wounds have the red drops fallen on the Virginia soil. Few regiments ever suffered so heavy losses in actual killed and disabled on the field of battle. We never turned our backs on the foe; and, when other regiments might break, though torn and bleeding, we never yielded a position we were sent to hold."

II.—THE TWENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.

The Twenty-seventh New Jersey Infantry Regiment was raised in Morris and Sussex Counties, the latter furnishing as full companies those bearing the letters A, D, H, and K, and one-third or more of companies E and F, being fully the one-half the regiment. It rendezvoused at "Camp Frelinghuysen," Newark, and was mustered in Sept. 3, 1862, for nine months' service. The full strength of the command was one thousand and eighty-eight members, embraced in eleven companies. Its "officers and men, alike in physical strength and robust capacities of endurance, were equal to any in the service."

It left the State for the field Oct. 9, 1862, being at that time officered as follows: Colonel, George W. Mindil; Lieutenant-Colonel, Edwin S. Babcock; Major, Augustus D. Blanchet; Adjutant, William H. Lambert; Quartermaster, James B. Titman; Surgeon, John B. Richmond, M.D.; Assistant Surgeon, J. H. Stiger, M.D.; Chaplain, Rev. John Faulk. Its companies were at the same time commanded by Capt. Charles F. Fernald (A), John T. Alexander (B), David S. Allen (C), Thomas Anderson (D), George W. Crane (E), Daniel Bailey (F), James Plant (G), Samuel Dennis (H), Alfred H. Condit (I), Edward S. Baldwin (K), and Henry F. Willis (L).

It arrived in Washington October 11th, and on the 29th of that month crossed into Virginia, going into camp near Alexandria. December 10th it was assigned to the Second Brigade, First Division, Ninth Army Corps.

On the 12th of December it crossed the Rappahannock, and was for the first time exposed to the fire of the enemy. Although not brought into close conflict, the regiment was sufficiently exposed to test the bravery and trustworthiness of its officers and men.

In February, 1863, the Twenty-seventh proceeded to Newport News via Aquia Creek, and there went into camp, establishing it in city style with eleven streets, each graded and guttered and bordered by sidewalks. Although but the temporary home of the regiment, it was the comment of all visitors and the pride of its members.

March 19, 1863, the regiment broke camp, and at the landing disembarked on the steamer "John A. Warner" for Baltimore; thence it moved by rail to Parkersburg, W. Va., and by steamer to Cincinnati, Ohio, where it was reviewed by Gen. Burnside, who had been assigned to the command of the Department of the Ohio. The Twenty-seventh then proceeded to Lexington, and was the first Eastern regiment to move into Central Kentucky in aid of our cavalry, who, weak in numbers, were heroically struggling against the advancing forces of the enemy. The remainder of March and the fore-part of April were spent in marches and in support of the Union cavalry in their operations in the vicinity of Heckman's Bridge, Stanford, etc. At Stanford the Twenty-seventh was joined by the regiments with which it was brigaded in Virginia. This infantry force moved, on the evening of April 26, 1863, to Somerset, Ky., there joining a cavalry expedition which, under command of Col. Wolford, was sent out to repel the rebel marauders from the southern counties of the State. Returning from this, the object accomplished, the regiment met with a sad calamity in crossing the Cumberland River, near Somerset, Ky., on the 6th of May. "As the flat containing almost the last detachment of the Twenty-seventh—some fifty men—had reached the middle of the stream, the men who were pulling it across suddenly and unaccountably loosened their hold of the rope, and the boat, swinging around broadside to the current, drifted rapidly down the stream towards the lower rope, by which the artillery were crossing. . . . As they neared it a number of the men leaped up suddenly to grasp it; the sudden rush to the one side and the abrupt check to the progress of the flat caused it to dip, fill with water, and precipitate the men headlong into the river. . . . A few managed to reach the shore, . . . but the gallant and veteran officer Capt. Alexander, with thirty-two men, was carried to the bottom and drowned." . . . Of those who perished, three were from Walpack and one from Stillwater, Sussex Co.

The term of service of the Twenty-seventh expired June 3, 1863, but it continued in the field until the 15th,* when it took up its homeward march, and was mustered out of service at Newark, N. J., July 2, 1863.

CHAPTER XV.

I.—THE HARRIS LIGHT CAVALRY.

Two companies of the Harris Light (Second New York) Cavalry were raised by Gen. (then Lieut.-Col.) Judson Kilpatrick almost exclusively in Sussex County. The larger part of Company A was recruited by Lieut. George V. Griggs, of Newton. This company was filled up to the required number after reaching New York by a few enlistments in the city and several recruits from the vicinity of Orange, N. J. Company B was raised to the full standard before leaving Newton. Henry Grinton took an active part in raising this company, and was made its first lieutenant. Edwin F. Cooke, son of Rev. Sylvester Cooke, of the Clove Presbyterian Church, was selected by Gen. Kilpatrick to be captain of Company B.

The men were enrolled at the Cochran House, in Newton, on the morning of Aug. 5, 1861, and left for New York on the afternoon train under charge of Kilpatrick. A large crowd of people assembled at the depot to bid them farewell, but few, if any, realized the important part they were to play in the great war, and that, however brilliant their services might be, New York, and not New Jersey, would receive the credit.

Upon arriving in New York the men were quartered at the Westchester House for the night, and the next morning were duly mustered into the United States service for three years or during the war. Lieut. Griggs returned to Sussex to gather more recruits, Capt. Cooke to settle his affairs at home, and the men were sent, August 9th, to form a camp of instruction at Searsdale, under Capt. A. N. Duffie, who had been appointed to Company A, and who had previously seen service in the French army. A young Englishman by the name of George Tall reported for duty as second lieutenant, and was assigned to Company B. Lieut. Griggs also reported at the camp with a sufficient number of men to fill his company. Two companies from Connecticut, under charge of Capt. W. H. Mallory, joined the camp, and others followed in quick succession. Late in August the "Sussex squadron" (as it was always called) and the Connecticut squadron were taken by Kilpatrick to Washington, where, east of the Capitol, he established a camp, which he called "Camp Sussex." Here the regiment rapidly filled up, and was fully organized, with J. Mansfield Davies as colonel, Kilpatrick as lieutenant-colonel, and Henry E. Davies, Jr., as major. Companies A and B were detailed to accompany the brigade of Col. E. D. Baker, the white-haired senator, to Poolesville, Md., where they witnessed, but did not participate in, the battle of Ball's Bluff. It was these men who, leaving their horses on the Maryland side, went over in the miserable mud-sews and brought away the body of the noble old patriot, and all night long busied themselves in bringing off the wounded. Capt. Cooke also spent the night in ministering to the wounded, and was highly praised for his humanity.

Gen. Baker had won the hearts of the Sussex squadron by a characteristic act of generosity. Learning that no paymaster had been sent to these men, he rode into their camp one day shortly before his death and, through Capt. Duffie and Cooke, distributed to them, as a loan, several hundred dollars of his own money.

After the Ball's Bluff battle the two companies were returned to the regiment, which had been as-

* On arriving at Cincinnati, June 17th, information was received of the threatened invasion of Pennsylvania by Gen. Lee. The regiment then tendered its services to the President of the United States to assist in repelling the proposed rebel movement, and they were accepted. It remained in the vicinity of Pittsburgh and Harrisburg for ten days, and until the danger had passed. It then continued its homeward journey.

signed to the division of Gen. Irwin McDowell, and had gone into winter camp across the Potomac, on Arlington Heights.

Under a new law of Congress authorizing cavalry regiments to have battalion organizations, Capts. Duffie and Mallory were promoted majors, and the Sussex squadron, with Companies I and K, was assigned to Maj. Duffie, and was named the Third Battalion. To fill the vacant captaincy of Company A, a sergeant named Luke McGwin, from Gen. Stoneman's old company in the regular army, was appointed. A long and dangerous attack of typhoid fever nearly ended and sadly delayed Lieut. Griggs' promotion.

Capt. McGwin was a hard man. Notwithstanding his own long service in the ranks, he apparently had no feeling for his men. In his efforts to bring their discipline to absolute perfection he incurred the hatred of the entire company. Unlike his old comrade, Sergt. Benjamin C. Berry, who came at the same time to be captain of Company K, he had neither the respect of his men nor the friendly regard of his brother-officers. Throughout the winter the drill and discipline of the entire regiment were very severe, but the men, and especially the Sussex squadron, wanted to learn to be good soldiers, and did not object to rigid discipline so long as it did not descend to cruelty. Kilpatrick desired the men to be thoroughly drilled and disciplined, but he had very decided notions about a high dashing spirit being necessary to a good cavalryman. He was mortally offended by McGwin's treatment of his company, and the latter left the regiment. Lieut. Southard was then promoted captain of Company A.

So proficient in drill had the regiment become that at McClellan's grand review at Bailey's Cross-Roads it was selected to make a sham charge before Abraham Lincoln and the numerous distinguished spectators who had come out of the national capital to see the splendid pageant of an army of one hundred thousand soldiers—infantry, artillery, and cavalry—moving, in full view, on a broad open plain.

At the first advance on the works of Manassas, in March, 1862, the Harris Light Cavalry and the Sixth United States Cavalry constituted McClellan's escort. The Harris Light entered the burning works in time to drive out a small rear-guard, but there was little fighting.

When Gen. McClellan transferred the Army of the Potomac to the Peninsula, the Harris Light remained with McDowell and led the first advance on Fredericksburg, in April, 1862. Within a few miles of Fredericksburg, about April 12th, the first hard fighting was done by the regiment. The enemy were steadily forced back during the afternoon to near Falmouth, opposite Fredericksburg, when a grand charge was made by the Confederate cavalry, which Kilpatrick promptly met by a counter-charge, that broke their lines and cleared the way to Falmouth for our steadily-advancing infantry, which pressed on to the front and went into bivouac. The Harris Light lost several men in this engagement, among them Lieut. Decker, a very promising young officer, who was killed in the charge. At midnight the Harris Light, under Kilpatrick, and the First Pennsylvania Cavalry, under Col. George D. Bayard (also a Jerseyman), moved out to the left and attempted to pass around the enemy's right flank, but, being misled into an ambush by a traitorous guide, encountered a terrible fire from infantry behind hastily-erected breastworks, and were bloodily repulsed. The long winter's discipline was well repaid by the coolness and rapidity with which the regiment responded to every order, except that one stentorian command given at the first repulse by Kilpatrick: "Fetch up the artillery!" There was no friendly artillery within several miles, but all understood Kilpatrick's well-meant intention to scare the rebels, and even in that first bloody night's work men laughed at it like hardened veterans. A squadron of the First Pennsylvania and some companies of the Harris Light charged clear through the rebel lines, reformed beyond them, and charged back to their own; but it was found that the enemy were too strong for the cavalry, and a retreat was ordered. The dead and wounded were brought off the field. The infantry entered Falmouth, and the rebel commander was compelled to destroy the bridge across the river and fall back behind Fredericksburg to save the city from the fire of McDowell's artillery. Here a solemn funeral service was performed over the first of the Harris Light killed in battle, and the men of both cavalry regiments learned that the Northern papers had exalted them all to the rank of heroes.

Some more substantial promotions occurred to the men from Sussex. Lieut. Grinton was made captain of Company G, and Sergt. Mattison was promoted second lieutenant of Company K, having been previously made sergeant-major of the regiment.

The Harris Light Cavalry had been announced in general orders by Secretary Cameron as the Seventh Regiment of United States Cavalry. This aroused a storm of opposition from regular officers, and was found to be illegal. Another order rescinded the first, and ordered the regiment credited to New York. Finally, after a long controversy, the Governor restored the rightful number, which ever after continued to be the Second. Gen. McDowell, now having command of a military department, with the full rank of major-general, selected Duffie's battalion to be his body-guard, and for months after the Sussex squadron and Companies I and K scarcely ever came in sight of the regiment, which then belonged to Bayard's brigade. Meanwhile, Col. J. M. Davies having resigned on account of ill health, Kilpatrick became colonel.

The Sussex squadron performed much scouting duty while at headquarters, marched with the commanding general across the mountains into the Shenandoah valley in pursuit of "Stonewall" Jackson; thence back to Manassas; thence followed Pope in the Northern Virginia campaign to Culpeper; was under fire at the battle of Cedar Mountain; got inside the enemy's lines by mistake in the night following, and raised a commotion which set both armies to fighting; escaped without loss, and a few days after formed the skirmish-line which discovered the enemy had retreated and were well on the way to reinforce Lee and raise McClellan's siege of Richmond.

When Lee commenced his movement against Pope, the Sussex squadron was called upon for incessant duty in watching and retarding the advance of the enemy. The battalion held the Rappahannock on either side of the railroad bridge for two or three days, during which time its supply-wagons, with all the headquarters train, was captured in the rear at Catlett's Station.

The Sussex squadron then accompanied Pope and McDowell to Warrenton; thence to Groveton, where it was the first to discover Jackson's corps on the Sudley Springs road. Escorting the general around to Manassas, it was almost in a starving condition without its supply-wagons or any commissary to draw supplies from. It followed McDowell and Fitz John Porter from the large brick house at Manassas, called army headquarters, to the front, where Fitz John Porter established his line of battle. Then, leaving Lieut. Griggs and twenty of his men to act as messengers for Gen. Porter, the battalion escorted McDowell to the right, where the battle was commencing. It remained on the field throughout the battle of the 29th almost famished for food and even for water, and the morning of the 30th killed a young cow and ate it before the battle was renewed. When the first sign of wavering was seen, McDowell ordered the battalion to deploy and stop stragglers, while he galloped down to the battery where the battle raged the hottest. He used superhuman courage to stay the invincible advance of the enemy, and was said to be the last man to leave the battery. The Sussex squadron and Kane's "Bucktails" exerted every effort to check our retreating lines, but to no purpose; the day was lost. The battalion followed McDowell and Pope to the defenses of Washington, where McClellan appeared and assumed command.

Everything now seemed moving across the Potomac. Capt. Naylor had succeeded Duffie in command of the battalion. The latter, through the influence of Gen. McDowell, had been appointed colonel of the First Rhode Island Cavalry by Governor William Sprague. Capt. Naylor received orders to report in Maryland to Gen. Joseph Hooker, who had succeeded to the command of McDowell's corps—the First—in McClellan's reorganization of the Army of the Potomac.

The battalion joined Hooker on the battle-field of Antietam. That officer did not want it, and ordered it to remain near the ammunition-wagons. The Sussex squadron, therefore, witnessed the battle without participating in it. Hooker was wounded, Reynolds had gone to organize a new corps of defense in Pennsylvania; so Gen. Meade, but lately commanding a brigade, suddenly found himself at the head of the First Army Corps. With him the battalion remained until Gen. Reynolds returned and took command of the First Corps. After serving with Reynolds for a time the battalion was ordered to rejoin the regiment, which had remained in the defenses of Washington, and which was found at Ball's Cross-Roads.

With Bayard's brigade the reunited battalions of the Harris Light Cavalry moved towards Abbie, where a severe battle was fought late in October. When Burnside relieved McClellan the Harris Light marched down the river to Fredericksburg, but too late to save the bridge McDowell had rebuilt the preceding summer.

About the 1st of December, Bayard's command moved to Dumfries to clear out a force threatening the rear, but returned in time to cross the pontoons at the battle of Fredericksburg and take position on the plain in front of Franklin's headquarters, where that most promising young Jerseyman, Gen. George D. Bayard, was struck by a bursting shell, and died as calmly and coolly as he would have faced the rebels in the strength of his noble manhood. After the battle the Harris Light was sent down the north bank of the Rappahannock as a corps of observation.

Excepting a raid of fifty miles down the Rappahannock and the famous Burnside "mud march," there were no great deeds to record during this winter. Capt. Cooke was promoted major; First Lieut. Griggs was promoted captain, and Second Lieut. Mattison first lieutenant of Company K. Lieut. Downing was promoted captain of Company B.

In the spring the Harris Light went on the famous Kilpatrick raid around the rebel army, approaching within two miles of Richmond, destroying bridges, railways, etc., crossing the Chickahominy, and, retreating to the Pamunkey, crossed that river on flat-boats and made their escape to Yorktown. Seizing a favorable time, they recrossed the rebel country at great peril, and reached the Federal transports at Urbana, upon which they crossed the Rappahannock, and regained their place in the Army of the Potomac with a loss of about fifty men throughout the expedition. On the 9th of June the Harris Light took part in the great cavalry battle of the war at Brandy Station, wherein all the cavalry of the contending armies were joined in mortal combat. In consequence of the Richmond raid, the Harris Light Cavalry was perhaps the most famous regiment in the world at this time.

At Brandy Station, however, a mistake with regard to orders lost the golden opportunity to strike the enemy a decisive blow. When the Harris Light Cavalry realized its mistake the most gallant efforts were made to redeem the false movement, and the regiment fought hard throughout the battle. In attempting to reform the broken line Col. Davies was the first to dash across the railroad embankment, expecting his regiment to follow. His horse fell dead at the very feet of the rebels, who closed in around Davies and cut him off from the few who attempted to follow him. Standing by the carcase of "Backskin," Davies faced his assailants, and, sternly watching every sabre-thrust, skillfully parried every blade drawn against him, sending some whirling over the heads of the foe. He coolly maintained his position for several minutes, until some of the Sussex boys succeeded in driving off the eager rebel officers, some twenty or thirty of whom were each striving to cut him down. At night the exhausted cavalrymen of each side drew off, and both sides claimed the victory.

On the 17th of June, Kilpatrick fought Fitzhugh Lee's cavalry at Aldie, and the Harris Light Cavalry more than redeemed its reputation. The squadron which led the false charge at Brandy Station asked for the post of honor in this battle. Kilpatrick told them to charge the haystacks from which a galling fire was poured into his lines on the hill. The squadron (Raymond's) charged at once; only nineteen men came out unharmed. Grinton was ordered to go to their relief. He took Company K, Griggs having "borrowed" Grinton's company of carbineers to dislodge a force on the opposite flank. Company K was officered by Lieuts. Mattison and A. C. Shafer (of Stillwater, Sussex Co., N. J.), both promoted from the Sussex squadron. Company K charged, with Grinton leading, directly towards the haystacks, but Mattison, discovering that the destruction of Raymond's squadron proceeded from the fire of sharpshooters entrenched in a deep ditch to the right, urged his men upon them. Grinton cried out to follow him, but the men kept on with Mattison to the ditch, and, the Sixth Ohio Cavalry crossing the ditch farther to the left, about one hundred sharpshooters fell into the hands of the Harris Light. The battle ended for the day with our troops in possession of the field.

From Aldie, via Middleburg and Upperville, to Ashby's Gap, the next few days witnessed constant fighting between the Union cavalry and Stuart's entire cavalry corps, the latter being eventually driven through the Gap, with considerable loss in every encounter.

The cavalry of the Army of the Potomac gave up the pursuit of Stuart, and countermarched to Aldie and prepared to follow the army into Maryland. The companies of Griggs and Grinton were here ordered to Washington with condemned and captured property, surplus baggage, etc. They were scarcely aware that Stuart's cavalry, passing down the valley and through Thoroughfare Gap, were hard upon their heels at Fairfax Court-house. The march was pushed forward towards the close with unusual haste, and not far from Alexandria a regiment of Federal cavalry passing out towards Fairfax was warned by Griggs that a large force of the enemy was approaching Fairfax, and that the utmost caution should be used. The commanding officer haughtily rejected the idea of any heavy body of hostile troops being so near Washington, and impatiently moved on. This entire command was surrounded that night, and nearly all fell into Stuart's hands.

In the short Gettysburg campaign, Kilpatrick, unable to get the Harris Light regularly transferred to his new command, "borrowed" the regiment from Gen. Gregg and worked it incessantly. It participated in all his glorious operations, and in fifteen days he fought nearly as many battles, capturing four thousand five hundred prisoners, nine pieces of artillery, and eleven battle-flags.

Constant changes had been going on among the Jerseymen of the Harris Light: Kilpatrick, first lieutenant-colonel, then colonel, was now brigadier-general; Cooke was a major; Griggs and Grinton were captains; and several of the sergeants were lieutenants. The men who originally went out in the Sussex squadron had become scattered over the whole regiment, and only the full details of the operations of the organization can do justice to all of its Sussex members.

Kilpatrick subsequently succeeded in getting the Harris Light into his division,—the Third of the cavalry corps,—and in this incomparable division the regiment remained throughout the war.

In September following, Kilpatrick marched down the Rappahannock and destroyed the two gunboats captured from our navy a short time before. Returning to the Army of the Potomac, he crossed the river and drove the enemy back over the plains of Brandy Station to Culpeper Court-house. While Buford's division advanced from the Sperryville road, Kilpatrick, in front, attacked the corps of Stuart, drawn up in splendid array around Culpeper. As the several regiments of Davies' brigade galloped into position, the band playing the "Star-Spangled Banner," a battalion of the Harris Light was seen to leave our line and dash madly down the hill, across a creek, and up the other side, directly upon the rebel battery which swept the hills where the Third Division was massing. This battalion was led by Capt. George V. Griggs. Gen. George A. Custer, whose brigade was forming to the rear of Davies', rode forward to learn what was going on. Perceiving Griggs charging the battery, he put spurs to his horse and dashed ahead, nor drew rein till he was in the midst of the chargers, who made straight for the guns and captured three of them, with nearly all the men and officers of the battery, which proved to be the famous Baltimore artillery company which early entered the Confederate service. Buford's division, charging the northwest side of the town, had compelled Stuart to weaken his front. Almost as soon as Griggs had possession of the battery the balance of the regiment was upon the ground, and the charge was kept up through and beyond the town.

Later in the month the same two Federal divisions met Fitzhugh Lee's division six miles north of Orange Court-house, far away from our lines. Buford this time moved directly upon the enemy, while Kilpatrick, marching by way of Madison Court-house, attempted to get on the rebels' line of retreat. The latter, discovering Kilpatrick's purpose, hastened his retrograde movement; so that only the Harris Light, in the advance, got upon his road, and against this regiment he opened his battery at shortest range and charged his whole command, cutting a pathway through it and carrying off a number of the Harris Light as prisoners, while many were left dead or wounded on the field.

Early in October, Gen. Lee commenced a flanking movement designed to force Meade back of the Rappahannock. Kilpatrick's division was pushed out towards Madison Court-house to watch the enemy's manoeuvres and to cover the movements of the Army of the Potomac, which was drawing out of Culpeper towards the Rappahannock. On the morning of the memorable 11th of October, Kilpatrick drew in his pickets and fell back to Culpeper. The Harris Light was on the rear-guard, and halted southwest of the town. Pleasanton, the chief of the cavalry corps, sent an order to Kilpatrick to dispatch a squadron to the rear to penetrate the enemy's lines and discover what they were doing. The order came down through brigade headquarters to Capt. Griggs to take his squadron and perform the perilous duty. The dullest soldier of the Harris Light Cavalry knew that along the picket-line of the Hazel River the preceding night the Confederate cavalry was pushing northward. The silence which prevailed at this moment was deeply ominous. Griggs declared it was murder to obey the order, but, like the good soldier that he was, he turned southward and marched sternly away from the division, which he was nevermore to behold. A quarter of an hour later a hurried call was made for volunteers to go after him and call him back, but between his squadron and the division the enemy had steadily marched, and was closing up every road. When Griggs emerged into open ground from the deep woods south of Culpeper he discovered A. P. Hill's corps of Confederate infantry marching straight towards the Court-house. Griggs turned back, but discovered a barricade of trees that he had left in his road had been cut away. Kilpatrick had promised to halt at Culpeper till the squadron returned. Griggs turned off into a grove just back of the town, halted the squadron, and rode out, with a single trooper behind him, to reconnoitre. A picket in a blue overcoat was seen just out of the town, but the trooper behind called out to Griggs that he wore gray pants. The captain had evidently made the same discovery for he suddenly wheeled and shouted, "To the right! Save yourselves!" and that instant a bullet struck the back of his head and he reeled and fell to the ground. His horse followed the squadron, which rushed wildly to the right and came out upon familiar ground near its old camp when previously stationed at Culpeper. Swarms of rebel cavalry pursued them, but, circling around a piece of wet, marshy ground, across which the Confederates vainly essayed to gallop, the men of the Harris Light soon distinguished Kilpatrick's battle-line, which, forced to evacuate Culpeper, was thrown across the very hills from which that same squadron the previous month had started to charge the rebel battery. With desperate energy those men spurred their tired horses forward, and Kilpatrick, looking anxiously upon their gallant race, pushed his skirmishers towards them. Down by an old mill they crossed the creek, and came in safely; but Griggs was lost. In the lull before the battle a deep and solemn lament came from nearly every one over his fate. All his men who escaped—there were several missing, among them Lieut. A. C. Shafer—declared that, from the way Capt. Griggs dropped off his horse, they believed he was shot dead. It may be stated here that when the Army of the Potomac again occupied that country, Capt. Grinton and Lieut. Mattison, with an escort, went over the ground, and at a house near by learned that two Confederate soldiers brought poor Griggs to the door alive but insensible, and he died that night. His body was exhumed, fully identified, and sent North, and is buried in the old cemetery of Newton. He was a patriot of wonderful energy and zeal, an honor to his native town, and an invaluable officer in his regiment.

Quickly following the escaped squadron, the legions of the enemy closed upon the skirmish-line, commanded in person by Gen. H. E. Davies, Jr., who retired front and rear rank in tactical order after each volley with all the precision of a brigade drill. The extreme coolness of his manoeuvres inspired the men with confidence and astonished the advancing line of the enemy. Meantime, Kilpatrick, with all the rest of the division, was hurrying back to Brandy Station. West of Brandy Station, in plain sight, Fitzhugh Lee's rebel cavalry division was marching in haste for the same position. On the opposite flank of Kilpatrick, Wade Hampton's division, approaching via Stephensburg, closed in to cut off his retreat. Davies drew in his skirmishers and closed up the gap between him and the main column, but had hardly reached the division when Wade Hampton's men burst through the thin woods which had concealed the head of his column, with which Davies' two regiments of the rear-guard now became interlocked in deadly conflict. With wild curses and shouts Davies' men threw themselves upon the enemy and hurled him back. Covered by a cloud of dust, a regiment galloped in from the rear, into which the rear-guard poured a volley which unhorsed many of them, only to discover the next moment they were firing into a regiment of our own regiments, which, in falling back from Stephensburg, had become separated from Buford's division, and, enveloped by the hordes of advancing Confederates, made direct for Kilpatrick's line, guided by the sound of his guns. Thus two unfortunate mistakes caused the unnecessary loss of valuable lives to our side that day,—mistakes which were absorbed in the terrific combat which followed. The heads of Kilpatrick's and Fitzhugh Lee's columns met a little westward of the railroad station, and the shock at first staggered both. Around the 3-inch iron guns of his two regular horse-batteries Kilpatrick massed his regiments as fast as they came up, and at closest range poured shot and shell into the rallying Confederates, who came on grandly in the face of the deadly fire. Wild yells, curses, and hurrahs mingled with the clash of arms as the storm went on from midday to far in the afternoon, neither side yielding, and Kilpatrick's thin division grappling with more than double its numbers.

A Confederate brigade trotted across the fields towards the railroad station, and took up the charge against a weak place on Davies' front. That superb soldier turned, almost alone, to face the onset, when Grinton ordered the regimental colors of the Harris Light to take post directly to the front of the approaching column. Around the flags of the Harris Light, Grinton and Mattison speedily rallied near a hundred men, who delivered a volley from their carbines and pistols into the advancing foe, whose general tottered in his saddle and fell to the ground, dead or badly wounded. The enemy could not get beyond their fallen chief, and shrank back under the steady fire which continued to pour into their ranks. One of Elders' guns, disabled, was hauled off by hand, while the others became so hot that the men had to pause to cool them. Around them and in between them dashed Confederate cavalymen, to be met by Kilpatrick's men and forced back; but Elder grimly held his pistol over his own men and swore to shoot any man who deserted his post.

Away up the rising hills westward towards Sperryville a little regiment of infantry was seen making its way on a run towards the Rappahannock, frequently turning and forming a hollow square against cavalry and delivering a withering fire into a pursuing column, then again drawing out on a run, only to be again charged by the pursuers. Gallantly the regiment struggled forward, with its colors flying and every now and then facing to the rear and delivering an effective volley at the persistent enemy.

Eventually the regiment escaped and passed to the rear of Kilpatrick's battle-ground, but the sight was immensely encouraging to the Third Division, and they renewed their efforts to repel their assailants; but still the battle raged without intermission, and the rapidly-thinning ranks of the Third Division gave the rebels hope of success, when the wild shriek of howitzer guns louder than any of Kilpatrick's, was borne through the air as the shells burst over the rebel ranks. Turning their eyes, the weary troopers of the Third Division beheld a sight which filled their hearts with the wildest joy. Across the wide plain in their rear a dozen regiments of cavalry were advancing to their relief in line of battle, with colors flying and bands playing as gayly as on any review-day. In front of this host, which was the entire First Cavalry Division, rode Gen. John Buford with a few staff-officers, never halting until he was in the midst of Davies' men, still firing into the brigade whose chief lay between the two forces. Buford, neatly dressed and smoking a cigar, appeared altogether unconcerned about the rebels. In the coolest manner—for which he was famous—he gave quiet orders to his staff-officers, who galloped back to the First Division, proudly sweeping up the hill in magnificent order. The rebel fire slackened as by magic; orders quickly passed along for the Third Division to fall back behind the hill and give place to the First Division. Cheers were exchanged by the two divisions; Buford's Napoleon guns kept up their fire, but the roll of small-arms slackened, and the Third Division was "out of the fight," but with the loss of many valuable men.

Two corps of infantry recrossed the Rappahannock and marched to the relief of the cavalry, and the tired and blood-stained soldiers of the Third Cavalry Division were withdrawn to the north side of the river to rest and refresh themselves after their desperate work of the 11th of October, 1863.

Towards the close of October, Kilpatrick was surrounded and cut off at Buckland Mills, near Warrenton, by the whole of Stuart's cavalry, but by consummate coolness he forced a mill-race and escaped with his entire command. This affair was facetiously called in the army "The Buckland Races," but it was one of the most successful retreats ever made from a perilous environment.

Not long after this brilliant exploit the Army of the Potomac passed to the south of the Rappahannock, and after many skirmishes along the line of the Rapidan the Third Division settled down into winter camp at Stephensburg, from whence the expedition started which recovered the body of Capt. Griggs.

On Sunday, the 28th of February, 1864, four thousand of the best cavalry of the corps reported to Kilpatrick for the great Richmond raid. A selected party of five hundred—really about five hundred and fifty—under Col. Ulric Dahlgren and Lieut.-Col. Edwin F. Cooke, moved upon an independent line, and with the special purpose of reaching the south side of the James River; and, while Kilpatrick's four thousand thundered at the front of Richmond, this command at daylight of Tuesday, the 1st of March, was to make a sudden dash through Manchester into the rebel capital and release the thousands of our brave soldiers who were languishing in Libby Prison and on Belle Isle. The plan had been considered by President Lincoln and Secretary Stanton, was approved by them, and the necessary authority issued direct from the War Department, placing the troops under Kilpatrick's orders for the purposes of the raid. Gen. Custer had been sent to the extreme opposite flank of the enemy to make a demonstration towards Madison Court-house to draw the enemy's cavalry in that direction.

It was dark when, on that Sunday night, a party of scouts swam the Rapidan, and, coming down upon the rebel outpost, captured the picket without firing a shot and cleared the ford, by which Dahlgren's command silently crossed to the hostile side and moved to Spottsylvania Court-house. Early Monday morning, the 29th of February, the expedition crept around the right of Lee's army, and at noon was at Frederick Hall, in full sight of the camp of Lee's reserve artillery, near which a general court-martial was in session at a farmhouse, which was surrounded by our men and the officers, witnesses, and attendants taken prisoners and carried along with the column.

The South Anna was crossed at dusk, and the expedition reached Goochland Court-house soon after midnight. In the rain and darkness many of the court-martial prisoners escaped. Dahlgren halted at Goochland and allowed the tired men to cook coffee and rest for a couple of hours, when the march was resumed. Dahlgren's guide—a negro sent to him from Gen. Meade's headquarters on Sunday night—had volunteered to lead him to a ferry on the James River, and through his assurances Dahlgren had calculated to be at the crossing by or before midnight, instead of which he was no farther at that time than Goochland Court-house. The negro, however, declared he would lead him to a ferry within five miles. Upon his assurances the march was again resumed, and continued for five hours without finding a crossing to the river. Dahlgren's suspicions of the negro's treachery had been growing very strong, and he threatened to hang him. The negro pleaded pitiously for another hour, promising to find a crossing by that time. Dahlgren gave the respite, but the negro failed to find a crossing. Moreover, Dahlgren's scouts reported nothing but a scow-ferry, and that many miles from where Dahlgren had supposed himself to be. Dahlgren, convinced that the negro had designedly misled him, sternly gave orders to hang him to a tree by the roadside. Protesting his innocence to the last, the poor negro was strung up to a tree by a halter from one of the horses, and was left dangling in the air, to the horror of the passing column. The Harris Light Cavalry detachment, which had been moving down the canal, destroying mills, locks, and bridges, came into the road near by while his body was yet warm and cut him down at once, but life was extinct. The mystery of his conduct has never been cleared away, but from the hour of his execution the men declared "that no good would come of it."

Burning with his purpose to win imperishable fame as the deliverer of the Union prisoners, Dahlgren determined to attack Richmond at dark that night from the north side of the James River. A captured picket of two troopers belonging to a city battalion had disclosed the fact that only city militia, made up chiefly of clerks in the government departments, guarded that approach to the rebel capital. The colonel therefore hoped that by throwing these troops into a panic he might penetrate the city, no matter at what hazard to his own command or to himself. He therefore moved onward until within six miles of the city, when he encountered a regiment of infantry, which he literally rode over, leaving the wonder-stricken young city militiamen behind him; they obediently threw down their arms at the command of the Yankee troopers, and started for the rear to get out of the way. In three miles Dahlgren's men charged and captured perhaps more than three times their own number of these city troops, who threw down their arms and marched back in charge of a mere handful of guards. Indeed, those captured towards the last were left unguarded.

Within three miles of the city the raiders were met by a deadly fire which covered their entire front and extended far beyond their flanks, revealing a heavy line far too strong for so small a force to contend with. Then Dahlgren, who had been previously urged by Lieut.-Col. Cooke to abandon the enterprise, consented to withdraw. In doing so his command became divided, and he marched off in the darkness with only a portion of his column. Turning into a by-road, he moved towards Hungary Station, which was to have been Kilpatrick's halting-place before attacking Richmond from the east. Col. Cooke first discovered the absence of a part of the command, and desired to go back after it; but Dahlgren objected, and pushed on to Hungary, thinking, no doubt, the broken column would close up. Unfortunately, the rear portion of the column passed the by-road in the darkness without turning into it, and thus lost Dahlgren's trail. At Hungary Station, finding no trace of Kilpatrick, Dahlgren destroyed his two ambulances and moved on to the Pamunkey, which he crossed without waiting for news of his broken column.

When near King and Queen Court-house the following night, Wednesday, the 2d of March, he was surrounded by the rapidly-augmenting bands of cavalry which had harassed him all day. Fighting to the last, he was killed at the head of his men, nearly all of whom fell into the hands of the enemy. Cooke escaped on foot in the darkness, but was hunted down by blood-hounds and captured the following Friday. He was taken to Richmond, refused the privileges of a prisoner of war, cast into a dark cell with negro prisoners, poorly fed, and deprived of the necessaries of life. His health gave way under his cruel treatment, but his glorious spirit enabled him bravely to endure his unnatural privations.

The other part of this column was more fortunate. Failing to find Dahlgren, Capt. John F. B. Mitchell, of the Harris Light Cavalry, assumed command and moved back on the main road until, running into a line of rebel troops, who opened a strong fire, they were forced to countermarch. Marching back again towards Richmond, the road being full of the straggling militia that had surrendered to them in the previous action, the party found the broad road running to Hungry Station. Pursuing this road for some miles, Mitchell discovered that a body of rebel cavalry was following his detachment. He therefore turned into a lane, marched across a field, and turned into a swamp. The pursuers passed on, and not far off turned into bivouac, built fires, and settled down for the night. A volunteer scout named Campbell (of the Harris Light) ventured to penetrate the strange camp, and in due time returned and reported that the strangers were the Fourth Virginia Cavalry, of Wade Hampton's division. Meantime, it was learned there were no traces of the Union cavalry about Hungry.

A negro was procured, who carefully led Mitchell's column around the rebel camp and through lanes and by-paths around to the south of Hungry Station, at which it was reported Wade Hampton's cavalry were arriving in strong force. Daylight found the party upon the Brooke Pike, going towards Richmond, but another body of the enemy soon opened fire in the face of the wanderers and compelled them to turn about. Ladies appeared on the portico of a large white mansion and besought the party not to fight before their eyes. They were in a high state of excitement, and told the Yankee invaders that Wade Hampton's cavalry were upon that road and would surely confront them in a few moments. They further gave them the information that Kilpatrick had attacked Richmond the previous night (Tuesday), but had been beaten and driven off down the James River. This made the party doubly anxious to find a line of escape southward, and by a pure piece of good luck, after passing a narrow lane, Lieut. Mattison rode back to a little house near by and learned that it led to a ford on the Chickahominy. Mitchell quickly turned the head of his column back to the lane, which, sure enough, led to an obscure ford, across which the weary party passed to the Peninsula, ever famous as the scene of McClellan's movements upon Richmond.

Coming upon a party of laborers clearing away the smoking debris of a burnt train of cars, Mitchell learned that Kilpatrick had destroyed the train the previous day, marching towards Richmond, that he had thrown everybody into a panic, had nearly entered the city, but had finally been repulsed by Pickett's division, which had arrived from North Carolina in the evening, and had been rushed to the fortifications barely in time to confront him. Kilpatrick, they stated, had retreated towards the James.

Mitchell and his officers decided to strike for Williamsburg. Avoiding several bodies of the enemy, which opened fire on the fugitives, but which were not large enough to compel them to fight, they finally reached the broad highway leading from Williamsburg to Richmond. A rebel outpost held the cross-roads, but a smart little attack cleared the way, when the broad trail of a large cavalry column coming from towards the James River and turning into the Williamsburg road was discovered. A lady soon told Capt. Mitchell that Kilpatrick had passed down in the forenoon on his retreat, and that the Confederate soldiers had followed him and had brought back a large number of his men prisoners, who had but just gone up to Richmond.

Waiting for no further information, Mitchell and his men forced their worn-out horses to a faster walk and hurried on. Burning fences on each side were taken to be Kilpatrick's signals to Dahlgren to follow. Fearing a pursuing column, every effort was made to close up the long distance yet intervening between Mitchell and Kilpatrick. Well on in the afternoon, when all inquiries of the citizens were answered with the cheering news that the Yankee cavalry had passed only a very short time ago, Mitchell's column suddenly encountered a strong fire from a piece of woods lying across the road. Recoiling from this unexpected attack from an enemy whose presence the wily citizens had concealed, the poor tired fellows summoned their energies for a last grand effort. Fortunately, the road towards the enemy was descending, so that as the jaded horses proceeded under the spurs and the wild shouts of men who were determined to go through or die in the attempt their speed increased. Each man grasped his Colt's revolver as he neared the woods, and with deadly purpose the command dashed against the foe so furiously that they broke and fled through the woods in all directions, leaving the road to the Yankees.

The opposing force proved to be Bradley T. Johnson's Legion, which had been harassing Kilpatrick's rear. Recovering from their panic, they rallied and fell upon the rear of the charging column as it thundered on through the timber, but the Yankees emptied their revolvers into their ranks and held them off. Confederate papers claimed that Johnson's Legion inflicted a loss of twenty-one upon the charging party. Their own estimate was about fifteen, and those mostly from falling horses too weak to keep up the burst of speed.

An hour later the party reached Kilpatrick's division, having marched about two hundred and twenty-five miles since the preceding Sunday night,—scarcely three days. A count showed that two hundred and thirty-six men were brought in from the Dahlgren column, which left the Army of the Potomac with about five hundred and fifty men.

Kilpatrick, with the main column, reached the front of Richmond on Tuesday morning. Waiting in vain to hear Dahlgren in the city, he opened fire with his battery, which threw shell into the city limits and created the wildest consternation among the people. Troops were coming to the rescue of the rebel capital, and after an ineffectual attack in the evening Kilpatrick drew off across the Chickahominy, but delayed his retreat as long as possible in the hope of saving Dahlgren's column. Upon the arrival of Mitchell's detachment the fate of the others became of still more concern to the commanding general, who encamped his division near the White House and remained there from Wednesday afternoon until Thursday morning, trying to get news of the missing party. Nothing definite could be learned, however, save that such a party had crossed the Pamunkey farther up the river, and Kilpatrick was obliged to resume his retreat.

On Thursday a relieving brigade of colored troops from Butler's department reached Kilpatrick, and were greeted by the cavalrymen with hearty cheers. The combined Union force proceeded down the Peninsula, and arrived at Yorktown via Williamsburg. Meantime, a refugee sergeant from Dahlgren's party found his way to Kilpatrick with the news of the colonel's death and the dispersion of his men.

Straightway upon reaching Yorktown the general selected two thousand of his strongest horses, crossed the York River, and moved up into King and Queen County, where he learned the fate of the Dahlgren party, and for the cruelties practiced towards them by the hard-hearted captors Kilpatrick laid waste the country which had been the scene of their torture.

Lieut.-Col. Cooke remained a prisoner at Richmond for many months, when he was transferred to North Carolina. Making his escape, he was in the mountains fed and concealed by negroes for some two weeks, and was recaptured by the aid of bloodhounds, and was then sent to Charleston, S. C., to be placed under the fire of Gilmore's batteries, along with many Union officers, to deter the Federal general from shelling the city. Released from captivity after a year of suffering bravely endured, he arrived in New Jersey just in time to witness the death of his young wife, for whom he had so hopefully borne up under every torture to which his proud spirit had been subjected. Broken in health, he accompanied Gen. Kilpatrick to Chili, after the war, as secretary of legation, and died there from disease contracted in Libby Prison. He was brevetted brigadier-general before leaving the United States.

Upon the return of the expedition to the Army of the Potomac, Gen. Kilpatrick was transferred to Gen. Sherman's army in the Southwest, where he earned increased distinction as a cavalry-leader. On the "March to the Sea" he was of the greatest assistance to Gen. Sherman, and won the lasting regard of that officer for his ability and untiring energy.

Gen. James H. Wilson succeeded Kilpatrick in the command of the Third Cavalry Division. Gen. Henry

E. Davies was transferred to a brigade in Gregg's (Second) division. Gen. Custer and the Michigan brigade went to the First Division, exchanging places with Chapman's brigade, which became the Second Brigade of the Third Division. Col. John B. McIntosh, a Jerseyman, became the commander of the First Brigade.

The Third Division participated in the battles of the Wilderness and Spotsylvania, and then went on the first raid of Gen. Sheridan to break the Confederate connections with Richmond. It was in resisting this expedition that the gallant Gen. J. E. B. Stuart, chief of the rebel cavalry, was killed. It is honorable to him to say that in Sheridan's cavalry corps he had many admirers for his ability, courage, and personal kindness to captured prisoners. Had his ideas of the treatment of prisoners of war prevailed among the rebel generals, less bitterness would have been left by the war.

In Grant's flanking movements from Spotsylvania to the Peninsula the Third Cavalry Division performed arduous and constant duty. After crossing the Pamunkey River the division took the right of the army, and drove the principal part of the rebel cavalry corps back to Hanover Court-house after a stubborn resistance. When Wilson had well cleared his front, McIntosh, with three regiments and a battery, proceeded to Ashland Station, where his command was surrounded by the entire rebel cavalry force that had opposed Wilson at Hanover. This dauntless Jerseyman formed his three regiments around the battery, and fought the rebels all the afternoon without assistance, drawing off after dark, without molestation, by the river-road, upon which Gen. Wilson had sent a regiment to open a line of retreat. The Wilson raid was perhaps the most remarkable service which marked the history of the Harris Light Cavalry in the summer of 1864. About the 29th of June, Gen. Wilson started out via Ream's Station, having with him the Third Division and a smaller division belonging to Butler's Army of the James, commanded by Gen. A. V. Kautz. Desultory fighting commenced, soon after the destruction of Ream's Station, between the Harris Light Cavalry, forming the rear-guard of the expedition, and Gen. W. H. F. Lee's cavalry. While the rear-guard held the pursuing force in check, the main command was busily engaged in tearing up and destroying the railroad. Finally, Wilson decided to bring on an action with the rebel cavalry, and while the Third Division interlocked with the enemy in a hard and stubborn battle Gen. Kautz moved around to Burkesville Junction and destroyed the immense stores of army supplies collected there for Lee's army, together with the railroad works and property of incalculable value to the Confederacy.

When the work of destruction was complete and Kautz had moved away southward, Wilson drew out the Third Division from the fight and proceeded down the Danville Railroad, tearing up the track and burning bridges in the most thorough manner. When he reached the Staunton River it was estimated that not less than fifty miles of railroad had been torn up, the iron heated and twisted by the fires from the ties gathered in piles at short intervals.

The expedition met with its first reverse at the Roanoke bridge across the Staunton River. All efforts to dislodge the enemy failed, and, with W. H. F. Lee's division still harassing his rear, Wilson's position became critical. He therefore turned down the river and commenced his retrograde movement in the dark. Unforeseen difficulties so delayed the column that it had only reached Lawrenceville at daylight, from whence it took the Petersburg plank road, and moved more rapidly throughout that and the following day. Meanwhile, Wade Hampton's division had joined the pursuit, and was reported to be marching in parallel column but a mile or two to the right of the Third Division. W. H. F. Lee's division renewed its attacks with increased energy, and fully occupied Kautz' division, compelling the column to stretch out along the road for ten miles or more.

Gen. Wilson sent off scouts at various times to make their way to Gen. Grant and inform him of his homeward march and its environments. In the afternoon of the second day's retreat the advance-guard of McIntosh's brigade reached Stony Creek, on the Weldon Railroad, and was met by a determined musketry-fire. One after another of the regiments was dismounted and sent into the fight, but the enemy received constant reinforcements by train from Petersburg (the track having been repaired at Ream's Station), and was too strong for all the troops Wilson could bring into action. By night the whole of the Third Division was under fire, and Kautz was fighting the pursuing cavalry, endeavoring to hold it back. All night a lively rattle of musketry was kept up, and at dawn of day Wilson attempted to draw out towards Ream's Station, the Nottoway River southward being guarded by the rebel cavalry. At the moment the rebel infantry discovered Wilson's desperate effort to move by his left flank they sprang upon Chapman's brigade with a wild yell, and succeeded in cutting them off from their horses. But the rebels were not prepared for the awful burst of courage with which the Second Brigade turned upon them and, regardless of death, cut their way back to their beloved horses and retook them.

It was well on in the forenoon before Wilson could extricate his command and close up on Ream's Station. Everything was placed on the line of battle. Even the ambulance- and ammunition-wagons were but poorly protected in a hollow near the fighting troops. The ambulances were already full of wounded, and large numbers had been left behind, with surgeons and medicines. After a fruitless encounter, in which the enemy was found to be too strongly posted to admit of a hope of breaking through, Wilson, despairing, ordered his wagons destroyed and the troops divested of everything that would impede a hasty movement. The enemy discovered his purpose at once, and as the first flame arose from his burning wagons they dashed into his ranks from all sides, both cavalry and infantry. The retreat, which had already begun, at once became a wild rout. In the confusion Kautz charged across the railroad and escaped with a part of his command to the Army of the Potomac, but the masses rushed southward towards the ground of the previous night's battle. Providentially, the main timbers of the Nottoway bridge had not been destroyed, and a few planks made a passage sufficient for a single file of horsemen to cross. Thousands, however, swam the river, including the swarms of negro slaves that had persisted in joining the column from every plantation by which the expedition had passed. These poor refugees received the principal attention of the rebel cavalry, which cut them down mercilessly with their sabres when nobler and manlier fighting against armed men was within a few yards of them!

All of Wilson's artillery—twelve pieces—had to be abandoned, and the last piece was left in the road near the river. This the rebels at once turned upon the bridge, and speedily cleared it of its refugees. Across the river the pursuit slackened somewhat, but the retreat was kept up all night and all the next day, until, far down the Blackwater, the refugees found safety, and then moved more orderly towards the James, eventually reaching the Army of the Potomac with the loss of twelve hundred men and all their artillery, ambulances, and wagon-train.

Resting and recuperating for some weeks, the Third Division, following the First, was loaded on transports at City Point and transferred to Washington, where it was thoroughly refitted, and then marched to Winchester, arriving at that city just as Gen. Sheridan was retreating from it back towards Harper's Ferry. Gen. Wilson at once advanced to the relief of Sheridan's rear-guard, the First New Jersey Brigade, and became engaged in a considerable fight, of which the Third New Jersey Cavalry bore the brunt, and lost heavily.

Another fight occurred at Summit Point the 21st of August, and still another the day following, at Charlestown, all in protecting the retreating army while falling back to Harper's Ferry; and in all of these the Harris Light Cavalry behaved nobly, though many of the veterans claimed that their three years' enlistment had expired.

On the 29th of August those who had enlisted at the organization of the regiment and had not subsequently re-enlisted were mustered out of service and sent home. The re-enlisted veterans and those who had not yet served three years were formed into a battalion of four companies, or two squadrons, Maj. Walter Clarke Hull commanding, and the two senior line-officers, Glover and Mattison, acting as captains of squadrons.

There was much fighting for this battalion, for it embraced the finest body of men (according to the opinion of Gen. Wilson) in the Third Division,—so compact, so thoroughly experienced and drilled, that it was constantly called upon for the most delicate and hazardous duty. While escorting Gen. Sheridan from the celebrated council with Grant at Charlestown, after the army had advanced to Berryville, it had the good fortune to chase after Mosby and recapture an ambulance-train just previously captured on the Berryville road. This neat affair was managed by Lieut. William B. Shafer, of Sussex County. On another occasion Mattison's squadron made a night-scout clear up to the Opequan, causing the long roll to be sounded in the enemy's camps on the other side.

On the 19th of September, at 1 A.M., the battalion of the Harris Light Cavalry broke camp at Berryville and marched out on the Winchester road, threading its way through masses of infantry and batteries of artillery all faced towards the enemy. Gen. McIntosh ordered Glover's squadron to advance as a flanking column on the left of the road, and sent a guide with Mattison's squadron to move across the fields about a half-mile and then head directly for the Opequan, keeping up with the head of column in the road, and, crossing simultaneously with it by a ford known to the guide, to rush up the hill beyond and form skirmish-line connecting with the brigade. These instructions were carried out. At the first crack of musketry in the wood near the Opequan, Mattison's squadron rushed into the creek and forded to the other side in the face of a picket-fire, which receded as the squadron advanced clear to the crest of the hill, and then engaged in a conflict with the enemy which, but for its serious and fatal results, would have seemed grotesque to a disinterested spectator. First, the Federal squadron charged beyond the hill across stony, uneven ground nearly to a rebel camp, the troops of which, but hastily prepared for action, turned and rushed them back to the crest, whence, again rallying, the Yankee squadron drove the rebels back to their camp, only to meet a cavalry force which in turn chased them back. This irregular fight continued well on in the morning, the fighting along the whole line, but especially to the left of Mattison's squadron, growing more determined. Behind Mattison's squadron, which completely concealed it from the enemy, Chapman's Second Brigade had silently formed, but taking then no part in the fight. Next steadily and silently advanced the Sixth Army Corps, coming up the hill behind the centre and left of McIntosh's brigade, which by this time was holding the crest against a fearful fire of musketry. Spreading out like a fan, Russell's division of the Sixth Corps was soon in line directly behind McIntosh's dismounted cavalry, which at a given signal fell back, uncovering the line of battle of the Sixth Corps, which immediately became engaged in a terrific conflict. The battle of the Opequan was joined.

Wilson's two cavalry brigades were drawn back and placed on the left of the infantry, Chapman's going into the fight well around the enemy's right flank, while McIntosh's remained in reserve.

As the battle progressed and rolled all along the crest of hills for two or three miles in extent, McIntosh became eager to participate again, and, leaving his own brigade, he rode down into Chapman's line in the full strength of his splendid manhood; shortly he was brought out and back to the ambulances with a shattered leg. The surgeons declared it must come off, and there, on the field, in the full tide of the terrific battle he had so skillfully brought on, this most able and gallant Jerseyman calmly lay down and submitted to amputation. When it was over he asked to be sent home, and that same night was taken to Harper's Ferry in an ambulance and placed on a train, arriving the next morning in Philadelphia, where his magnificent nerve-power gave way, and for many weeks his life hung by a thread. He finally recovered, and was placed on the retired list, according to his brevet of major-general.

The battle of the Opequan—called by the Confederates the battle of Winchester—rolled on throughout the afternoon with undiminished fury. Col. Pennington, of the Third New Jersey Cavalry, succeeded to the command of McIntosh's brigade, which moved into a gap between Early's infantry and his cavalry, Chapman's brigade having forced the rebel cavalry back, so that the bare flank of the rebel infantry lay open and exposed without even a skirmish-line to keep off a flanking fire. Pennington seized the opportunity, and placed his battery in position to rake the rebel ranks crosswise. The rebel artillery, which had fiercely shelled Pennington's brigade going into this position, now became desperately engaged in front, and Pennington opened his battery with short fuse upon the doomed infantry of Early's army, too heavily engaged in its front to heed this new peril. Yet the brave fellows fought on, nor commenced to waver until an immense cloud of cavalry—Merritt's and Averill's divisions—was seen sweeping around the left and rear of the rebel position, clear up to Winchester. Then the Confederates saw they were beaten, and their lines began to crumble. Before dark they were going pell-mell up the valley towards Newton, the Union cavalry in hot pursuit. Some of the cavalry, onstripping their comrades, ran into a rebel brigade in tolerable order, and were very severely handled before other troopers came up, but as the cavalry closed up the retreat became a wild panic, and fully justified Sheridan's crisp telegrams that he had sent Early "whirling up the valley." This battle made Gen. Wilson a major-general, and he was sent West to organize a cavalry corps for Gen. Thomas. Gen. George A. Custer came from the Michigan brigade to command the Third Division. With an enlarged command, that magnificent cavalry leader performed wonders. From the day that he assumed command it was his proud boast that he captured every piece of artillery that opened on the Third Division.

The battle of Cedar Creek, of the 19th of October, made Custer's division famous throughout the world. His lines were never broken by the disaster of the morning, which spread dismay and panic through the army. At the first alarm Merritt and Custer assembled their divisions, which lay on the right of the army, and, marching by the back road to the left of the Sixth Corps, formed line of battle, which with that splendid mass of veterans opposed the farther advance of Early's troops. Such was their position when Sheridan rode on the field from Winchester, imparting a new courage to his troops. As soon as the Eighth and Nineteenth Corps could be gathered up and placed in line the cavalry were moved back to the right, and the entire mass moved forward at the double-quick, the cavalry taking the gallop, and the charge swept the rebels back across Cedar Creek. The cavalry surpassed all its previous splendid record in its terrific charge upon the enemy. Past the camps which it had left in the morning it literally rode over the Confederates, until thousands of rebels and battery after battery were overtaken and captured. The Third Division took twenty-six pieces of artillery, and never halted till Early was far back of Fisher's Hill.

Some days previous the Third Division had also captured several pieces of artillery in a fight with Gen. Rosser's cavalry, so that it began to be famous for its triumphs against that arm of the Confederate service.

Officers who had gone North early in August to recruit new men had succeeded beyond their expectations. Mainly through the personal efforts of Capt. M. B. Birdseye a splendid lot of men had been brought to the field, and once more the Harris Light appeared with twelve full companies, and Walter C. Hull came back from Albany a full colonel only to be shot dead a few days later, November 12th, in an engagement with the rebel cavalry on the "back road."

Capt. A. M. Randol, of the regular artillery, now became colonel; Birdseye, lieutenant-colonel; Maj. Joseph O'Keefe, of Sheridan's staff, came to the regiment as senior major; Capt. Glover was promoted second major; and Capt. Mattison was recommended for the third major; but an Italian nobleman just arrived in the country with the highest indorsement from the Italian minister was appointed to the commission by Governor Seymour.

As this gentleman could hardly speak a word of English and had no experience with American troops, it became necessary for him to seek a detail on staff duty, which was readily given him; and he never exercised the command of his battalion in the Harris Light Cavalry a single day, Capt. Mattison always fulfilling all the duties of the position. Lieut. William B. Shaffer was promoted to a captaincy, and became a chief of squadron at once, as well as one of the most efficient and valuable officers in the regiment.

The Mount Jackson expedition seasoned the new men to the hardships of winter campaigning, and Custer's expedition up the valley in December was severe even upon old troops. Custer marched up the valley for two days, in extremely cold weather, with but little opposition. From an artillery caisson he read, when twenty-five miles out, a dispatch by courier from Sheridan announcing the receipt of dispatches from Washington stating that information had been received from Richmond that Jefferson Davis had gone crazy and the rebels everywhere were preparing to abandon the war. Gen. Sheridan therefore gave Custer leave to go on with his division as far as he could and test the truth of this astounding information, which, however, did not prevent the young general from throwing out strong pickets at night.

On the second night the division went into camp at Lacy's Springs, the Second Brigade on the right of the road and somewhat in advance of the First Brigade, on the left. At earliest dawn of day on the third morning the troops saddled up, and, after taking coffee, the First Brigade was waiting orders to move, when a tremendous yell, followed by the sharp crack of carbines over in the front of the Second Brigade, burst upon them. Plainly, the rebels hadn't abandoned the Confederacy just yet.

Hastily the First Brigade sprang to their horses and waited orders from Gen. Custer. None coming, the right was extended to the road just as a body of charging rebels swept by in the grayish darkness of approaching day. A well-directed volley from the right of the Harris Light Cavalry unhorsed many of them, but they swept on, aiming to capture Gen. Custer, who, coming out of his headquarters, very narrowly escaped. The rebels swept on and cut down many of the officers' servants and camp-followers, and leaving a large number of their own men dead or prisoners. In the Second Brigade there were sixteen men wounded in the head by sabre-cuts. The rebel attack was soon repulsed, but Custer was satisfied with the information he had obtained of the enemy's purpose to continue the war, and he lost no time in getting on the road homeward. Mattison's battalion of the Harris Light Cavalry covered the retreat.

So cold had the weather become that the march was very painful. Many men had their ears, hands, or feet frozen. The prisoners taken in the charge were marched along on foot for the two days it required to get back to the army.

Another expedition followed soon after to Moorfield, in Western Virginia, and occupied about four days.

What had been earlier known as Averill's division had been broken up, and all the cavalry with Sheridan was embraced in the First and Third Divisions, each having three brigades of four or five regiments, Caphart's West Virginia brigade becoming the Third of the Third Division. Each brigade, as usual, had its four-gun battery of horse-artillery, and a light pontoon-train was attached to the corps.

On the 28th of February, 1865, Gen. Sheridan, with this corps, a light wagon-train loaded with ammunition and coffee, sugar, and salt, and a train of ambulances, marched out of Winchester. It was said that this column consumed three hours in passing a given point on the broad Winchester and Staunton Pike, one of the best roads in Virginia.

At Staunton it was learned that Early was entrenched at Waynesboro', at the foot of the mountain. Leaving the hard macadamized road, the huge column plowed its way through mud from twelve to twenty inches deep, and the head of the column had reached Early's position while yet the rear was in Staunton, fourteen miles away.

Custer, perceiving Early had taken up a most indefensible position on the north side of the creek, instead of placing his forces behind it, determined to make short work of him without waiting for the First Division. Forming his regiments as fast as they arrived, he led them through the mud under a smart artillery-fire straight up to the enemy, his line lopping Early's flanks and capturing the whole command,—between two and three thousand infantry and several batteries of artillery. Early and a few mounted officers ignominiously fled to the mountain, over which Custer's men pursued him all night.

Sheridan detached a strong force to take the prisoners back to Winchester, thereby depriving himself of troops that were afterwards much needed. His column was still very large, and with it he marched on to Charlottesville, and thence towards Lynchburg. Deeming it injudicious to attempt the capture of this strongly-fortified city, he turned down the James River and marched at will for many days, destroying property vital to the Confederacy. On the 14th of March he encamped at Ashland Station, near Richmond, and on the 15th sent the First Connecticut Cavalry along the railroad towards Richmond, and Mattison's battalion on the old telegraph road. These troops advanced to within a few miles of the rebel capital, when the Connecticut regiment ran into Pickett's division, and was severely punished and driven back. The battalion of the Harris Light fell back to a position about a mile in advance of the division.

Custer sent orders to hold the enemy there as long as possible, in doing which a most severe fight ensued, a brigade of Pickett's division overlapping the cavalry battalion on both flanks; but the battalion held the position until recalled by Lieut.-Col. Birdseye, when it hastily fell back, two of the gallant fellows rescuing Capt. Mattison, who, struck by a glancing bullet, would have fallen from his saddle but for their timely aid.

Farther back the rebel brigade ran into an ambuscade previously arranged by Cols. Randol and Birdseye, and received eight rounds of ammunition from a hundred Spencer carbines at short range, which sent them reeling back into the woods with heavy loss. The same troops became prisoners of war two weeks later to the same regiment, and complimented the Harris Light for their determined fighting at Ashland, admitting that they suffered heavy loss in the encounter.

Crossing the South Anna, Sheridan marched down on the north side of the Pamunkey to the White House, where he opened communication again with the outside world, and where he was supplied with much-needed provisions and munitions of war.

After crossing the Peninsula the cavalry had the pleasure of seeing the tall form of Abraham Lincoln on the deck of a steamer, watching their passage of the James on Grant's pontoons.

Passing around the rear of the Army of the Potomac, the cavalry from the valley joined their old comrades of the Second Division, which had remained with the army at Petersburg. The reunited corps at once took up the march for Dinwiddie Courthouse, where heavy fighting began on the 31st of March, lasting all day, chiefly between our First and Second Cavalry Divisions and the entire Confederate cavalry corps, aided by Pickett's and Johnson's divisions of infantry. The Third Cavalry Division did not enter this battle until evening, when Sheridan was very hard pressed. But at daylight of April 1st the Third Division led the fighting, the First Brigade, in the advance, closing up on the enemy, who fell back to strong works at the Five Forks. The First Brigade, dismounted, made a gallant charge, which was repulsed with heavy loss. Again rallying, the brigade was hurled against the breastworks only to meet another bloody repulse, in which O'Keefe, the noblest and most gallant foreigner in the American army, fell wounded in five places. Col. Birdseye and four brave men risked their lives to bring him off the field, in which attempt two noble fellows were killed. The third charge was participated in by the whole division and by the Third Corps, and the works were taken. Five thousand prisoners fell into the hands of the Third Division, but the losses in the day's fighting were the heaviest the brigade ever suffered.

On the 3d of April the Harris Light Cavalry, aided by the Third New Jersey Cavalry, attacked the remnants of this force at Sweathouse Creek, but were repulsed with some loss.

On the 6th of April the Harris Light Cavalry captured a wagon-train and participated in the battle with Ewell's corps which resulted in the capture of the entire corps. The Harris Light took fifteen hundred prisoners in this engagement.

On the 8th the Harris Light was the first regiment to arrive at Appomattox Station, cutting out three trains of cars loaded with supplies for Lee's army.

This brought on a hot fight, the Third New Jersey Cavalry coming to the support of the Harris Light. The fight grew heavier as more troops came to both sides, and only ceased at midnight with the capture of a battery of artillery and the retreat of the brigade supporting it.

The next morning the cavalry advanced to renew the fight in the face of Lee's entire army. Two divisions had commenced the trot preparatory to a charge against the rebel lines, when Lee's flags of truce appeared, and the glorious news sped along the column that Lee's army had surrendered.

After the surrender the cavalry marched to the borders of North Carolina, when the announcement was made that Johnston's army had surrendered to Gen. Sherman.

Marching the entire length of Virginia from Danville to Alexandria, the cavalry participated in the grand review at Washington in May, and then the work of disbanding commenced. All except the re-enlisted veterans of the Harris Light Cavalry were sent homeward on the 6th of June, and the last of the regiment were mustered out the 21st of June.

It fell to Maj. Mattison to deliver the last farewell to the departing soldiers with whom he had served so long. Copies of the address were taken home by the men, some of whom still retain them.

II.—BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MAJ. WILLIAM R. MATTISON, son of John B. and Mary A. (Hardisty) Mattison, was born in the city of Baltimore, Md., Oct. 22, 1840. His great-great-grandfather, James Mattison, came from Hunterdon Co., N. J., and settled not far from Newton, on the Fredon road, where he engaged in farming. Here his great-grandfather, John, and his grandfather, William, both extensive farmers, were born and lived. Here also his father, John B., was born, in 1808.

John B. Mattison was an architect and builder, and a man of inventive genius. He removed to Baltimore, where he married Mary A., daughter of William Hardisty, and by her had a family of five children,—four sons and one daughter. Here for several years he was employed in the city gas-works. Later he removed to Annapolis, Md., where he engaged in building. He returned to Newton with his family in 1846, and soon after went to Savannah, Ga., where he was employed in building a Presbyterian church. Two years later he located at Selma, Ala., where he organized a company and established a gas-works. He died here in 1858, at the age of fifty. The mother had died in Newton in 1857, aged forty-seven.

William R. was a delicate, studious boy. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed in the Herald office, where he remained three years. He then became clerk in the Newton post-office, under John McCarter, and continued such under the next postmaster, Henry C. Kelsey.

On Aug. 5, 1861, he, then in poor health, enlisted in Company B, one of two companies which Gen. Kilpatrick was raising in Sussex County to join the Harris Light Cavalry (afterwards named the Second New York), and was appointed quartermaster-sergeant. His first battle was that of Ball's Bluff, in the fall of 1861, and his last that at Appomattox Station, April 9, 1865, when Lee surrendered. He belonged to the Army of the Potomac until after the battle of Winchester, 1864, when the First and the Third Divisions of cavalry were detailed for service with Sheridan in the valley campaign. He participated in every battle fought by his regiment except that of Gettysburg.

In December, 1861, he was promoted sergeant-major of the regiment. May 5, 1862, he was commissioned second lieutenant of Company K, and in December of the same year first lieutenant. He led a charge at the battle of Aldie, June 17, 1863, and captured one hundred sharpshooters. He was acting adjutant of the regiment from the fall of 1863 to the summer of 1864. Feb. 28, 1864, with the Dahlgren column of Kilpatrick's expedition, he took a commanding part in the desperate but unsuccessful attempt to liberate the Union soldiers confined in the Richmond prisons. This column, which started with five hundred and fifty picked men, returned with only two hundred and thirty-six.

Previous to and at the battle of Stony Creek on the Wilson raid he acted as adjutant-general to Col. Harhaus, then in command of the First Brigade. September 19th he led an advance squadron which brought on the battle of Winchester; he also led a squadron in the Luray valley fight. On the reorganization of the regiment, in October, he was appointed captain of Company B, but acted as major from that time on until near the close of the war. He was slightly wounded, March 15th, in a severe brush which his battalion had with a brigade of Pickett's division while on the march with Sheridan around Richmond to join Grant, and had a horse shot under him and narrowly escaped capture in the fight with Lee's retreating army, April 3d.

At the grand review at Washington, May 21st, he was presented with a major's commission by Governor Fenton's own hand. He was mustered out June 29th, receiving a high indorsement from his superior officers. After his return home he received a brevet as lieutenant-colonel from the Governor of New York. On the 15th of August following he engaged in the book business. The next winter, on recommendation of Gen. Grant, he was appointed first lieutenant in the Eighth New Jersey Cavalry, but, owing to business, he three months later tendered his resignation. In 1869 he was appointed postmaster at Newton, which office he has ever since held. He possessed some literary ability, and in 1870 established "Our Magazine," which fifteen months later was absorbed by Wood's "Household Magazine." In 1872 he disposed of his book-store to S. H. Shafer. He was a Democrat previous to the war, since which time he has been an active Republican.

On Sept. 29, 1869, he married Fannie L., daughter of Samuel and Elizabeth (Mattison) Smith, and has had born to him five children,—namely, Helen Virginia, Mary Elizabeth, Henry C. Kelsey, Alice Olivia, and Charles William.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE FIRST NEW JERSEY CAVALRY.

I.—ORGANIZATION OF THE REGIMENT.

THE FIRST REGIMENT of New Jersey Cavalry was composed largely of Sussex County men. It was raised in August and September, 1861. The order of the President calling for a regiment of volunteer cavalry from the State of New Jersey was issued to Hon. William Halsted, of Trenton, on the 4th of August, and allowed only ten days for raising the regiment; subsequently, ten days more were added to the time. For some reason, Governor Olden, then the executive of the State, did not see fit to recognize the proposed regiment as part of New Jersey's contingent of volunteers, and consequently it had to be raised under wholly independent auspices. Col. Halsted addressed himself with characteristic energy to the work of raising the regiment.

On the 24th of August the first four companies, under command of Maj. M. H. Beaumont, arrived in Washington, and only a week after six other companies were brought in by Col. Halsted himself, the whole going into camp on Meridian Hill.

The regiment was originally organized as follows: Colonel, William Halsted; Lieutenant-Colonel, J. H. Alexander; First Major, Myron H. Beaumont; Second Major, Henry O. Halsted; Surgeon, William W. L. Phillips; Assistant Surgeon, Ferdinand V. L. Dayton; Acting Adjutant, W. E. Morford; Chaplain, Henry R. Pyne; Quartermaster, Benjamin B. Halsted.

Company A.—Captain, John H. Sheluire; First Lieutenant, Jacob R. Sackett; Second Lieutenant, James H. Hart.

Company B.—Captain, Richard C. Lewis; First Lieutenant, William Frampton; Second Lieutenant, James Tompkinson.

Company C.—Captain, Ivins D. Jones; First Lieutenant, John S. Tash; Second Lieutenant, William W. Gray.

Company D.—Captain, Robert N. Boyd; First Lieutenant, John Worsley; Second Lieutenant, Henry W. Sawyer.

Company E.—Captain, John W. Kester; First

Lieutenant, Patton J. Yorke; Second Lieutenant, Francis B. Allibone.

Company F.—Captain, John H. Lucas; First Lieutenant, Moses W. Malsbury; Second Lieutenant, Aaron S. Robbins.

Company G.—Captain, John H. Smith; First Lieutenant, George W. Wardell; Second Lieutenant, Peter A. Berthoff.

Company H.—Captain, H. C. Perley; First Lieutenant, William T. Inman; Second Lieutenant, Myer Asch.

Company I.—Captain, Benjamin W. Jones; First Lieutenant, James Hunt; Second Lieutenant, Edward Field.

Company K.—Captain, Virgil Broderick; First Lieutenant, Thomas R. Haines; Second Lieutenant, John Fowler.

Company L.—Captain, William W. Taylor; First Lieutenant, Hugh H. Janeway; Second Lieutenant, Peter H. Langstaff.

Company M.—Captain, John P. Fowler; First Lieutenant, Horace W. Bristol; Second Lieutenant, Samuel Warbag.

Such was the official roster of the regiment when the companies took their places in camp. In the unsettled and confused state of things which followed during the two or three succeeding months, several important changes were made. The lieutenant-colonelcy was conferred permanently upon Joseph Karge, formerly an officer in the Prussian service, but for some years a naturalized citizen of the United States. His severe discipline at first occasioned some revolt, but in the end it was justified by the regiment, who proudly saw themselves attaining the order and efficiency of true soldiers. During the month of December the regiment was assigned to the division of Gen. Heintzelman, and, Col. Halsted having become involved in difficulty with the War Department, Lieut.-Col. Karge assumed command.

There was a sudden resumption of energy and discipline. Well sustained by the senior major, who, though young, was familiar with the routine of the cavalry service, Karge set to work to make soldiers of the officers and men. As a first step he sent the most inefficient officers and men before the examining board in Washington, thus starting the rest into activity. . . . In the five weeks of this régime a soldierly spirit was implanted in the men, which preserved its vitality through all the coming trouble.^{77*}

By the middle of January, Col. Halsted had settled his difficulty with the War Department. He was therefore restored to his regiment, which was removed from the jurisdiction of Gen. Heintzelman. Col. Halsted was nearly seventy years of age, and his herculean labors and perplexities had so worn upon his physical strength as to render doubtful his ability to endure the cavalry service. Therefore, upon the reorganization of the regiment by the State, he was superseded by Sir Percy Wyndham, an Englishman by descent, who had been a colonel in the Sardinian service, a soldier under Garibaldi, and a chevalier of the Military Order of Savoy.

We give from Foster's history of the regiment Col. Wyndham's order upon assuming command :

"HEADQUARTERS FIRST NEW JERSEY CAVALRY, }
"February 9, 1862. }

"[Regimental Order No. 1.]

"I, Sir Percy Wyndham, colonel-brigadier of the Italian army, having been recommended by Maj.-Gen. McClellan, and duly commissioned as colonel of the First Regiment of New Jersey Cavalry by the Governor of the State of New Jersey, do hereby assume command of this regiment, which from this day is known and recognized by the Governor of New Jersey as the First Regiment of New Jersey Cavalry. The monthly allowance made by the State to the families of her volunteers will hereafter be paid to the relatives of the patriotic sons of New Jersey who are in the ranks of this regiment. The regiment is now well armed and splendidly mounted, and all that is needed to put it in the most efficient state is strict obedience to orders and thorough military discipline; and the colonel commanding desires the assistance of all officers and men to attain this end,—the well-being of the regiment being the first.

"SIR P. WYNDHAM,

"Colonel Commanding."

II.—SERVICE IN THE FIELD.

Spending the winter and early spring in scouting and picket-duty, the regiment, on the 18th of April, 1862, was ordered to Fredericksburg to join Gen. McDowell. On the 29th it proceeded towards the lower extremity of North Neck, whence a party of twenty men, under Lieut. Walter R. Robbins, was sent towards the extremity of the Neck upon a difficult expedition, which they accomplished without loss, returning with some two hundred negroes and a number of horses. On the following Saturday and Sunday the regiment made a reconnoissance across the country to the Potomac, and on the 28th returned to camp near Falmouth. Here the regiment was brigaded with the First Pennsylvania Cavalry, under command of Brig.-Gen. George D. Bayard. Remaining here engaged in picket-duty till May 25th, at that date the brigade moved across the river and advanced on the plank road as far as Salefin Church, whence it pushed on to the front of the army, within hearing of the guns at the battle of Hanover Court-house. At this point orders were received to march into the Shenandoah valley for the purpose of opposing Stonewall Jackson, and the regiment and brigade took up the line of march on the 28th. In five days they arrived at Strasburg, where they captured about one hundred and fifty rebel stragglers.

The Second Battalion of the First Cavalry, headed by Lieut.-Col. Karge, at once pushed forward in pursuit of the retreating enemy, and, overtaking the rear-guard, charged upon them, capturing a number of prisoners. At length the rebel line of cavalry appeared drawn up across the road and covered by a small stream, the bridge over which had been hastily destroyed.

"At this moment Wyndham brought up the rest of his regiment at a gallop, and without pause the three battalions, in different columns, were thrown across the stream against the enemy. The fourth squadron,—Companies D and F,—covering their advance in a ravine, struck the road close to the enemy, and in close column of fours wheeled into it to charge. Just as they debouched upon it a deep voice from the tall wheat of the adjacent field called out, 'Ready, aim!' and a regiment of rebel infantry rose up from their concealment. 'Down on your saddles, every man!' shouted Capt. Boyd as the order to fire issued from the rebel commander. Each man stooped to his horse's neck, and the whole volley whistled harmlessly over the heads of the troops, riddling the fence behind. Simultaneously with the infantry, the rebel cavalry in the road opened right and left, uncovering a section of artillery in position. 'Right about, wheel, march, trot, gallop!' shouted Boyd with an energy proportioned to the emergency. As the column dashed round the bend of the road a few scattering shots from the infantry were sent after it, killing the blacksmith of Company D, while just as the rear got out of range the canister of the artillery tore along the causeway,—too, late, however, to hurt them.

"The rebel battery continuing its fire, the First Battalion (Beaumont's) took a wider sweep and now came towards the road in the rear, while a portion of the Third, under Haines and Janeway, strove to take it more in front. As our men, advancing, set up their wild cheer, the supporting rebel cavalry broke and retreated in disorder, leaving the guns without protection and causing the artillerists and drivers to waver. But by each gun sat the officer of the piece with his pistol in his hand, holding the men sternly to their places. Deserted by their supports, our men still pressing on, and their pistol-shots whistling in advance of them, these gallant fellows forced their gunners to limber up as accurately as if on drill, and then at a gallop the pieces were whirled along to the rear. Maj. Beaumont and Capt. Bristol and Kester, with Sergt. Fowler, of Company E, and half a dozen men, dashed forward in pursuit through the field by the side of the road, firing their pistols as rapidly as the chambers would revolve, but the severe march of the past week and the desperate speed of the morning's chase told now exhaustingly upon the horses. In spite of all their efforts they were left behind, though Fowler, one of the corporals, and a private named Gaskill, found their animals so crazy with excitement as to be unmanageable. After the flying battery they raced with headlong speed, plunging at last right into the ranks of the rebels, who were obliged, in self-defense, to fire at those who were thus riding them down. Within a few yards of the rebel general Ashby himself Fowler was shot dead, the corporal wounded, and Gaskill unhorsed and taken prisoner.

"The scenes of the day closed with a fight between the rebel artillery and the First Maine Battery, which had intercepted them, the shells falling thickly among the men of the First New Jersey, who, as night came on, bivouacked upon their first battle-field. Ashby, without loss, drew off his command."

It will be impossible, in the space allotted to this sketch, to follow the regiment through all its movements.

The rebels in their retreat destroyed the bridge across a branch of the Shenandoah, then swollen with the recent rains; but on the second day after the battle our forces crossed and continued their march to New Market. On Friday, the 6th of June, the army arrived at Harrisonburg. A considerable battle was fought with the enemy at Cross Keys, on the road to Port Republic.

As Shel mire, with the leading squadron, passed the line of Sawyer's skirmishers, the latter called out to him to take care, for the enemy was in force in the woods beyond. The captain answered in his resolute way, "I have been ordered to charge any force I may meet, and it is my duty to try and do it." With these words he continued on. Wyndham carried his whole force forward with drawn sabres, all of them wild with the excitement of the race. "Gallop! Charge!" were his orders, and the whole body, half-armed, plunged forward to the attack. Two men—Charles Parry and William Traughan—fell dead, and a lad named Jonathan Jones reeled, mortally wounded, from his horse. The enemy were posted in the woods in force, and nothing was left to our men but to retreat and form line in the open field. Shel mire and Wyndham, however, had entered the woods, and the former, being driven back, was pressed by the enemy upon the right of the line just forming, throwing everything for the moment into inextricable confusion, and resulting in a retreat of our forces from the field.

"Among the last to retire was Capt. Thomas Haines. In the midst of the confusion his slender form was conspicuous as he called to the men of his company and sought to rally them around him. As he was crossing the heavy ground bordering the stream a squad of the Virginia cavalry, led by an officer in a long gray coat, who sat erect and easily upon his bounding charger, came down upon the flank of the fugitives. A bullet from that officer's pistol penetrated the body of Capt. Haines, who dropped, dying, from his horse. Broderick, in whose company he had been lieutenant, was close behind him when he fell. Rising on his horse, he turned round upon the rebels, and, shouting 'Stop!' fired his revolver at their leader. The officer reeled in his saddle, and his men, catching him in their arms, hurried back from the spot. Broderick stooped over Haines and called him by name, but there was no answer and no time to pause. Leaving the lifeless form as the enemy again pressed upon him, he sadly spurred his horse to a renewal of his flight."^{*}

* The body of Capt. Haines was in a few days recovered, some friendly farmer in the neighborhood having given it decent burial. The remains were removed and interred in the Harrisonburg churchyard.

The above action, known as the battle of Cross Keys, closed the campaign of Gen. Fremont in the Shenandoah valley. Gen. Pope then assumed command. The First New Jersey Cavalry was ordered to assist Gen. Hatch at Gordonsville and Charlottesville in holding the railroad and preventing connection with the valley. Hatch failed to comply with the instructions of Gen. Pope, and marched his command, by way of Sperryville, to Culpeper Court-house. On the last of July the regiment marched to the Rapidan and guarded the crossings of that river from Rapidan Station to Cave's Ford.

On the night of the 7th of August, "Stonewall" Jackson crossed with fifteen thousand men at Barnett's Ford. The following morning, at three o'clock, Col. Karge, with a battalion of the regiment, moved around the left of the enemy, where the rebel cavalry had left their tracks the night before. Dividing his force and pursuing different directions, they dashed upon and captured a party at breakfast, coming off with twenty-three prisoners.

Capt. Boyd, in the evening, found himself cut off from his command and pursued by a party of the enemy. Dashing into the woods, he managed to elude the foe, and the next morning joined his regiment as it was forming in line of battle.

The regiment behaved with great intrepidity at the battle of Cedar Mountain. It is said that in this action the steadiness of Capt. Lucas saved the day. Col. Karge was sick in the hospital at Culpeper Court-house. As soon as he returned to his regiment he issued the following congratulatory order:

"[Regimental Order No. 1.]

"HEADQUARTERS FIRST NEW JERSEY CAVALRY,]

"CAMP NEAR CEDAR MOUNTAIN, VA., Aug. 14, 1862.]

"The commanding officer of this regiment takes the first opportunity of expressing his high gratification at the cool and brave behavior of both the men and the officers during the last action. Although himself severely indisposed, he was watching the movements of the regiment and its intrepidity while under a galling fire with unlimited pride. Maj. Bennet, in command of the regiment, acquitted himself nobly as an officer by his coolness and the excellent manoeuvres which he performed under a heavy fire of shell.

"The commanding officer therefore gives his heartfelt thanks to you, brave defenders of your country and your principles, and you may well rest assured that the date of the 9th of August will be deeply impressed upon his heart as the day on which he has seen the regiment nurtured by him do its whole duty. The commanding officer desires to take notice of the coolness, prompt obedience to orders, and energetic performance of their duty by Hospital Steward Samuel C. Lane, Orderly William Shaw, Corp. Voorhees, Ambulance-Driver McAffee, and the men attached to the hospital department without exception, and to give them the thanks of the regiment for promptly assisting our brave wounded from the field, in spite of danger and under a heavy fire.

"By order of

"JAMES KARGE,

"Lieutenant-Colonel Commanding."

In relation to the action of this regiment at Cedar Mountain, Mr. Foster remarks,—

"The glorious resistance shown by our small force on the 9th was not followed up by Gen. Pope on the 10th, though the enemy was actually leaving his train and artillery teamless in the road, in a confused apprehension of pursuit from us; and on the 18th the First Regiment was ordered, with the other cavalry, to cover the rear in a retrograde movement."

At Brandy Station, on the 20th of August, the regiment, with its brigade, consisting of the First New Jersey, the First Pennsylvania, and the Second and Tenth New York Cavalry, was engaged with Stuart's (rebel) cavalry. "At the moment when the head of the opposing forces came together a lieutenant commanding the first platoon of the Second New York (Harris Light) Cavalry drew rein and backed his horse through the ranks behind him. Instantly the whole column halted in confusion, and a moment after the whole regiment broke and swept back, thus opening the centre of the field and forcing Karge to change front with his line. Before, however, the new formation could be completed, the masses of the enemy swept down upon the front and flank." Karge emptied the chambers of his revolver into their ranks, and then, throwing the weapon at their heads, dashed among them with his sabre, followed by the men around him. The enemy gave way before the impetuous charge. But, with both flanks of his line broken, all that he could hope to do was to regain the reserve in the rear and rally under cover of his charge; and, accordingly, skirmishers and main body, with one accord, spurred to the rear, fighting hand to hand as they did so with the foremost of their pursuers. A wide ditch stretched across the field, and was relied upon by the colonel to assist the reserve in their charge. Many of the exhausted horses fell as they strove to leap it, and headlong above them rolled the pursuing rebels. As he drew near the ditch, the last man of the Jersey (?), Lieut. Robbins' horse fell dead beneath him. Robbins kept his feet, and actually sprang across the ditch on foot, but he was soon seized by his pursuers, dragged to the rear, and cut down while a prisoner, though fortunately saved from death by a metal plate in the top of his cap." In this engagement Karge was disabled, Hicks hurt and unhorsed, Robbins and Stewart fell into the enemy's hands, and many others were captured, but were cut out by the well-timed charge of Broderick, Lucas, and their comrades.

Instances of heroism and soldierly bearing are numerous in the history of this regiment. For example, at Cedar Mountain: "There was a slight confusion in the ranks of Company A. 'Steady, there!' cried the commanding officer. Two men—Washington Raimer and Albert Young—drew their horses out of the ranks and saluted, saying, quietly, 'We are hit, sir,' as they moved to the rear. The ranks closed up again like a wall, and in ten minutes these two men, instead of nursing their hurts, had the balls extracted, the wounds bandaged by the surgeon, and before the blood had clotted on the lint were once more back in their places."

At Aldie, on the 30th of October, Stuart, with a large force of rebel cavalry, made an onslaught upon Stoneman's pickets, capturing all but a dozen or more men. "Capt. Kester at once gathered his men together, and, forming in the village street, awaited the onset of the rebels. Down the hill they came with a headlong dash, expecting to carry everything before them, and, wheeling into the village, rode at our little squadron. But the brave band never wavered at their approach, and instinctively the leading files of the Virginians began to lessen their speed. At the moment when their ranks were thus thickened and confused Capt. Kester poured into them a volley from his carbines, and then, with sabres drawn and a ringing cheer, his troops charged the startled enemy. Back rushed the rebels to escape the shock, and after them went the captain, while close upon his heels followed the rest of the First New Jersey, eager to press the advantage."

At Brandy Station, Col. Wyndham was in command of the Second Brigade, composed of the First New Jersey, First Michigan, and First Pennsylvania Cavalry. Maj. Janeway commanded the regiment. In his report to the adjutant-general of the State he says,—

"Col. Wyndham moved his troops with such celerity that we were upon the enemy almost before they were aware of our vicinity. The fight lasted four hours, and was a continued succession of the most brilliant charges ever made. Every officer acted with the utmost bravery and coolness, and it is impossible for men to behave better than did ours. They proved themselves well worthy of the State from which they came, and more cannot be said in their praise."

The severity of the engagement at Brandy Station is attested by the fact that out of thirty-nine horses in the second squadron twenty-seven were left on the field, and that of two hundred and eighty officers and men in the regiment six officers and over fifty men were killed, wounded, or missing. Of the three senior officers on the field, Wyndham received a ball in his leg, which unfitted him several months for active service, and Broderick and Shelmire never came off the field alive.

As the battle opened at Gettysburg on the decisive day,—July 3, 1863,—the First Jersey was advanced from the very rear some two miles to the front, arriving just in time to see the dense column of the rebel cavalry pouring upon the flank of the army. Leaping from their horses, forming line as they touched the ground, and starting at once into a run in the very face of the enemy, the regiment dashed at the nearest cover, where, supported only by a little squadron of their own reserves, they prepared to check the progress of the entire force arrayed against them. "And they did it, and more, even driving back" the assailing columns. Refusing to dismount in spite of the storm of bullets constantly whistling over the heads of his men, Janeway rode from end to end of the line of skirmishers, encouraging, warning, and directing its every portion. Advancing from point to point, heralding each renewed charge with a cheer which shook the enemy worse than the bullets of their carbines, for more than a hundred yards the First Jersey pushed their little line, and at last, with ammunition exhausted, they still held their ground, facing the rebels with their revolvers.

At length the Third Pennsylvania Cavalry came upon the line, and the First New Jersey was at liberty to retire. But no! Borrowing ammunition from the Pennsylvanians, they held their ground, cheering lustily and flinging defiance at the rebels. Meantime, the grand attack of Longstreet had been made and repulsed, and all that remained was for the cavalry to sweep away the rebel horse from the flank.

Guarding the line and picketing far to the front, the First Jersey watched through the night upon the bloody ground until the welcome light of the nation's birthday permitted them to seek a brief season of repose.

At Sulphur Springs and Bristow Station the reputation of the regiment was well sustained. "The steady fire of Capt. Malsbury's squadron, though composed largely of recruits, completely frustrated the attempts of the enemy."⁹⁸ The First New Jersey came out of this contest with the loss—wonderfully small under the circumstances—of four officers and thirty men. The only prisoner lost was Lieut. Kinsley, who was missing by accident.†

In Meade's advance across the Rapidan, on the 26th of November, the First New Jersey was sent in advance to a position near Hope Church, on the Fredericksburg and Orange plank road. Here they had an engagement with a body of rebel cavalry which disputed their advance. They were stationed in a thicket of woods, into which the First New Jersey and First Pennsylvania, dismounting, plunged, and with a cheer that rolled along the line, waking the echoes of the solitude, dashed upon the enemy. The skirmishers fell back with a loss of forty prisoners, including several officers. Pushing back the rebel line to a point where a desperate struggle ensued, twenty-seven of the regiment, officers and men, were killed or so wounded as to be disabled. Jamison was shot through the heart, Gray had his hand shattered, Lane was almost stunned, and Hobensack was struck so violently by a piece of shell as to be for some minutes crazed. Yet they carried skirmish-line and battle-line in the face of the rebel artillery, pushing them back for a quarter of a mile, till they were relieved by the Fifth Corps.

In December the regiment went into winter quarters at Warrenton. One of the exploits of the winter of 1863-64 is thus detailed in an official report of Lieut.-Col. Kester to Governor Parker:

"I have the honor to report that on the 17th inst. (February, 1864) I was ordered to take three hundred and fifty men (comprising one hundred and fifty of the First New Jersey Cavalry, under command of Capt. Hart, and two hundred men of the First Pennsylvania, First Massachusetts, and Third Pennsylvania) and attempt the capture of Mosley's guerrillas. We started from Warrenton at ten o'clock on the evening of the 18th inst., and marched rapidly, it being cold, to Salem. At that point I detached fifty men to meet me at Paris and at Pleshmont. I sent Capt. Hart with one hundred and fifty First New Jersey to pass through Piedmont Valley and join me at Paris in Ashly's Gap, and with one hundred and fifty men I started for Markham Station, in Manassas Gap. The party of fifty men reached Paris without capturing any guerrillas. The party under Capt. Hart passed through Piedmont Valley to Paris, capturing fifteen guerrillas and a large number of horses, arms, and equipments. The party with myself passed through Manassas Gap to Markham, and from that point crossing the mountain to Paris, in Ashly's Gap. We captured nineteen guerrillas and a large number of horses, arms, and equipments, and some medical stores. It was twelve o'clock before I reached Paris, at which place I halted one hour to feed. At one o'clock I started to return. In the mean time the guerrillas had collected to the number of about one hundred, and attempted to capture my rear-guard, which was under the command of Capt. Hart. The enemy charged several times, but was repulsed with loss. The casualties on our side were Capt. Hart wounded and two horses killed. Capt. Hart was wounded at Upperville, and traveled with the column to Warrenton without complaint,—a distance of twenty-six miles. The distance marched by us was seventy-four miles in twenty-two hours. Great credit is due to Capt. Hart; also to Lieuts. Lame, Dye, and Cause."

During the battles of the Wilderness and in turning Lee's right wing in the advance on Richmond the regiment did excellent service, and maintained its reputation for daring hardihood and brilliant exploits. In an engagement on the 28th of May, 1864, the ammunition of the men gave out while they were hardly pressed by the enemy. A new supply was brought from the rear, and Capt. Beckman was shot through both hands as he stretched them forth in the act of distributing ammunition to the men. Lieut. Bellis was almost at the same moment mortally wounded, as was also Lieut. Stewart. Capt. Robbins was wounded severely in the shoulder, Lieut. Shaw badly in the head, Lieut. Wynkoop fearfully in the foot. Lieut. Bowne was the only officer of the First Battalion on the field who was untouched, and he had several narrow escapes.

The regiment rendered Gen. Warren efficient assistance in the destruction of the Weldon Railroad, repelling the attack on the extreme left, and thus securing the line of the road. Here, in the front line, fell dead or mortally wounded a number of the gallant men who had fought on many a hard field, just as the term of service for which they had enlisted expired.

On the 1st of September, 1864, the men whose term of service had expired embarked at City Point for Trenton, N. J., but leaving the regiment, as an organization, still in the field. It participated in the engagement at Stony Creek and in the final campaign of the war.

The following non-commissioned officers and privates received "medals of honor" from the Secretary of War for gallantry in the campaign: First Sergt. George W. Stewart, Company E; Sergt. Aaron B. Tompkins, Company G; Sergt. David Southard, Company C; Color-Sergt. Charles Wilson; Sergt. William Porter, Company H; Sergt. Charles Titus, Company H; Sergt. John Wilson, Company L; Corp. William B. Hooper, Company L; Private Christian Strauch, Company I.

taken, remarks, "In these 'medals of honor' the soldier received a token which is of more value than any which could be given; they stamp the recipient a brave and faithful soldier,—a name to be honored and revered."

The major also says, "Sergt.-Maj. William T. Allen and Samuel Walton, Company A; Charles Krouselmire and John Teirney, Company B; Sergts. William B. Bronson, C. Marshall, and Chester Merith, Company C; Sergt. John Warren, Company D; Sergt. John Shields, William Russell, and John Foggerty, Company E; Sergts. Michael Williams and Edward F. Wenner, Company G; Sergts. John Brockfank and William Hudson, Company H; Corp. Philip Klespies, Company H; Sergts. G. W. McPeck, Aaron H. White, William H. Powell, and William Booth, Corps. Joseph Marsh and Francis Brown, Company K; Sergt. William Stout, Corps. John McKinney and James Brady, Company L; Sergts. John Davis, James S. Fallman, and Corp. William B. Easton, Company M, are all worthy of mention. They are known in the regiment for their good conduct in this memorable campaign."

III.—BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THOMAS RYERSON HAINES, son of the Hon. Daniel Haines, formerly Governor of New Jersey, was born at Hamburg, in the county of Sussex, March 15, 1838. Having graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1857, and read law for the requisite term, a part of which was spent in the Law School of the University of Cambridge, he was admitted to the bar of New Jersey in June, 1860, and commenced practice in the city of Newark.

In politics he adopted the principles avowed by the Democratic party, but secession he denounced as a political heresy, the storming of Fort Sumter as an overt act of treason, and the armed rebellion which followed as an assault upon the life of the nation, to be repelled and suppressed by all the nation's force. From the time of that insult to the American flag he was resolved to offer his services to his country. In August, 1861, he was commissioned first lieutenant in Company K of the First New Jersey Cavalry Regiment. Accustomed to the saddle from childhood and dextrous in the use of the broadsword, that arm of the service pleased him most. Within ten days of the notice of his appointment he took leave of his home and the loved ones there, and reported at Trenton for duty.

Early in September the regiment moved to the vicinity of Washington City. Then the task of drilling raw recruits was commenced in earnest and accomplished with success, his rule being "never to undertake to drill the men in any movement without first thoroughly understanding it himself." While exacting strict obedience to every order, he scrupulously sought to promote the personal comfort of his men. Nor was he indifferent to their moral training.

He persuaded his company to listen daily to a portion of Scripture. The reading of the non-commissioned officer appointed not proving satisfactory to all, he assumed the exercise himself, reading selected passages, explaining and sometimes commenting upon the text. No officer was more sincerely beloved by his men. His labors were not confined to the duties of a lieutenant. He was made regimental judge-advocate, for which office his legal attainments well qualified him. At the solicitation of the commander he assumed the duties of adjutant. He declined an appointment on a general's staff, preferring to remain in his own regiment and share the hardships of the men who had been enlisted by him. He was afterwards commissioned as captain of Company M. This company, as well as Company K, was recruited in Hamburg, his native place, and vicinity. In every capacity he took a full share of all the perils and hardships encountered by the regiment, which, from the time it was brigaded, was almost constantly made the advance-guard.

On the 25th of May, 1862, the brigade, under Gen. Bayard, was moving from Fredericksburg towards Richmond, when it received orders to join the forces of Gen. Fremont in pursuit of the rebel general Jackson. By forced marches it reached Strasburg on the evening of Sunday, June 1st. The next morning the First New Jersey Cavalry charged through the village, and upon the rear of Jackson's retreating forces. A succession of skirmishes ensued, and the batteries of the enemy, placed at commanding points to cover his retreat, were charged or flanked, always with success, but not without loss. At Fisher's Hill, Capt. Haines displayed great gallantry, leading the charge up the steep ascent by which the enemy were dislodged from their strong position.

On Friday, June 6, 1862, having driven the enemy through Harrisonburg, Col. Percy Wyndham, in command, fell into an ambuscade, and was, with others, captured, and a number of his officers and men killed and wounded. In the engagement there was a fierce hand-to-hand conflict with Ashby's cavalry. The rebel cavalry were put to flight, and the New Jersey regiment, pressing on in rapid pursuit, soon found themselves in the midst of an infantry brigade, who poured into them a deadly fire. Unsupported by the accompanying regiments, they were thrown into confusion, several companies breaking, and soon they were in hasty retreat. "Among the last to retire was Capt. Haines. In the midst of the confusion his slender form was conspicuous as he called to the men of his company and sought to rally them around him. As he was crossing the heavy ground bordering on the stream a squad of Virginia cavalry, led by an officer in a long gray coat, came down upon the flank of the fugitives. A bullet from the officer's pistol penetrated the body of Capt. Haines, who dropped dying from his horse."—Chaplain Pyne.

A rebel trooper dashed up, and as he lay prostrate inflicted a sabre-cut on his head. One who was present says of him, "Never was greater heroism displayed. Surrounded on all sides, he yet fought with the courage of an ancient Spartan, and twice he cut his way through; but a pistol-ball in his right side unhorsed him, and after he had fallen all the remaining pulsations of his warm heart were ended by a ghastly sabre-cut."

The next day officers in search of the body found it near the battle-field in a newly-made grave prepared by a good Dunker. Having no coffin, he lined the bottom and sides of the grave with green branches; then, spreading a cloth over the face and placing a board over all, he filled it in with earth, thus saving from further mutilation the fair features and graceful form of a young officer, and doing a kindly act to the remains of one whom he had never known in life.

On Sunday, the 8th of June, while the cannonade at Cross Keys thundered out a requiem, the body was reinterred in the Harrisonburg (Va.) churchyard with all the honors due to a colonel, voluntarily rendered by the whole regiment, every officer and man appearing like a chief mourner.

Governor Haines sought personally to recover the body of his son. The Secretary of State, Mr. Stanton, furnished him an order requiring the officers of the army to give all possible aid, and to the quartermaster's department to furnish all needful transportation, for the accomplishment of his purpose. Gen. Fremont received him kindly at his headquarters. But, the army having fallen back, Harrisonburg was now in possession of the enemy. A flag of truce with a communication from the general was sent, requesting permission for the removal of the body; but Gen. Jackson returned a cruel answer, and refused to allow its removal.

In September, 1864, the Union troops again penetrated the Shenandoah valley as far as Harrisonburg, when the remains were disinterred and sent with an armed escort to Martinsburg, Va. From thence they were brought to Hamburg, N. J., and interred in the North Church cemetery.

Such was the short and brilliant career of a gallant soldier and a true man. He was solemnly dedicated to the service of his country, and in that service nobly laid down his young life. None was more beloved, few could be more lamented.

CHAPTER XVII.

I.—THE THIRTIETH REGIMENT.

THE Thirtieth Regiment, mainly recruited in the county of Somerset, and mustered into service at Flemington, Sept. 17, 1862, had in it at its organization about thirty men from Warren County. These had been recruited by Capt. Benjamin F. Howey, the present sheriff of Warren, and, being a surplus over and above the number necessary to fill his company,—Company G, of the Thirty-first Regiment,—they were turned over to Edward S. Barnes, of Pah-quarry, Warren Co., and helped to make up Company D of the Thirtieth Regiment, of which Mr. Barnes was made first lieutenant. Lieut. Barnes died of fever at Aquia Creek, Va., Dec. 29, 1862, only a few months after the regiment had arrived at the seat of war, and his place was filled by William A. Henry.

II.—THE THIRTY-FIRST REGIMENT.

This regiment was recruited in Warren and Hunterdon Counties, Warren County furnishing six companies, namely, B, C, E, G, H, and I, and one-half of Company D, of the Thirtieth Regiment. The original roster of the regiment was as follows:

Colonel, Alexander P. Berthoud; Lieutenant-Colonel, William Holt; Major, Robert R. Honeyman; Adjutant, Martin Wyckoff; Quartermaster, Israel Wells; Surgeon, Robert B. Browne; Assistant Surgeons, Joseph S. Cook, Nathaniel Jennings; Chaplain, John McNair.

Company A.—Captain, Samuel Carhart; First Lieutenant, Leavitt Sanderson; Second Lieutenant, Andrew A. Thompson.

Company B.—Captain, Joseph W. Johnson; First Lieutenant, John C. Felver; Second Lieutenant, Frank P. Weymouth.

Company C.—Captain, Andrew J. Raub; First Lieutenant, Thomas T. Stewart; Second Lieutenant, Silas Hulsizer.

Company D.—Captain, Alexander V. Bonnell; First Lieutenant, John C. Coon; Second Lieutenant, Andrew T. Connett.

Company E.—Captain, Woodbury D. Holt; First Lieutenant, William L. Rodenburgh; Second Lieutenant, John Alpaugh.

Company F.—Captain, Peter Hart; First Lieutenant, Joseph E. McLaughlin; Second Lieutenant, James I. Moore.

Company G.—Captain, Benjamin F. Howey; First Lieutenant, William C. Larzelier; Second Lieutenant, James F. Green.

Company H.—Captain, David M. Trimmer; First Lieutenant, John N. Givins; Second Lieutenant, Henry Hance.

Company I.—Captain, Calvin T. James; First Lieutenant, Richard T. Drake; Second Lieutenant, James Prall.

Company K.—Captain, Nelson Bennett; First Lieutenant, Edson J. Rood.

In addition to the officers and men of the six companies and a half named above, of the field and staff Col. Alexander P. Berthoud, Lieut.-Col. William Holt, and Adj. Wyckoff were from Warren County. The number in all was 694. The regiment was mustered into service at Flemington, N. J., Sept. 17, 1862, and proceeded to Washington on the 26th of the same month. Here they remained, doing picket and fatigue duty, till the 1st of December, when they moved from Tenallytown and proceeded to Liverpool Point, on the Maryland side of the Lower Potomac. The regiment was organized as part of the Provisional Brigade, formed of the Thirtieth, Thirty-first, Twenty-second, and Twenty-ninth New Jersey and One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Pennsylvania. They crossed the Potomac on the 5th of December, landing at Aquia Creek, Va., where the men suffered greatly from exposure to the excessively cold and stormy weather. Soon after, the brigade was placed under command of Gen. Patrick, provost-marshal-general of the Army of the Potomac, and under his orders they were placed on post, railroad, and provost duty, the Thirty-first being stationed at Belle Plains, Va.

The regiment was thus in the vicinity of Fredericksburg, but did not participate in the great battle at that place, on the 13th of December, under Gen. Buraside. The Thirty-first, with its brigade, took part in the spring campaign of 1863, which culminated in the disastrous battle of Chancellorsville.

On the 29th of April the brigade crossed the Rappahannock at "Franklin's Crossing," below the town of Fredericksburg.

"On the morrow, late in the afternoon, the brigade was advanced to meet an approaching advance of rebel infantry, the Thirty-first forming the second line of battle, in support of the Twenty-ninth New Jersey. The line had scarcely been formed on the summit of the declivity forming the river-bank when the enemy quickly withdrew and opened a remorseless fire from his batteries which no troops were able to stand. The Twenty-ninth, being most exposed, fell back, forming in the rear of the Thirty-first, all the troops protecting themselves by lying flat on the ground. There were no casualties in the Thirty-first, owing to its fortunate position, but the firing was terrific. About dusk the firing slackened, and soon ceased, when the Thirty-first was ordered to advance under cover of the darkness and complete and occupy some rifle-pits in close proximity to the rebel line, which was at once done, the men working in profound silence most of the night in strengthening their position. . . . Day broke on the field, but passed, quite unexpectedly, as peacefully as if the foe had quit the scene. On the 2d, however, the batteries of the enemy opened with a terrible fire, compelling the division speedily to retire. The Thirty-first, however, maintained its position in comparative safety, relying upon its defenses, which were so well constructed as to be highly complimented by Gens. Wadsworth and Paul."*

During these operations the main force of Gen. Hooker had sustained a severe reverse at Chancellorsville, and orders were now received for Reynolds' corps to move up and reinforce the army at that point. In executing this movement it was necessary to hold the advanced line, with the apparent intention of engaging the enemy, until the main body of the corps had crossed to the north side of the river. The Thirty-first was a part of the rear-guard left for this purpose, and it was the last regiment to cross the pontoon-bridge, which it did under a most destructive artillery-fire from the enemy, who had by this time become aware of the purpose of the movement, and seemed determined to annihilate the little force which had held him at bay. An officer of the regiment, writing of the affair, said,—

"The situation of the regiment at this time was most critical. The correspondent of the New York Times reported the Thirty-first as 'cut to pieces.' When he left that portion of the field the regiment was nearly surrounded and the bridge in its rear partially destroyed. The whole corps was in motion, the Thirty-first alone excepted, it being left to hold the enemy at that point as long as possible, and to deceive him as to numbers. The men behaved admirably, marching firmly down to the bridge, where they were held until a battery had crossed, expecting every moment to be charged upon. After crossing we were obliged to scatter, as the enemy had accurate range of us. The colonel had previously designated a rallying-point for the regiment, which proved to be beyond his observation, and every man came to time in that race. We saved the battery, but came near losing the regiment."

After this crossing the Thirty-first moved rapidly on and rejoined the brigade, which had already advanced a considerable distance up the river.

The march of the brigade with its corps was made with all possible speed to United States Ford on the Rappahannock, several miles above Fredericksburg. This point was reached late in the night, and the wearied men bivouacked on the north bank for a brief rest. At daylight in the morning they crossed the river at the Ford, and the Thirty-first, with its brigade, moved along the line, by way of the Chancellor House, to the extreme right of the army, where it took position at sunrise on the 3d of May. Through all the day and succeeding night it remained in that position without becoming engaged. On the 4th the position of the Thirty-first was changed more to the right, but it was not brought into action on the field of Chancellorsville, though at times lying under very heavy fire. On the 5th orders were given for the army to withdraw to the north side of the Rappahannock, and during that night the regiment crossed the river. On the 7th it rejoined the brigade, which then went into camp near the "Fitzhugh House," not far from the river, and two or three miles below Fredericksburg.

No events of importance occurred thenceforth in the history of the regiment. When the Army of the

* Foster's "New Jersey and the Rebellion."

Potomac left the vicinity of Falmouth and started northward on the route that finally brought it to the field of Gettysburg, the Thirty-first moved with the other commands, but at the end of one day's march orders were received directing their return and muster out, their term of service having expired. Under these orders the regiment moved back to Falmouth, whence, after turning over their wagons and other quartermaster's property, they marched to Stafford Court-house, and from there to Dumfries and across the Occoquan to Alexandria. They soon moved across the Potomac to Washington, where a slight delay occurred, and then they were transported by rail to New Jersey and mustered out of the service at Flemington.

The experience of the regiment on the field of conflict had not been great, and their losses in actual battle were but nominal; but Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville had proved their bravery and steadfastness, and that they were worthy of the patriotic State which had sent them to the field.

During a considerable portion of the time Col. Berthoud commanded the brigade, owing to the expiration of Gen. Paul's term of appointment. Lieut.-Col. Holt resigned early in 1863, and the command of the regiment from that time till nearly the close of its service devolved upon Maj. Honeyman, of Somerset.

HISTORY OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

ORGANIZATION OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

I.—ORIGINAL BOUNDARIES.

SUSSEX was the thirteenth county of the State in the order of its erection. It was taken from the upper part of Morris County by an act of the General Assembly passed June 8, 1753. The boundaries were set forth as follows:

"That all and singular the land and upper parts of Morris County northward of Musconetcong River, beginning at the north of said river where it empties into the Delaware River, and running up said Musconetcong River to the head of the Great Bend; from thence northeast to the line that divides the province of New Jersey; thence along the said line to the Delaware River aforesaid; thence down the same to the mouth of the Musconetcong, the place of beginning; and the said Musconetcong River, so far as the County of Hunterdon bounds it, shall be the boundary line between that county and the county of Sussex.*"

At the original formation of the county of Sussex, Warren County was included in it. The latter was set off by an act of the Legislature passed Nov. 24, 1824, reducing Sussex to its present limits. It was named by Jonathan Belcher, Esq., Governor of New Jersey, in honor of the Duke of Newcastle, whose family seat was in the county of Sussex, England.

II.—CIVIL DIVISIONS.

The territory comprised in Sussex County, as originally formed, was included, in nearly equal proportions, in East and West Jersey. By the act of 1709, which defined the boundaries of the several counties of the province, the soil of Sussex was comprehended within the limits of Burlington. When Hunterdon was erected into a county, in 1713, this territory formed a part of the same; and in 1738, when Morris County was set off, it was included in the latter until erected into a separate county called Sussex. While included in Morris County, between 1738 and 1753, something like municipal organization was extended over the scattered population of this northwestern portion of the State. Townships were formed, with metes and bounds very imperfectly defined, yet answering in some sort the wants of the people. These townships were Walpack, New Town, Hardwick, and Greenwich,—the original townships of what are now Sussex and Warren Counties. One of them—Hardwick—was erected by royal patent. Walpack and New Town, at the period of which we speak, comprised all the territory constituting the present county of Sussex, except so much as is comprehended in Stillwater and Green, which two latter precincts, with all the present county of Warren, were covered by Hardwick and Greenwich. The settlements at this time were principally in Walpack and Greenwich and at certain points on the Wallkill, Papakating, Paulinskill, and Pequest. In 1738 the population of the whole province of New Jersey was only forty-seven thousand three hundred and sixty-nine, of which Sussex probably did not contribute more than five or six hundred.

New divisions were made when the county was set off from Morris, in 1753. During the fifteen years preceding rapid settlements had been made, and a spirit of enterprise and progress was manifest, not only in subdividing the forest, building mills, and opening roads, but in the conveniences inaugurated for local municipal regulation. The people, no longer content with the out-of-the-way privileges which they had enjoyed under Morris County, went to work to set in order that portion of the territory which had been assigned to their jurisdiction. In 1753 the anxiety to have the bounds of the old townships defined and new ones set off was so great that the court had to authoritatively direct "That the townships of Walpack, Greenwich, Hardwick, and New Town shall remain and continue in the county of Sussex as they formerly were in the county of Morris until further orders." In the term of May, 1754, Benjamin Smyth, William Schooley, John Depue, Johannes Cornelius Westbrook, Joseph Hull, Richard Gardiner, and Richard Lundy, Jr., who had been appointed a committee to divide the county into precincts, made a report, which was adopted, and which added three precincts to the original townships,—viz., Wantage, formed from parts of Newton, and Oxford and Mansfield-Woodhouse, from parts of Greenwich, Hardwick and Walpack retaining their original limits. The townships thus defined remained unaltered for a few years, when the increase of population led to further divisions. In 1759, Montague was erected from Walpack by royal patent. In 1762 another portion was taken from Walpack and called Sandyston, and in the same year Hardyston was formed from the northern part of Newton. Knowlton was set off from Oxford in 1764, Independence from Hardwick in 1782, Vernon from Hardyston in 1792, Frankford from Newton in 1797, and Byram, also from Newton, in 1798. These divisions multiplied the four original townships to fifteen, and there was no further alteration of the original landmarks until the county of Warren was set off from Sussex, in 1824. Stillwater and Green townships were formed from Hardwick in 1824.

The present civil divisions of the county are fifteen, as follows: Andover, Byram, Frankford, Green, Hampton, Hardyston, Lafayette, Montague, Sandyston, Sparta, Stillwater, Vernon, Walpack, Wantage, borough of Newton.

III.—COUNTY COURTS OF SUSSEX.

Courts were established in this county by a royal ordinance, of which the following is a verbatim copy:

"George the Second by the Grace of God of Great Britain, France and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all whom these presents may in any way concern, Sendeth Greeting: Whereas by a late Act of our Governor, Council and General Assembly of our Province of New Jersey Made in the Twenty-sixth year of our Reign, the upper parts of our County of Morris were separated from said County of Morris and erected into a distinct County and called the County of Sussex; and whereas the several times for the holding of Court of General Sessions of the Peace and Inferior Court of Common Pleas for our said County of Sussex are not yet fixed, Wherefore, for Ascertaining the same, Non know ye that of our special Grace and mere motion, we have Constituted, Ordained and Appointed, and by these presents, Do Constitute, Ordain and Appoint, that our Courts of General Sessions of the Peace and Inferior Court of Common Pleas, for our said County of Sussex, be held on the days and times following, to wit: One of the times for holding said Courts to begin on the third Tuesday in November, another on the third Tuesday in February, another on the fourth Tuesday in May, and the other on the fourth Tuesday in August, in every year; Each of which Courts shall continue and be held for any time not exceeding four days in each Term. We also Will, Ordain and Appoint, that our several Courts for our said County of Sussex, shall be held and kept at the Dwelling-House of Jonathan Pettit, Esq., at the place now called Hardwick in said County of Sussex, until there shall be a new Court House built and erected in and for said County, pursuant to the Act of our Governor, Council and General Assembly made in the Twenty-sixth year of our Reign, and no longer; and when said Court House for our said County of Sussex shall be built and erected, then We Will, Ordain and Appoint that our said several Courts of General Sessions of the Peace and Inferior Court of Common Pleas shall hereafter be held at the times hereinbefore appointed at said Court House to be built as aforesaid in and for the County of Sussex. We also Will, Give and Grant that the Justices of the Peace of our said County of Sussex, and the Judges of our said Inferior Court of Common Pleas for our said County of Sussex do exercise, use and have all such Powers and Jurisdictions in the said several Courts at the times herein Appointed as by Law they may and ought to exercise, use and hold. In testimony whereof we have caused the Great Seal of our said Province of New Jersey to be hereunto affixed. Witness our trusty and well Beloved Jonathan Belcher, Esq., our Captain-General and Commander-in-Chief of our said Province of New Jersey and Territories thereto depending in America, Vice-Admiral and Chancery in the same, &c., at our Borough of Elizabeth, the thirteenth day of October, in the Twenty-seventh year of our Reign.

This ordinance, and those of its class generally, although issued in the name of the king, really emanated from the Governor and council. The king or queen, according to the English constitution, is supposed to be the fountain of justice and general conservator of the peace. In the provinces this prerogative was liberally delegated to the Governor and Council, by virtue of which they granted patents establishing and altering the boundaries of townships, constituting municipal and other corporations, establishing and regulating ferries, constituting courts of justice, defining their powers, appointing the times and places at which they should be held, and regulating the fees of judges and officers. The judicial system, as partially established under Lord Cornbury,—the first of the royal Governors of New Jersey,—gave to justices of the peace cognizance of all cases to the amount of forty shillings. In each county there were established Courts of General Sessions of the Peace, each with quarterly terms, and Inferior Courts of Common Pleas, having power to try all actions at common law; and these courts convened and held their sessions at the same time and place. The Court of General Sessions of the Peace was composed of all the justices of the peace in the county, while the Common Pleas was presided over by judges appointed from among that number. In 1724 the Common Pleas Court was so restricted as to except causes wherein the right or title to lands, tenements, or hereditaments were in any way concerned; otherwise, it remains the same as originally established.

The first Courts of General Sessions of the Peace and of Common Pleas for Sussex County were held on Nov. 20, 1753, at the house of Jonathan Pettit, in the township of Hardwick. The royal ordinance so ordaining and appointing was read, as also the commissions of Jonathan Robeson, Abraham Van Campen, John Anderson, Jonathan Pettit, and Thomas Woolverton, Esqs., judges of the Common Pleas. These men were likewise empowered to act as justices of the peace, in connection with Richard Gardner, Obadiah Ayres, Japhet Byram, and Peter Decker. Jeremiah Condy Russell was appointed clerk, and Joseph Brackenridge was qualified to act as high sheriff of the county. Joseph Perry, of Newton, was sworn as constable, and the organization of the courts was completed, with the exception of grand and petit jurors, who necessarily had not been summoned for lack of officers duly empowered to discharge that duty. Nothing was done at this term except to grant tavern licenses and affix the rates of entertainment. Licenses were granted to Thomas Woolverton, Joseph Carpenter, Jonathan Pettit, Joseph Bell, Abraham Carman, Henry Hairlocker, and Casper Shafer. In the records of the court for this year we find the following:

"The Court affixed the several rates and prices of all liquors, meats, and entertainment for man and beast, and the several sums to be taken for the same:

For each person, dinner, hot, of three dishes.....	one shilling.
For dinner, cold.....	nine pence.
Wine per pint.....	eighteen pence.
Methuein per ditto.....	seven pence.
Strong Beer per quart.....	five pence.
Ship ditto.....	three pence.
Rum per gill.....	four pence.
Punch per quart, of loaf sugar.....	one shilling.
Ditto, of brown sugar.....	ten pence.
Hip per quart.....	ten pence.
Lodging each person per night.....	three pence.
Horses, oats per quart.....	peny-half-penny.
Stabling horses.....	one shilling.
Pasturing ditto.....	six pence."

"The business of tavernkeeping at this time, and for at least fifty years afterwards, was a stepping-stone to public distinction, as well as a source of pecuniary profit. Nearly all the early judges, justices, sheriffs, chosen freeholders, etc., were innkeepers. The number of hostleries continually augmented in consequence of the repute and influence they gained for their proprietors; but what was little to the credit of the fraternity was the fact that some of them, in order to increase their profits, would use diminutive measures in selling their liquors, oats, etc. The court felt itself scandalized by this mode of doing business, and, by way of suppressing it, took the precaution for several years to add to the annual rate bills which it made out an official notification in these words: 'Liquors and Oats, when called for, to be delivered in full measures.' Great inducements for wholesale lodging were also held out in those days, the charges being for one man in a bed, five pence; for two in a bed, three pence each; and for three in a bed, two pence each. Hence, when two men chose to bundle together instead of sleeping singly, they saved two pence each by the operation,—just enough to buy a gill of New England rum for their respective stimulation, provided they had a partiality for that most pungent and odoriferous of all alcoholic liquids.

"During the brief time the courts were held in Hardwick the business mainly related to the collection of debts; some cases of assault and a few offenses against chastity were reached and punished by indictment, but no crime of special magnitude required to be judicially investigated. The grand jurors appeared to be vigilant,—probably a little too much so; indeed, some of their presentments would be regarded at the present day as trilling and frivolous. In searching out small offenses upon one occasion they pounced upon a luckless wight named Richard Duddy, and formally presented him 'for damning His Grace the Duke of Cumberland.' This certainly was manifesting an excess of loyalty. The Duke of Cumberland never set his foot upon American soil; he was merely a leading general in the British army who was defeated at Fontenoy by the French, but who had balanced his misfortune by defeating the forces of the Pretender in Scotland on the field of Culloden, where he infamously signalized himself by inflicting the most savage cruelties upon the poor Scots whom he had vanquished. Duddy was doubtless a Scotchman, and the ebullition was entirely natural. The duke will certainly have esaped well if, after 'life's fitful fever,' he experienced no other damning, in righteous expiation of his crimes at Culloden, than that denounced against him by the irascible Richard Duddy."

The clerks of the courts were appointed by the Governor, and commissioned to hold during pleasure. There were, besides, one or more clerks of the circuit, who attended the sittings in the counties and kept their own minutes. A book containing such minutes of the Oyer and Terminer and Circuit Courts held in most of the counties from 1749 to 1762 is preserved in the clerk's office of the county of Middlesex. The Oyer and Terminer, as well as the Circuit, was regarded as a branch of the Supreme Court, and the proceedings therein were subject to its control. The clerks exercised the power of appointing deputies.

The Supreme Court was organized in 1704, and met once a year at Perth Amboy and Burlington. In 1714 it was required to meet twice a year in each place, and courts for the trial of issues were appointed to be held yearly in each county. Circuits were established in 1751, and subsequently the time for holding them was fixed by the Supreme Court. They were held in Sussex County in May and November of each year, the Oyer and Terminer being held at the same time.

IV.—SUSSEX COURT-HOUSE AND JAIL.

The courts of the county were first held at the residence of Jonathan Pettit, Esq., in Hardwick township, in accordance with the ordinance of 1753. The locality is now known as Johnsonsburg, and lies within the present limits of Warren County. No court-house was ever erected there, although an effort was made to secure to that place the permanent seat of justice. On March 21, 1754,* the board of justices and freeholders met at the house of Samuel Green, in the neighborhood, and appointed a meeting of all the qualified voters of Sussex to be held at the house of the said Samuel Green on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of April, 1754, "to elect a place to build a jail and court-house." The meeting was duly held, but was very thinly attended on account of the difficulty of getting there from the remote parts of the county. The jail was ordered to be built near Pettit's tavern, on lands of Samuel Green, at the expense of the county. Mr. Green gave an obligation,† in the penalty of five hundred pounds, "to secure to the county of Sussex the liberty and use of the ground where the jail is built by Jonathan Pettit, while the court is continued there." Jonathan Pettit and Richard Lundy were appointed to superintend its erection.*

* The following is a copy of the proceedings of the meeting, taken from the records of the board of justices and freeholders:

The jail was built of logs, and soon completed. This gave to early Johnsonsburg the sobriquet of "the Log Jail," by which it was familiarly known.† The board of justices and freeholders met in Pahaquarry and examined the bills for materials and labor. They were ascertained to amount to thirty-seven pounds two shillings ten pence.‡ The jail was not considered safe, and "the board appointed Samuel Wilson and Richard Lundy, Jr., to finish it as they should judge needful." This they did, and the additional work swelled the cost to forty-one pounds three shillings one penny, about thirty pounds of which was for iron and blacksmithing, leaving for work, boards, etc., about eleven pounds.

This building was used nine years as a jail, and a watchman was paid five shillings a day (of twenty-four hours) for watching it. Yet the prisoners escaped, and the sheriff would plead "clearance of damages" on account of the unsafe condition of the prison. The county, however, became responsible for the amount of about six hundred pounds on account of the "flight of imprisoned debtors," about fourteen times the sum originally expended in erecting the jail.

Courts were subsequently held at Wolverton's tavern, in the same neighborhood, but the place and the accommodations were designed to subserve only a temporary purpose. Accordingly, at the earliest convenient period, Abraham Van Campen, Esq., was dispatched to Perth Amboy with a petition of the people to the General Assembly, praying for authority to erect a court-house and jail, and on Dec. 12, 1761, that body passed an act granting the desired privilege and ordering that the building be erected "on the plantation in possession of Henry Hairlocker, within half a mile of said Hairlocker's dwelling-house; the particular spot to be fixed, with the consent of the owner of the land, by a majority of the Justices and Freeholders of said County." The owner of the land occupied by Hairlocker was Jonathan Hampton, Esq., a citizen of Essex County, and he, in conjunction with the board, took the matter immediately in hand and decided that the course from Hairlocker's dwelling should run south, "which brought the site of the court-house in the meadow below. However, by stretching the chain they managed to crowd the site partly up the hill, and there it remains till this day. Although the fault is invariably attributed to a blunder of the Legislature, it is not true. The Legislature did not require the board and the owner of the land to take any particular course in running out the half-mile from Hairlocker's dwelling, and consequently, if the local authorities so managed as to land it in a ditch, they alone are to blame."

For the purpose of building the court-house a tax of five hundred pounds was at first levied upon the county in 1762, to which other assessments were added during the two following years. "The total cost of the building and furniture was two thousand one hundred pounds proclamation money,—equal to five thousand six hundred dollars." The managers under whose direction the building was erected were Abraham Van Campen, Jacob Starn, and John Hackett.‡ In 1763 the cells, or that portion which

During the May term of 1765 courts were opened in the building, and the managers delivered it to the board of justices and freeholders as a finished edifice. "Devoted originally to the conservation of royal authority, it became in a few years the agent and exponent of republican equality and justice. For a period of seventy-nine years this solidly-constructed temple of justice, unaltered in its external appearance, firmly resisted the 'corroding tooth of Time,' and retained its identity amidst surrounding change and innovation. In 1844 the old edifice was enlarged. Its steep angular roof disappeared; its gray walls, which had withstood the blasts of eighty winters, received a coating to cover their nakedness, and massive pillars, surmounted by a corresponding entablature, adorned its front, entirely obscuring the familiar outlines of the old building. Thus enlarged and renovated, it stood until Thursday, Jan. 28, 1847, when it was destroyed by fire. Immediate measures were taken for its reconstruction, and the present commodious court-house arose upon its ruins."

CONTINUATION OF THE CIVIL HISTORY OF SUSSEX.

I.—DEED OF CONVEYANCE BY JONATHAN HAMPTON.

THE land upon which the court-house stands, with the public green annexed, was conveyed to the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Sussex on Aug. 31, 1764, by Jonathan Hampton, Esq., of Essex County. It was through the exertions of Mr. Hampton that the Legislature was induced to select Newton as the county-seat in place of Stillwater, more centrally located in the county and then pressing its claims as the most formidable competitor. Mr. Hampton also conveyed land for an academy at Newton, and the same now forms a part of the cemetery near the Episcopal church. We give below a verbatim copy of the deed for the court-house lot and public square in Newton, taken from the records:

pen, Jacob Stern, and John Hackett to be managers and directors of the Court-House and Goal to be erected southward of the house of Henry Hackett aforesaid. In witness whereof we have herewith set our hands this 13th of May, 1762.

II.—NOTES FROM THE FREEHOLDERS' RECORDS.

The expenditures of the county for 1754 were ninety-six pounds sixteen shillings. This was chiefly for building the "log jail" and to pay the bounty on wolves' scalps.

"At a meeting of the Justices and Freeholders the fourteenth day of May, 1775, the County Collectors accounts being audited it appears that the said Collector received £105, 7 6½ for the use of the County."

The county collector was Thomas Woolverton, Esq., and the treasurer was Samuel Smith.

"May 12, 1766.—Agreed that there shall be paid to Jeremiah Condy Russell for a Record for the County and a Seal for the same, £1 12s. Agreed to pay W. Wagner for making and putting a lock on the Goal, according to agreement, £2 10s."

Thomas Woolverton, Esq., served as collector of the county till the summer of 1759. He appears to have died about that time, at his residence, in Newton, for on May 9, 1759, "the Justices and Freeholders met at the house of Thomas Woolverton, Esq., in Newton," and on the 20th of September following they met "at the house of Widow Woolverton," in the same village, at a special meeting to choose a county collector in Mr. Woolverton's place. Two candidates were nominated, Samuel Lundy and Ephraim Darby,—as the record says, "to be voted for, and the majority of votes carried it in favor of Samuel Lundy to be County Collector."

* This deed was delivered by Mr. Hampton to Thomas Anderson, Esq., March 31, 1783, to have the same entered on record. It is recorded in Book B, folio 145.

Among the items paid by the county in 1760 we find "Cash paid to Ephraim Darby for Judge Nevels expenses the sum of £192 19s. 4d." This sum, we take it, was paid to Judge Neville for holding Oyer and Terminer in Sussex County, which was probably the first instance of that court being held in the county.

In 1761 the board of justices and freeholders met at the house of John Downy, in Hardwick. The usual sum of one hundred pounds was ordered to be assessed upon the taxable property of the county. The collector had been in the habit of being delinquent in small sums in the payment of the taxes to the treasurer, and the board resolved not to tolerate this lax way of doing business, and so ordered "that the County Collector shall pay the said money immediately on demand after he shall receive the same or any part thereof, towards defraying the debt now outstanding for wolves' and panthers' heads and other necessary expenses, which shall or may be ordered by the Justices and Freeholders of said County."

In 1774 the quotas of assessment for the towns of the county were as follows:

Newton.....	121	2	4
Mansfield.....	77	19	5
Greenwich.....	163	5	5
Oxford.....	112	19	3
Knowlton.....	121	15	0
Walpack.....	43	9	4
Montague.....	40	8	11
Sandyston.....	49	2	0
Wantage.....	62	9	9
Hardwick.....	229	0	9
Hardyston.....	117	8	7

This, with a balance in the treasury of £56 10s. 5d., made the sum-total for the county £1185 11s. 2d.

The taxes increased rapidly during the Revolution. From July, 1777, to Sept. 27, 1778, the amount collected was £5868 4s. 8d. Of this amount, £43 10s. 3d. was from militia fines. From Sept. 27, 1778, to May 8, 1779, the tax collected in the county was £8054 15s. 10d. Peter B. Shaver was duly elected county collector July 8, 1777. The following certificate appears Oct. 22, 1779:

"We have examined and cast the receipts by Mr. Shaver to this time, and find them amount to £17,932 2s. 9d."

Signed by Timothy Symmes, Gabriel Ogden, and Charles Rhodes.

The following, under date of Oct. 7, 1779, shows that all the money collected was not genuine:

"Ordered that the Counterfeit money in the late County Collector's hands paid into him as tax, the loss shall ly on the whole County."

This item follows:

"Ordered that the Laws of this State be brought by Timothy Symmes, Esq., into this County at the expense of the County."

The following statement is copied from the freeholders' records, folio 77:

"A list of the Quotas of the several Townships in the County of Sussex settled January 13, 1781:

	May Tax.	Aug. and Jan. Tax.
Sandyston.....	£3,050	£7,723
Hardyston.....	10,728	27,086
Knowlton.....	16,227	40,974
Mansfield.....	14,347	28,874
Hardwick.....	26,909	67,944
Greenwich.....	15,985	40,381
Oxford.....	12,910	32,552
Wantage.....	6,281	16,100
Newton.....	12,777	32,256
Walpack.....	4,089	11,838
Montague.....	3,924	9,906
	£125,336	£315,673

The addition of these totals makes a grand aggregate for the county of £441,009 for 1781. At the bottom of the certificate is written "True Copy." Signed by Guisbert Sutfin, John Cortright, Japheth Byram, Jacob Stoll, Joseph Gaston, and Manuel Hover.

At a meeting of the justices and freeholders of the county, Nov. 10, 1780,

"Timothy Symmes was by a Majority of the votes elected County Collector. Voted that the County pay a fine inflicted on Mr. Ogden by the Treasurer for not Conveying Taxes to him. Voted that three hundred pounds in the hands of the former Collector be paid to Mr. Ker to discharge the Collector's Fine, and cast if sufficient. Voted that Timothy Symmes and Wm. Anderson draw up a petition to the Assembly and put the Names belonging to this Board to it, praying that they will pass an Act to enable the Treasurer of this State to receive £1695: 1: 6 of old Jersey Money from the former Collector—little more in the hands of the Town Collectors of the same Money."

"Voted that the God and Court House be repaired by Sheriff Ker at his own discretion and that his account be laid before the board at their next meeting.

"Voted that eight thousand pounds Continental money† be levied by a Tax on the County and Collected with the next tax that is levied on the County."

July 23, 1781, £8000, Continental money, was assessed upon the county, the quotas being divided among the several townships as follows:

Hardyston.....	688	0	2
Newton.....	819	8	0
Wantage.....	499	4	4
Oxford.....	827	19	1
Mansfield.....	734	9	10

Walpack.....	319	19	1
Hardwick.....	1726	15	3
Greenwich.....	1025	16	2
Montague.....	251	13	1

"A hard-money tax of £6000" was also levied, and proportionally divided among the townships. From Oct. 15, 1781, to April 22, 1782, the tax collections of the county amounted to £18,119 15s. 9d., of which

* These were the laws passed by the new Legislature under the constitution of 1776.

† This is the first notice of Continental money we meet with in the record. It was about this time taking the place of the "old Jersey money" referred to above, and hence the desire to get an act of the Legislature to substitute the former for the latter.

£6316 1s. 8d. was in specie and the balance in "State Money and Certificates." These assessments were made, the record tells us, "by virtue of an act passed at Trenton the 26th of December, 1781, for Raising the sum of One hundred and fifty thousand pounds in Money and Certificates; also an Act passed the 29th December to provide for the defence of the Frontiers and for defraying the expenses of the Government of this State."

The tax of this year was payable quarterly, March 25, June 25, April 1, and July 1, 1782.

"June 18, 1782.—Ordered that the County Collector Call on the Estate of John Backett, Abram Van Campen, and Jacob Stern, deceased, and settle with them for the sum of Two Hundred Pounds, with the interest due thereon, advanced by the Treasurer of the then Province* to purchase Riced Corn for the use of the Inhabitants† Also to call on Nathaniel Pettit, Esq., for their account of the Notes delivered him to be presented for the flour delivered;‡

In pursuance of an order of the justices and freeholders, March 14, 1783, the following letter, addressed to the town collectors of the several townships, was written, and twenty copies of it sent to the said collectors:

"NEWTOWN, 16th May, 1783.

"SIR,—I am ordered by the Justices & Freeholders at their last meeting to Notify all the delinquent Collectors that unless they do Come in and make payment in thirty days from the date hereof to prosecute for the Arreiwages due—you will therefore take notice.

"I am your very humble serv^t

"EDWARD DUNLAP, C^y. Coll^r."

It is but just to say that collecting taxes at this date—the close of the long and exhausting seven years' war of the Revolution—was no easy task. The strength and resources of a people whose endurance and sacrifice will ever be the wonder of the world had become so depleted, and the currency so depreciated, that collecting and paying the heavy taxes promptly were next to impossible. The list of those to whom the above notice was sent embraced some of the best men of the county,—Peter De Witt, of Newton; George Armstrong and Stephen Shimer, of Hardwick; John Decker and James Cudelback, of Wantage; Edmund Palmer and David Johnson, of Mansfield; John Lundy and Reuben Manning, of Knowlton; William White and Jacob Wyckoff, of Oxford; Thomas Van Kirk, of Hardyston; Peter Kinney and John Schooley, of Greenwich; Guisbert Sutfin and Edward Lodar, of Sandyston; Abraham Van Campen and Ezekiel Schoonover, of Walpack; Josephus Westbrook and James Brink, of Montague.

The difficulty about the tax question at this date will be seen by the following extract copied from the records:

CHAPTER III.

THE BOUNDARY-LINE CONTROVERSY.

I.—A GENERAL STATEMENT OF THE DIFFICULTY.

THE county of Sussex was without a settled northern boundary until 1772, the line between the provinces of New Jersey and New York not having been definitely determined prior to that date. The dispute about the boundary and the respective claims under New York and New Jersey patents involved the right to a considerable strip of country—two hundred and ten thousand acres—in the northern part of New Jersey which was awarded to New York in the final settlement. There probably never would have been any very serious difficulty about the boundary line had not certain patentees of the Minisink and Wawayanda patents been disposed to stretch their claims over a portion of Northwestern New Jersey, and to regard them as "floating patents," to be located according to the will or fancy of the holders. This greed to extend their patents over a part of New Jersey and to appropriate the lands of neighboring settlers led, first, to serious contentions, resulting frequently in open violence between the two sections upon the borders of the territory in question, and, secondly, to a befogging of the boundary line between the provinces, which was originally clear and well defined.

The sense of the paragraph is not very clear, but its purport seems to be that some of the taxpayers, on account of the informality of proceedings, were required to pay their taxes over again.

II.—THE ORIGINAL BOUNDARY.

The original boundary between New York and New Jersey extended from the Hudson River to the Delaware in a direct line to the most northwardly branch of the Delaware, at a point on that river in latitude forty-one degrees and forty minutes, or, as was always understood, to Cochection, or Station Point.* This point was fixed as the true termination of the boundary line on the Delaware by royal commissioners and by the surveyors-general of both provinces, in pursuance of a joint act of the two legislatures, in 1719, and the "Tripartite Deed" and accompanying maps were drawn up and deposited in the archives of the respective provinces as a solemn voucher to the settlement. So well established was this fact that it was recognized in all subsequent deeds of conveyance and maps of the country. There is in the possession of many persons, probably, in this county, a map of the middle colonies of Great Britain in America, published in Philadelphia by Lewis Evans in 1755, in which the boundary line referred to, from the Hudson to the Delaware, is run directly to Cochection or Station Point, whereby the whole Minisink patent and a large portion of the Wawayanda grant are apportioned to New Jersey. In addition to this, the same line was reaffirmed by royal patent in the erection of Montague from Walpack in 1759, when the northernmost limit of the township was expressly fixed at Cochection or Station Point. Moreover, deeds are recorded in which conveyances were made in that section by the Jersey proprietors.†

Nothing further was needed to establish the rightful claim of the New Jersey people to that portion of their territory which became the subject of long dispute, litigation, and conflict, amounting nearly to a civil war, and which was finally, through the intriguing avarice of designing landholders, wrested from them and given to a neighboring colony. The history of this conflict forms a long and excited chapter in both the annals of Sussex and those of the adjoining county of Orange, N. Y.

* In the grant of New Jersey by His Royal Highness James, Duke of York and Albany, June 23, 1664, to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, the northern boundary is described: "to the northward as far as the northernmost branch of the said bay or river of Delaware, which is in forty-one degrees and forty minutes of latitude, and worketh over thence in a straight line to Hudson's River."

† See Chapter VII, on the "Part in Line between East and West Jersey," pp. 41-49, in this work.

III.—CONFLICTING LAND-CLAIMS.

The conflict of the settlers upon and near the division line between New Jersey and New York began to develop itself as early as the beginning of the eighteenth century. In November, 1700, according to the "Journal of the Colonial Assembly of New York," the attention of the Governor was called to the subject, and it was recommended that measures should be taken to have the partition line defined. No decisive action, however, appears to have been taken at that time, and the people were left to fight their own battles, unassisted by any government or local municipal aid, until immediately after the erection of the county of Sussex. That event developed a new phase in the conflict. The people of Sussex, who had always been disposed to maintain their rights even when trespassed upon by superior numbers, now saw in the extension of civil authority over their long-neglected region a means for the redress of their grievances, and the county officials sympathized strongly with the popular feeling. The arrest and imprisonment of several of the intruders who had covered New Jersey rights with New York land-grants soon followed, giving unmistakable evidence that further aggression would not be tolerated. The effect of this action upon the New York authorities may be judged of to some extent by the following extract from the minutes of the General Assembly of that province:

"April 24, 1754.—The Hon. James D. Lancy, Esq., Lieut.-Governor, communicated as follows:

"GENTLEMEN.—The division line between this Government and the Province of New Jersey not being settled has given rise to great tumults and disorders among the people of Orange County and the adjacent Inhabitants of New Jersey, and may produce worse evils unless prevented by timely care. Nothing can answer this purpose so effectually, I think, as the fixing of a temporary line of peace between us until His Majesty's pleasure shall be known in the matter. Governor Belcher assures me of his sincere desire that amicable and conciliatory measures may be fallen upon by the Governments to make the borders easy, and I have proposed to him the running of such a line conformably to the opinion of His Majesty's Council, signified in the report to me, which I shall order to be laid before you; and if it receive your approbation, I shall forthwith appoint Commissioners for the running of such line of peace, and apply to that Government to do the like on their part."

That the authorities of Sussex County made it warm for the Orange County intruders about this time may be inferred from the following paragraphs extracted from the report made to the New York Assembly on Oct. 29, 1754. Of course, due allowance must be made for the local and party coloring. The extracts read:

"That the people of New Jersey have from time to time, for a considerable time past, collected themselves in large bodies, and with violence have arrested officers of His Majesty's subjects, holding lands under this Province, to the northward of said bounds, and have taken possession of their lands, and do now forcibly hold the same.

"That the Government of New Jersey hath, within a few years past, erected a new county called Sussex, a great part of which they have extended many miles northward of the bounds aforesaid.

"That Justices of the Peace and other officers have been, and are from time to time, appointed in the said county, and do from time to time exercise authority and jurisdiction over the persons and possessions of a great number of His Majesty's subjects, holding their lands under and paying submission to the Government of this colony.

"That in consequence of the exercise of such authority and jurisdiction, His Majesty's Justices of the Peace and other subordinate officers and ministers in and for Orange County have been frequently beaten, insulted, and prevented in the execution of their respective offices, taken prisoners, and carried into parts of New Jersey remote from their habitations and the opportunity of being relieved, and have been thrown into jail and held to excessive bail, and prosecuted by indictments, and that others of His Majesty's subjects belonging to Orange County have also met with similar treatment.

"That the people of New Jersey have also, from time to time, and as often as they are able, possessed themselves of the vacant lands of Orange County.

"That they frequently beset the houses of His Majesty's subjects in Orange County by night, and attempted to seize and take prisoners such of His Majesty's subjects, and are encouraged to do this by the offer of large rewards made to them, and are also actually kept in pay for that purpose by the proprietors of East New Jersey.

"That the commissioners of highways for the said new county have laid out a new highway through Minisink aforesaid, which now, by the above-mentioned conduct of the people of New Jersey, is almost, if not entirely, reduced to subjection to the government of New Jersey.

"That the public officers of New Jersey assess and raise taxes upon the people dwelling to the Northward of said bounds, by which means many have been prevented from paying their proportion of the taxes of Orange County for more than a year past. Some of them have been obliged to desert their possessions and retire in the Northwardly parts of Orange County, while a few, more resolute than the rest, are reduced to the necessity of converting their dwellings into places of defense, and go armed for fear of some sudden attack.

"That though the Committee could produce many instances of this kind, they confine themselves to one which happened very lately. Thomas De Key, Colonel of the Militia and Justice of the Peace for Orange County, whose plantations are claimed by the people of New Jersey to be within the aforesaid new County, though he, and those under whom he claims, have held them and been settled upon them under New York high fifty years, finding himself extremely vexed, disturbed, and disquieted by the people of New Jersey, went to James Alexander, Esq., one of His Majesty's Council for this Province, and also for New Jersey Province, and who is one of the Proprietors of the Eastern Division of New Jersey, of great interest there, and esteemed one of the most active persons among them, to endeavor to come to some agreement with him, in order that he might remain quiet until the line was finally settled. But the said Alexander refused to consent to anything of that kind,* unless the said De Key would agree to hold his lands under New Jersey, become a Jerseyman, and fight, as he expressed it, for New Jersey against New York people; and told him at the same time if he would do so he should neither want money nor commissions, and if he would not do so, he should be dispossessed of his plantations. This Col. De Key refusing to comply with, some short time after a number of armed men from New Jersey came to the house of the said Col. De Key, who, observing their approach in such manner, shut himself up in his house. On which they drop up before his door and some of them cocked their guns and presented them towards the window where Col. De Key stood, swearing they would shoot him through the heart, that they would starve him out and burn the house over his head; and if man, woman, or child attempted to escape, they would shoot them down; that they had strength enough to take all Goshen, and would do it in time. However, they then withdrew without further violence, and upon their departure one of them said to Col. De Key, "Take care of yourself, for we will have you yet."

This report was considered on Nov. 8, 1754, and a resolution passed to lay the same before His Honor Lieut.-Governor De Lancey, with the request that he would exercise jurisdiction over the disputed territory till His Majesty should be pleased to declare his pleasure with respect to the further jurisdiction of this province. Col. Beekman and Capt. Winne, the committee, reported that they had laid the report before the lieutenant-governor, who was pleased to say that "He would consider thereof, and lay the same before His Majesty's Council."

Thus the controversy remained till February, 1756, when a new memorial was presented to the House by the proprietors of the Minisink and Wawayanda patents, dated Feb. 10, 1756, which was ordered to be printed. This memorial was very long, and contained a legal argument upon the points in dispute. We have not learned what lawyer furnished the sophistry by which "to make the worse appear the better reason" in this famous report. It certainly went before the king and his Privy Council in such a shape as to mystify and begot the ancient boundaries, and the learned author was probably well rewarded by the Minisink and Wawayanda patentees.

"The acts of violence," says Mr. Edsall, "which were committed under this boundary dispute, are remembered only in part, and it would be quite as well were they all forgotten. The accounts we have of them all come through New York sources, and invariably represent the New Jersey claimants as the aggressors. If this be true, New York, in the final settlement of the matter, managed to turn the blows which her citizens received to quite profitable account, for she certainly obtained about one thousand acres of land for every New Yorker who was thrashed, even though the number thus flogged by the 'Jersey Blues' be set down at full two hundred."

We give only another statement touching this matter from the New York point of view:

"Maj. Swartwout resided on the lands in dispute. Some of the Jersey claimants were watching for an opportunity to enter his house and get possession before he could procure help from his neighbors. He was aware of it, and, to counteract the attempt and repel the invaders, kept a number of guns ready loaded in his house, with some additional men to work his farm and lend assistance in case of emergency. He was a bold, resolute man, and feared by those who wished to dispossess him. Notwithstanding his precautions, it appears that at a certain time, in the year 1730, his family were expelled and his goods removed out of the house, and possession taken by the intruders. This was in his absence and while his wife was confined to her bed by the birth of a child, and it caused her death.

"In order to reinstate the major, assistance was procured from Goshen, which, with the neighbors, concluded to go secretly and lay in ambush on a hill in a piece of woods near the major's house, that Peter Gunner should go to the house and discover the situation of the enemy, and when the opportunity became favorable for them to enter the house, then to go into the orchard and throw up an apple as a signal for the party to come on. After the party had ambushed themselves and the opportunity became favorable, Gunner left the house, went into the orchard, and threw up an apple, whereupon the party rushed into the house, expelled the inmates and reinstated the major.

"The occupants, now fearing that they might be taken by surprise, managed to have a spy among the Jersey claimants, at some twenty miles' distance, through whom, from time to time, they received information of all the projects of the Jersey claimants. . . . The last struggle between the parties was to capture and imprison the major and Johannes Westbrook, both of whom lived on the battle-ground. Any open effort to capture the major was known to be enveloped with great difficulty, and the Jersey men undertook to effect it on the Sabbath at the door of the Maebackmack church. This was between the years 1764 and 1767, while Rev. Thomas Romeyn was the pastor. To accomplish it they had collected a strong party, who came armed with clubs on the day appointed and surrounded the church. After the services were ended and the major and Capt. Westbrook had gone out, they were captured and made prisoners after a harsh rough-and-tumble struggle. The major was taken and confined in the Jersey prison, from which, however, he was soon released."³

The probability is that the authorities of Sussex did not recognize the legality or propriety of such proceedings, and so gave the captured and imprisoned major a speedy release.

IV.—SETTLEMENT OF THE BOUNDARY LINE.

The remaining branch of this subject is the settlement of the boundary line. As already intimated, the great difficulty in the way of a speedy and amicable adjustment of the controversy was the desire and purpose on the part of certain claimants under the Minisink and Wawayanda patents to effect a settlement in favor of their claims. This, by delay and intrigue with government officials, and by obscuring and confusing the original boundaries, they finally succeeded in accomplishing only in part. The people of New Jersey, although protesting against any alteration of the original bounds of the province, were anxious and ready for a settlement, and were willing to co-operate with New York in the adoption of any fair measure for the adjustment of the difficulty. This is proved by the fact that, in October, 1748, an act for running and ascertaining the line between the provinces passed the Assembly of New Jersey and was laid before the Assembly of New York for their objections, if any were to be made. Before the House had acted upon it the inhabitants of Orange County, all along the line, got up a petition against the act, and presented it to the House, desiring to be heard by counsel. This was granted, and on Oct. 28, 1748, the petitioners were heard by counsel against the New Jersey act. On the 29th the House considered the objection against the act, and transmit their objections to Mr. Charles, Agent for the Colony in Great Britain, with directions to oppose said Act when it shall be transmitted for His Majesty's royal assent."

Mr. Charles wrote back to know whether the expenses of opposing the law were to be borne by individuals or by the public, whereupon the House resolved that they be paid by the public. Thus New York had a powerful lobbyist before the Crown to influence the decision against New Jersey, backed up by the public treasury of that colony, while New Jersey had no agent to defend her rightful claim. It is a matter of history that during this time, and for many years afterwards, the authorities of the general government of New Jersey were strangely inactive respecting their interests involved in the dispute. "New Jersey unfortunately dozed over her rights, while New York was wide awake."† It has been stated that if the General Assembly of the province had followed up the initial proceedings with half the boldness and discrimination which characterized the officials of Sussex County, New Jersey might have been the gainer in a large extent of territory unjustly shorn from her northern border.

"The county of Sussex had been organized barely eleven months before the New York Assembly had an elaborate report drawn up, giving its own version of the boundary difficulties and artfully setting forth the facts so as to exonerate its own citizens and throw all the odium of all the breaches of the peace upon the persons who held their lands by virtue of New Jersey grants." In this report, after befogging the case as much as possible in reference to what stream might be regarded "the most northwardly branch of the Delaware," or what part of that river is in latitude "forty-one degrees and forty minutes," the "main consideration upon which New York rested her claim is acknowledged to have been the location of the Minisink and Wawayanda patents, both of which had their boundaries so imperfectly described that the holders thereof treated them as 'floating patents,' to be run out with a gum-elastic chain, and accordingly located them to suit their fancy, caring little how distances were stretched so long as their very flexible consciences did not recoil before the magnitude of their own greediness. The southward bounds of the lands thus located the report assumes to be the rightful boundary between the two provinces, and takes it for granted that the Jersey settlers, who were remote from the seat of their colonial government, isolated, and practically without any representative in the Provincial Assembly, and who, consequently, were compelled to submit to what they could not prevent, concurred in so regarding it. But this was not, and could not, be true. Even in the final settlement of the controversy, when New York obtained all that the commissioners could with the least approach to decency award her, her line did not come down as far south as the boundary of these famous patents."*

The New York report was transmitted to England and laid before His Majesty's council. While it was pending, the authorities of Sussex County persevered in extending their jurisdiction over portions of the disputed territory, and with such success that the New York Assembly, in June, 1762, received a petition in which it was stated that "the Precinct of Minisink had been wholly wrested from the Colony of New York, and is now subject to the Government of New Jersey." Therefore the New York Assembly passed an act submitting the dispute to such commissioners as the Crown of Great Britain might be pleased to appoint; and the Assembly of New Jersey concurred in the same by the passage of an act, Feb. 23, 1764, setting forth that, "by reason of the unsettled state of the limits of the two colonies, not only the extent of their respective jurisdictions remains uncertain, and the due and regular administration of government in both colonies is by that means impeded, but also frequent and dangerous riots have been occasioned and are still likely to arise between the borderers, as well concerning the extent of the respective jurisdictions as the property of the soil, to the great disturbance of the public peace and the manifest discouragement of His Majesty's subjects in the settlement and improvement of that part of the country."

Pursuant to these acts of the Legislatures of New York and New Jersey, the King of Great Britain, by royal commission bearing date of Oct. 7, 1769, appointed certain commissioners to determine the boundary line; which duty they performed, fixing it where it now is, and the two Legislatures ratified and confirmed it by joint act in 1772. The titles to lands held by Jersey grants on the north and by New York grants on the south of the line were confirmed to their respective possessors, and the King of Great Britain gave his royal approval to the whole proceeding on Sept. 1, 1773.

CHAPTER IV.

SUSSEX COUNTY CIVIL LIST.

The following list contains the names of persons, either residents or natives of the county, who have held civil offices under the general government, the State, or the county, together with the time of service.

REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS.

1819-23, Hon. John Linn; 1837-39, Hon. Samuel Fowler; 1847-49, Hon. Richard E. Edsall; 1863-67, Hon. Andrew J. Rogers; 1873-77, Hon. Robert Hamilton.

JUDGES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Hon. John Cleves Symmes, appointed Feb. 13, 1777.
Hon. Thomas C. Ryerson, appointed February, 1831.
Hon. Daniel Haines appointed November, 1852.
Hon. Martin Ryerson, appointed March, 1855.

* Centennial Address, pp. 48, 49.

GOVERNOR AND CHANCELLOR.

Hon. Daniel Haines was Governor and ex-officio chancellor of the State of New Jersey from October, 1843, to January, 1845, under the old constitution, and was elected Governor under the new constitution in November, 1847.

SECRETARIES OF STATE.

Whitfield S. Johnson, 1861-66.
Henry C. Kelsey, 1871-81.

MEMBERS OF THE LEGISLATURE.

Sussex County, on its first erection, in 1753, united with Hunterdon and Morris in sending a representative to the General Assembly, and continued so to do for nineteen years.

On May 10, 1768, an act was passed empowering each county to send its own representatives, and allowing to Sussex County two members. The act was at once sent to England for the sanction of the king and council, but it did not immediately receive the royal approval. In December, 1769, the Assembly appointed a committee to write to Benjamin Franklin, then in London, requesting him to use his influence and exertions to obtain His Majesty's approval of the bill. The royal sanction was granted on Dec. 9, 1770; the confirmation was proclaimed in New Jersey in 1771, and on Aug. 7, 1772, Thomas Van Horne and Nathaniel Pettit were elected the first representatives of the county of Sussex. To be eligible to the office at that time required the ownership of one thousand acres of land or five hundred pounds sterling, English money; no one was allowed to vote who did not own one hundred acres of land or was not worth fifty pounds sterling in real and personal property.

Mr. Pettit served in the Assembly till the royal authority over the province was superseded by the adoption of the first constitution, on July 2, 1776. Mr. Van Horne died in 1775, and Joseph Barton was elected to fill the vacancy; he continued a member till the constitution was adopted. The constitution of 1776 allowed to Sussex, in common with the other counties, one member of the council and three representatives in the General Assembly. They were elected, and the members of both Houses have been chosen as follows, down to the present time:

1776-77.—Council, John Cleves Symmes; Assembly, Casper Shaffer, Thomas Peterson, Alda Brown.
1778-79.—Council, Robert Ogden; Assembly, Casper Shaffer, Jacob McCollum, Benjamin McCullough.
1780.—Council, John Cleves Symmes; Assembly, Edmund Martin, Hugh Hughes, Samuel Kennedy.
1781.—Council, Hugh Hughes; Assembly, Joshua Swayze, Isaac Van Campen, Peter Hopkins.
1782.—Council, Hugh Hughes; Assembly, Isaac Van Campen, Isaac Martin, Aaron Hankinson.
1783.—Council, Hugh Hughes; Assembly, Isaac Van Campen, William Maxwell, Aaron Hankinson.
1784.—Council, Robert Hoopes; Assembly, Isaac Van Campen, Aaron Hankinson, Charles Beardslee.
1785.—Council, Robert Hoopes; Assembly, Aaron Hankinson, Charles Beardslee, Christopher Longstreet.
1786-88.—Council, Mark Thompson; Assembly, Aaron Hankinson, Charles Beardslee, Christopher Longstreet.

- 1790.—Council, Robert Hoops; Assembly, Aaron Hankinson, Charles Beardslee, John Rutherford.
- 1790.—Council, Robert Hoops; Assembly, Aaron Hankinson, Robert Ogden, John Rutherford.
- 1791-92.—Council, Charles Beardslee; Assembly, Aaron Hankinson, William Helmes, Valentine Bidleman.
- 1793-94.—Council, Charles Beardslee; Assembly, William McCullough, Peter Sharp, Martin Ryerson.
- 1795.—Council, Charles Beardslee; Assembly, George Armstrong, Peter Sharp, William McCullough.
- 1796.—Council, Charles Beardslee; Assembly, William McCullough, Peter Sharp, Peter Smith.
- 1797.—Council, Charles Beardslee; Assembly, Peter Sharp, Peter Smith, Thomas Armstrong.
- 1798.—Council, Charles Beardslee; Assembly, John Gustin, Joseph Gaston, Levi Howell, William Runkle.
- 1799.—Council, Charles Beardslee; Assembly, Joseph Gaston, Levi Howell, William McCullough, Silas Dickerson.
- 1800.—Council, William McCullough; Assembly, Levi Howell, Silas Dickerson (Speaker), Joseph Gaston, Joseph Sharp.
- 1801-2.—Council, William McCullough; Assembly, Levi Howell, Silas Dickerson (Speaker), Abram Shafer, John Linn.
- 1803.—Council, William McCullough; Assembly, Levi Howell, John Linn, John Johnson, Abram Shafer.
- 1804.—Council, John Linn; Assembly, John Johnson, Levi Howell, Wm. Kennedy, Joseph Sharp.
- 1805.—Council, George Bidleman; Assembly, Levi Howell, Joseph Sharp, William Kennedy, William Armstrong.
- 1806.—Council, Jacob S. Thompson; Assembly, Henry Hankinson, John Coutsen, Daniel Harker, William A. Ryerson.
- 1807.—Council, Barnabas Swayze; Assembly, Henry Hankinson, Aaron Kerr, Daniel Harker, John Cox.
- 1808.—Council, Barnabas Swayze; Assembly, Henry Hankinson, Aaron Kerr, William Kennedy, John Cox.
- 1809.—Council, Barnabas Swayze; Assembly, Aaron Kerr, John Cox, William Kennedy, Richard Edsall.
- 1810.—Council, Barnabas Swayze; Assembly, Wm. Kennedy (Speaker), George Bidleman, Joseph Sharp, Richard Edsall.
- 1811.—Council, Barnabas Swayze; Assembly, William Kennedy, Joseph Sharp, Richard Edsall, Gerrit Vliet.
- 1812.—Council, Barnabas Swayze; Assembly, Joseph Sharp, R. W. Rutherford, Simon Cortright, James Davidson.
- 1813-15.—Council, William Kennedy; Assembly, Simon Cortright, Joseph Sharp, R. W. Rutherford, James Davidson.

son, John Anderson, and Jonathan Pettit, appointed in 1753, by royal ordinance of His Majesty George III., to organize the County Courts. Judge Van Campen remained upon the bench until August, 1766, during which time he was the presiding officer of the court, and, as appears by the minutes, was rarely absent from his seat during its sessions. The following appointments of judges were made by the same authority: 1760, John Hackett; 1761, Joseph Hull and Richard Gardner;* 1764, Hugh Hughes. These were the last appointments by the Crown.

The following justices sat at times upon the bench from 1753 to 1765, and some of them still later: Obediah Ayres, Richard Gardner, Japhet Byram, Peter Decker, Samuel Crowell, Abram Van Auken, Anthony Van Atta, Morris Robeson, Joseph Hull, John Wilson, John Rosenkrans, Lemuel Barrett, Thomas Van Horne, Robert McMurtry, Jacob Starn, Hugh Hughes, and Nathaniel Pettit. Four of these—viz., Hackett, Hull, Gardner, and Hughes—were promoted by being appointed judges, as above.

CHAPTER V.

PROGRESS—INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

I.—INCREASE OF POPULATION—HEALTHFULNESS—LONGEVITY.

WHEN her agricultural resources first became known, Sussex County attracted an immediate influx of population. In 1753 she had less inhabitants than † Appointed by the Governor to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Grant Fitch.

‡ Present surrogate.

§ Compiled from the official records of the board of freeholders.

‡ Died in office in the summer of 1759.

any of her sister counties; in 1790 she had outstripped them all except Hunterdon. The census by counties for that year was as follows: Hunterdon, 20,153; Sussex, 19,500; Burlington, 18,095; Essex, 17,785; Monmouth, 16,918; Morris, 16,216; Middlesex, 15,956; Gloucester, 13,363; Bergen, 12,601; Somerset, 12,296; Salem, 10,437; Cumberland, 8248; Cape May, 2571; total, 184,139.

One cause of the rapid increase of population in Sussex was her good reputation as to healthfulness of climate,—a reputation which she still sustains. No portion of New Jersey is so highly favored in this regard or so free from miasmatic and malarial influences. The air of the mountains is peculiarly favorable to health and longevity. Here may be seen in any direction fine specimens of physical vigor in all their gradations, from chubby infancy to robust old age. The average of human life in this county greatly exceeds that attained in cities, from the fact that deaths in infancy and childhood are far less frequent here than there. The proportion of old men to the whole population is also very considerable; seventy, eighty, and ninety years are not uncommon ages among the citizens of this county. At any period during its history a surprisingly long list of aged persons, both male and female, might have been made out, showing that the people in this healthy section live to more than an average age. One hundred years and over have sometimes, though rarely, been reached. The greatest ever attained here was by Matthew Williams, who died in the township of Frankford, on the 3d of January, 1814, in his one hundred and twenty-fourth year. Mr. Williams was a native of Wales, born in 1690; he served in the British army and navy for thirty years, and was in numerous battles; he was with Wolfe at the taking of Quebec, and after that event retired from the service and took up his residence in Sussex. Here he married when a little over seventy years of age, but lost his wife after she had borne him two sons. Upon the breaking out of the Revolution he enlisted in the Continental army, although eighty-six years of age, and fought through the whole war with the vigor of a man of forty. He survived the peace of 1783 more than thirty years, and died a pensioner of the United States.

It may not be out of place to mention in this connection that Sussex County is the birthplace of the fattest person ever known. Mrs. Catharine Schooley, who twenty-five years ago was on exhibition in the principal cities of the United States, was born in Greenwich township, Sussex Co., in the year 1816. She weighed seven hundred and sixty-four pounds,—about one hundred more than the far-famed Daniel Lambert, of England. Her arm was three feet two inches in circumference, and her waist measured nine feet six inches. Her parents, Anthony and Catharine Leureh, were Germans. Her mother died when she was but a few days old, and her father says he “raised her mit der spoon.” At the age of nineteen she married William Schooley, also of Greenwich, and soon after removed to Ohio.

The general healthfulness of Sussex County made it almost a fruitless field for physicians at an early day, and hence few of them settled in the county prior to the Revolution. The number has never been great compared with some other sections of the country, and those in practice have had, for the most part, a wide and generally healthy section to ride over.

During the decade following the organization of the county the increase of population was rapid,—so much so, indeed, as to exhaust for a period the means of subsistence. In 1765 it was represented to the Provincial Legislature, by the board of justices and freeholders, that “the inhabitants of the county of Sussex were reduced to great distress for the want of bread-corn, and that the board were incapable of administering to the relief of the sufferers for the want of money to enable them to purchase grain for their present exigencies;” in consequence whereof, the Legislature, on the 20th of June, passed an act authorizing the treasurer of the province to pay to Abraham Van Campen, John Hackett, Jacob Starn, Richard Shackleton, Samuel Lundy, Richard Bowlby, Hendrick Kuykendal, and Henry Winter, or any three of them, a sum not exceeding two hundred pounds, to be disposed of “to the best advantage in purchasing bread-corn for the inhabitants of said county,” or to “distribute the said money to such persons, and in such proportions, as they or the majority of them should think fit.” It was also provided that said money should be returned to the provincial treasury within two years after the publication of the act. And it was undoubtedly so returned, being regarded simply as a loan from the province to aid the citizens in an unusual emergency. Such instances have not been uncommon in the history of settlements. A similar scarcity occurred in Michigan about a quarter of a century ago; though a large producer of wheat, that State, at the time alluded to, was forced by an excess of immigration to become a heavy purchaser of flour for home consumption.

Another circumstance affecting the production of the county at an early day was the fact that large quantities of land were owned by non-residents, who, while they encouraged immigration for the purpose of settling and improving their lands, diverted from the support of actual settlers a considerable portion of the grain and products raised. This system of settlement would have been well enough if the land-owners had been willing to sell small tracts to such of their tenants as desired to purchase them; but this they declined to do, and thus, although the county augmented in population, it increased but little in wealth. Up to a comparatively late date nine-tenths of the land in the township of Newton was held in large tracts by non-resident owners, and other portions of the county were subjected more or less to the paralyzing influence of a similar monopoly. Had this state of things continued and been general, the county would have been like Ireland,—its lands held by a monopolizing aristocracy and peopled by a poor and dependent population. "But the owners finally took a different view of their duty, as well as their interests. Instead of holding on in hope of ultimately getting large prices, they sold out to as good advantage as they could ere the virgin soil of their respective tracts should become completely exhausted; and every portion of the county soon felt the beneficial influence of the change." The passing of the fee-simple of the soil into the same hands which guided the plow gave a new impulse to agriculture, which, being since supplemented by scientific and improved methods, by greater variety, and by the advantages of new and accessible markets, has made Sussex County one of the most prosperous and desirable agricultural sections of New Jersey.

II.—OTHER ELEMENTS OF PROGRESS—POST-OFFICES.

If we compare the present state of the county with its condition in the past, we find a wonderful advance. In 1737, Benjamin Franklin, as postmaster at Philadelphia, advertised that "Henry Pratt is appointed Riding Post Master for all the stages between Philadelphia and Newport in Virginia, who sets out about the beginning of every month and returns in twenty-four days." In 1739 the mail was carried between New York and Philadelphia once a week on horseback during the summer, and Gouverneur Morris submitted the proposition to Postmaster-General Spotswood "whether it be not fit to direct the rider to stay one night in such towns where the Governor happens to be resident."* In 1743, April 13th, ten years before this county was organized, Franklin advertised that "after this week the northern post will set out for New York on Thursdays, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, till Christmas. The Southern post sets out next Monday at 8 o'clock for Annapolis, and continues going every fortnight during the summer season." At that time, "during the winter, the post between Philadelphia and New York went once a fortnight."† During the Revolutionary war horse-expresses were provided to give dispatch to news. After the Revolution a humble stage-wagon performed this duty between our great cities once a week, taking two days for the journey. The early postal arrangements for the counties of Morris and Sussex we have not the means at hand for ascertaining, but from a package of letters dating back to 1774, written by John Jacob Faesch, of New York, to his agent at Mount Hope, we are led to suppose there was then no post-route farther west than Morristown, since these letters were evidently sent by a private messenger. Perhaps an examination would show that there was not a post-route or post-office in this county from the organization of Sussex until the close of the Revolution. This we cannot affirm, but such is our impression. But the time is within the remembrance of men still living when it took a whole week for the stage-wagon to accomplish its journey from Newton to New York and back.

We find in Alden's "New Jersey Register" for 1811 the following notices of stage-routes: "There are five lines of stages which run daily, except on the Sabbath, between New York and Philadelphia. Three of these leave each city at the hours of 8 and 10 A.M. The mail-stage leaves each city at 2 o'clock P.M., and arrives at 6 the following morning. From May to November the 'Expedition Line' leaves each city early in the morning and performs the distance by daylight. The 'Swiftsure Line' passes through Springfield and Somerset by Coryell's Ferry, on the old York Road, and the other line through the principal post-towns by the way of Delaware Bridge." It was advertised that "Fulton's steamboats, in the course of the year 1811, are to be employed at the Paulus Hook Ferry, when the passing from the City of Jersey to the City of New York will be safe, expeditious, and pleasant."

There were at that time eighty-seven post-offices in the State of New Jersey, of which Sussex County contained six, at the following places, with the postmasters named:

Andover, Lemuel D. Camp; Belvidere, John Kinney, Jr.; Hackettstown, Benajah Gustin; Hamburg, Thomas Lawrence; Johnsbury, Thomas Stinson; Newton, Charles Pemberton.

In 1837 the number of post-offices in the State had increased to two hundred and seventy-one, while those in Sussex County had attained the number of twenty-five, showing a considerably greater ratio of increase for Sussex County than for the State at large. The post-offices, with the names of postmasters, of Sussex County in 1837 were as follows:

Andover, Joseph Northrup; Augusta, Abraham Bray; Benville, Benjamin Tuttle; Bevan's, James C. Bevan; Branchville, Samuel Rice; Conersville, Lewis L. Smith; Deckertown, Samuel Whittaker; Flatbrookville, Jacob Smith; Fredon, Isaac V. Coursen; Gratitudle, Benjamin J. Lowe; Hamburg, Robert A. Lewis; Harmonyvale, Isaac Beardslee; Lafayette, Alexander Boyles; Libertyville, Silas Hemingway; Lockwood, Alexander McKain; Marksborough, James Blair; Montague, James Stoll; Newton, George H. McCarter; Sandyston, John D. Everitt; Sparta, Elias Black; Stanhope, Charles Munson; Stillwater, Peter B. Shafer; Vernon, R. S. Denton; Walpack, Daniel Shoemaker; Wantage, David H. Gale.

The notaries public in Sussex County in 1810 were John Linn, Daniel Stuart, George Bidleman, and Henry Hankinson.

There were in 1811 five lodges of Free and Accepted Masons in the county,—viz., Harmony Lodge, No. 8, at Newton; Farmers' Lodge, No. 14, at Wantage; Olive Branch Lodge, No. 16, at Greenwich; Augusta Lodge, No. 23, in Frankford; and United Lodge, No. 24, in Sandyston. These lodges were all operated under warrant from the Grand Lodge of New Jersey, which was instituted at New Brunswick, Dec. 18, 1786.

III.—RAILROADS.

The first company chartered with a view to the construction of a railroad in any part of Sussex County was the New Jersey, Hudson and Delaware Railroad Company, in 1832. This company was incorporated with a capital stock of one million five hundred thousand dollars, and was empowered to construct a railroad from some point on the Delaware River between the New York State line and the mouth of the Paulinskill, thence by Snufftown, in Sussex County, to the Hudson River opposite the city of New York. In addition to this, in February, 1836, the company was authorized to construct a lateral road from the Delaware River, near the mouth of the Paulinskill, to some point on the New York State line between the Warwick and Blue Mountains within five miles of the Walkkill, and to build a bridge over the Delaware, with the consent of Pennsylvania. This lateral road was intended to be a connecting link between the New York, Hudson and Delaware road—which was to commence at Newburg, on the Hudson, and terminate at the New Jersey line in the valley of the Walkkill—and the Delaware and Susquehanna road, which was to commence on the Delaware at some point between Belvidere and the Water Gap, and terminate in the immense coal-regions of the Susquehanna valley.

A survey of this road was made, following the valley of the Walkkill and Papakating to the table-lands dividing the tributaries of the Hudson from those of the Delaware, near Augusta; thence down the Paulinskill valley to Columbia, on the Delaware; thence up the Delaware and through the Water Gap to opposite Dutoit's Island, the place proposed for crossing the river with the Delaware and Susquehanna road. The whole distance of this lateral road was about forty-five miles, and the cost per mile for construction was estimated at $7484.92. The route was surveyed in 1836 by James B. Sargeant, engineer of the New York, Hudson and Delaware Railroad.

THE NEW JERSEY MIDLAND RAILROAD.

Such was the first system of railroads contemplated for Sussex County, or intended to intersect the county in bringing the immense coal-fields of the Susquehanna into connection with the New York market. The company did little more than to secure an extension of the time limited by its charter and the passage of certain supplementary acts by the Legislature of New Jersey till about the time of the survey of the Midland Railway from Oswego to New York. An act to extend the time for commencing and completing the road was approved Feb. 22, 1842, and other acts supplementary to the act of incorporation were approved March 17, 1846, Feb. 11, 1847, Feb. 5, 1856, and Feb. 10, 1862. Two routes were surveyed for the road,—one known as the Sink Hole, the other as the Walkkill route,—and the work of construction was begun in the township of Wantage in April, 1870, just prior to the consolidation of the company with the New Jersey Midland Railway Company.

This consolidation included, besides the New Jersey, Hudson and Delaware Railroad Company, incorporated in 1832, the New Jersey Western Railroad Company and the Sussex Valley Railroad Company, both incorporated in 1867. It may be well to give some account of these latter two companies and the objects of their respective charters.

The New Jersey Western Railroad Company was chartered in 1867 by certain citizens of Bergen County for the purpose of constructing a railroad westward from Jersey City, or from some point on the Hudson River opposite New York, through the counties of Bergen, Passaic, Morris, and Sussex to the Delaware River opposite Milford, whence branches were to extend northerly to the Erie at Port Jervis and southerly to the coal-fields at Scranton. This road was designed to take the place of the contemplated Midland Railroad through the counties referred to, as the latter enterprise had been delayed and little confidence was entertained of its early completion through New Jersey. This road would form an important western connection by the most direct and feasible route from New York City, shortening the distance between Port Jervis and the metropolis by twenty-four miles, or an hour's travel, as compared with the Erie, and would open a way to the mines and furnaces in Morris, Passaic, and Sussex Counties. The route was surveyed from Jersey City to Bloomingdale, thence up the Pequannock Creek to Newfoundland, thence across the mountain to the mines at Franklin, and thence through Culver's Gap to the Delaware. The distances, as laid down by the engineers, were: From New York to Bloomingdale, 32 miles; from New York to Franklin, 50 miles; from New York to Scranton, 102 miles; from New York to Port Jervis, 64 miles; and from New York to Monticello, 87 miles; thus making the latter distance to New York twenty miles less than by the Midland Railroad.

Meetings were held in the interest of the New Jersey Western Railroad at various points along the line, and large amounts subscribed. Prior to the consolidation the road had been constructed and put in operation to Paterson.

Meanwhile, the agents and projectors of the Midland road were actively engaged. Losing the assistance of Port Jervis, which had been turned over to the New Jersey Western, they adopted a new route by the way of Middletown. In July, 1869, a series of meetings were held in the interest of the Midland at Deckertown, Ogdensburg, and other villages in Sussex County, terminating with a grand gathering at Unionville, in Orange County. At the meeting in Deckertown, Hon. D. C. Littlejohn stated that the Midland road would be speedily put through provided the northern and eastern towns of Sussex and Mini-sink, in Orange County, would give the right of way and subscribe $400,000 to aid in building the road, in the following proportions: Minisink, $100,000; Wantage, $150,000; Hardyston, $50,000; Sparta, $50,000. The respective quotas were raised by Wantage, Minisink, and Hardyston. In Hamburg one gentleman alone—Governor Haines—subscribed $10,000. The Ogdensburg Zinc Company pledged $50,000. Other liberal sums were subscribed in Paterson and along the eastern end of the road. At all the meetings the benefits and advantages likely to be derived by the several towns from the construction of the road were ably set forth by Messrs. Littlejohn and Low in behalf of the company. The editor of the Middletown Mail gives the following report of the remarks of Judge Low at the Unionville meeting:

"He stated that the Midland project first assumed definite shape some three years since at Delhi, and that the work through to Middletown was now provided for, and the question that now presented itself was, 'What route shall the road take from there?' There are two routes open to us,—viz., Greenwood Lake, and the other through Sussex County by the way of Munson's Gap. The Greenwood Lake route is from five to seven miles shorter than the Sussex route; but, on the other hand, they would pass through a better country on the line of the Munson's Gap route, and obtain a better local business, which would nearly equalize the advantages of the two routes. The directors of the Midland were now on their way through to see what the people of New Jersey would do towards aiding their road, as they intended to put the work under contract in four weeks.

"Hon. D. C. Littlejohn was then introduced to the meeting. He stated that the Midland company now control a charter in New Jersey, and parties have agreed to build a road and give the Midland a perpetual interest at seven per cent. He considered the Sussex route very favorable on account of its agricultural and mining resources, and knew of no other unoccupied line which had advantages equal to it. The grades nowhere would exceed sixty-five feet, excepting a distance of two or three miles, perhaps, at Munson's Gap. The distance from New York to Newton will be fifteen miles less by Munson's Gap than by any other route."

At this meeting Unionville pledged $150,000 with only one dissenting vote.

At a meeting held in Paterson in July, 1869, it was stated by Mr. Littlejohn that $6,000,000 had been raised and one hundred and fifty miles of the northern portion of the road built; that Oswego had subscribed $725,000, and Norwich $475,000. The estimate for building the entire road was about $15,000,000.

The Sussex Valley Railroad Company, consolidated with the New Jersey Midland, was incorporated in 1867. Its charter authorized it to "lay out and construct a railroad from some suitable point in the county of Sussex on the boundary line between this State and the State of New York, within three miles on either side of where the Walkkill stream crosses said boundary line to or near the village of Deckertown, in said county, with the power and privilege of extending said railroad, on the most feasible route, from said point at or near the village of Deckertown, by the way of the Paulinskill valley through the counties of Sussex and Warren, to a point at or near Columbia, on the Delaware River, in the county of Warren, and to intersect with any railroad crossing said Delaware River, by and with the consent of said company so to be connected with, and with power to said company to connect their road with any railroad constructed or to be constructed in the county of Orange, in the State of New York, by and with the consent of the said company in Orange County, with the privilege of constructing such spurs and branches thereto as may be necessary to intersect with any other railroad or railroads now constructed or hereafter to be constructed in the county of Sussex, or to any mines, iron-works, or stone-quarries in the said county of Sussex, subject to the restrictions herein contained; and said railroad may be in four divisions,—that is to say, one division from the beginning of said road on the boundary line between this State and the State of New York to or near the said village of Deckertown; and one division extending from the village of Deckertown to intersect with the railroad now being constructed to the village of Branchville, in the county of Sussex; and one division to extend from the said intersection with the road being constructed to the said village of Branchville to a point at or near the village of Marksboro', in the county of Warren, with the right to said company to cross the said road leading to Branchville on the same grade; and one division to extend from said point at or near Columbia on the Delaware River ~~as~~resaid, and to intersect with any railroad crossing the Delaware River."

Consolidation.—By an act of the Legislature of New Jersey approved on the 17th of March, 1870, entitled "An Act to Authorize the Consolidation of the Capital Stock, Property, Powers, Privileges, and Franchises of the New Jersey, Hudson and Delaware Railroad Company with those of the New Jersey Western Railroad Company, the Sussex Valley Railroad Company, the Hoboken, Ridgefield and Paterson Railroad Company, or any or either of them," three of the corporations named in the act—viz., the New Jersey, Hudson and Delaware Railroad Company, the New Jersey Western Railroad Company, and the Sussex Valley Railroad Company—consolidated and merged their several acts of incorporation into one, in pursuance of the act of consolidation, on the 13th of July, 1870, and from thence became known as the New Jersey Midland Railway Company. This consolidation was effected in accordance with articles of agreement entered into on the 26th of April, 1870, and signed by the presidents of the respective corporations,—viz., John Rutherford, president of the New Jersey, Hudson and Delaware Railroad Company; C. A. Wartendyke, president of the New Jersey Western Railroad Company; and John Loomis, president of the Sussex Valley Railroad Company.

At a meeting of the stockholders of the New Jersey Midland Railroad Company, held on the 3d of May, 1870, at Taylor's Hotel, in Jersey City, agreeably to notice given, Elisha P. Wheeler chairman, the following-named persons were duly elected a board of directors: D. C. Littlejohn, C. Vreeland, H. R. Low, J. W. Hewson, E. P. Wheeler, J. Rutherford, H. Watkins, M. J. Ryerson, Isaac Demerest, John Loomis, C. A. Wartendyke, J. N. Pronk, Julius H. Pratt; Martin J. Ryerson, Secretary.

The New York and Oswego Midland Railway went into full operation on Monday, Aug. 18, 1873; passenger-trains then started for the first time from each terminus to go over the entire line. The New Jersey division is eighty-eight miles in length, the Middle division is one hundred and forty-five miles, and the Western one hundred miles, making the entire distance from New York to Oswego three hundred and thirty-three miles. The road was projected in 1865; on the 11th of January, 1866, the company was incorporated. Work was begun June 29, 1868, and the first train was run Nov. 5, 1869. A large portion of the road opens up a region of country hitherto deprived of easy access to market.

The New Jersey Midland Railway enters the county of Sussex upon its northern border, and, making a crooked course through the townships of Wantage and Hardyston, leaves the latter at Snufftown, where it passes into Passaic County, and thence to its eastern terminus at New York. The stations on this road within the county are Deckertown, Hamburg, Franklin, Ogdensburg, and Snufftown.

We append the following statistics, taken from the commissioners' report for 1880: Capital stock, $2,000,000; bonded debt, $5,400,000; receipts for 1879, $745,069.93; expenditures, 1879, $740,118.55.

SUSSEX RAILROAD.

This road was chartered and built under the name of the "Sussex Mine Railroad." Previous to its incorporation, Messrs. Edward Cooper and Abram S. Hewitt, proprietors of the iron-mines at Andover, had built and successfully operated a mule-road extending from their mines to Waterloo, on the Morris Canal. This not being sufficient to meet the demands of their business and of other contemplated enterprises, these gentlemen conceived the project of building a railroad to their works, which should also connect with other mines as well as those in the vicinity, and aid in developing the rich mineral resources of Sussex County. The charter was granted by the Legislature in 1848, David Ryerson, Peter Cooper, Nathan Smith, Abram S. Hewitt, Andrew A. Smalley, John Wills, Alexander McKain, and Edward Cooper being the commissioners named in the act of incorporation. The capital stock was placed at $50,000, with liberty to increase it to $250,000. The company was authorized to construct a railroad from the Andover mines, in the county of Sussex, to some convenient and accessible point on the Morris Canal, in said county, and with the privilege of extending the said road to the village of Newton, in the said county of Sussex, and of constructing such spurs or lateral roads, not exceeding, each, five miles in length, as might be necessary to afford access to the adjacent mines in the said county.

Various amendments were made to the charter, among others the following: March 18, 1851, to enable the company to extend their road to any point to be selected by them in Sussex, Warren, and Morris Counties, so as to connect with the Morris and Essex Railroad, and to empower them to issue and execute bonds; Feb. 5, 1853, an act changing the name to the "Sussex Railroad Company," and empowering them to extend their road from Andover to the village of Newton, and thence to any point on the Delaware River, in Sussex County, with power to construct a bridge across the Delaware; Feb. 4, 1863, an act authorizing the company to construct a branch road from some convenient point on the present line to Franklin Furnace, and thence to such other point in the county as might be deemed for the public good, and to make contracts with other companies for the transportation of milk, lime, coal, etc., to the city of New York.

In consideration of the citizens subscribing $60,000 upon security of the first mortgage bonds, the company extended the road to Newton, the county-seat, and the line was built and went into operation from Waterloo to Newton in December, 1854. The length of this part of the route is eleven miles. The cost of construction and equipments was about $300,000, of which Cooper & Hewitt, the builders, paid $150,000, taking stock for it, and $150,000 was raised at six-per cent. mortgage bonds, payable in twenty years, and due in 1873.

In December, 1857, Messrs. Cooper & Hewitt, who were controlling stockholders in the company, sold their stock to Thomas N. McCarter, John McCarter, John Townsend, Edward C. Moore, Dr. John R. Stuart, and others, for $82,000, of which $32,000 was raised in new stock to pay arrears of interest on the bonds and part of a floating debt of over $50,000, and $50,000 issued in second mortgage bonds at seven per cent. The new proprietors operated the road for several years, and then sold their stock to Capt. Aaron Peck, formerly of Essex County. In 1864, Capt. Peck sold his stock to Moses Taylor, William E. Dodge, John I. Blair, and others, for $187,000, who still own and operate the road.

Branchville Extension.—In 1868, Mr. William Bell, of Branchville, was instrumental in securing an extension of the Sussex Railroad from Drake's Pond to Branchville by the way of Lafayette. Mr. Bell procured the right of way and graded the road, which was constructed and equipped by the company, who have since operated it as a part of their line.

Franklin Extension.—In 1871 the Sussex Railroad Company extended their line to Franklin, laying a new track across the Newton meadows, intersecting with the line to Branchville and following that to the Branchville Junction, thence diverging in an easterly direction, passing to Monroe Corners and thence to Franklin. By an arrangement with the New Jersey Midland Company the cars of the Sussex road were permitted to run over the track of the former to Hamburg Junction, from which point the Sussex road was extended to McAfee's Corner, in Vernon township, where it now connects with the Warwick Valley Railroad, since built from Warwick, in Orange County, to McAfee's.

It was the intention of the Sussex company, in building a road to Franklin, to leave the Sussex Railroad at Andover, passing by Struble's and Iliff's Ponds through Woodruff's Gap to the Wallkill valley, thence to Ogdensburg, and thence to Franklin. But the subscription of $25,000 by the citizens of Newton changed the route and secured its construction by way of that village. The obstacle in passing the bog-meadow was overcome with no little difficulty, the ground being so soft as to require a covering of plank before the filling in with rock and gravel could be effected. The work, however, was successfully accomplished by continuous filling.

The entire distance traversed by the road and its branches is thirty-five miles. Cost of construction and equipments, $1,875,100; receipts for 1879, $123,167.91; expenditures, $105,628.63. John I. Blair, President.

OGDEN'S MINE RAILROAD.

A portion of this road lies in Sussex County. It was chartered Feb. 19, 1864, and extends from Ogden's Mines to Nolan's Point, Lake Hopatcong, a distance of ten miles.

Capital stock paid in, $450,000; value of road and equipments, $189,808.76; dividends paid in 1879, in cash (three per cent. on capital stock), $13,000; income, $27,327.60; expenditures, $14,335.15. This road in 1879 transported 49,226 tons of iron ore and 3791 tons of coal. George Richards, President.

MORRIS AND ESSEX RAILROAD.

The Morris and Essex Railroad passes along the southern corner of Sussex County, with stations at Waterloo and Stanhope. These villages are in the township of Byram, Sussex Co., but the stations are just over the line, in Morris. This road forms a valuable outlet for the Sussex road, both east and west, extending, as it does, from New York to Easton, Pa., and being an important division of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad.*

* See history of the Morris and Essex division under the head of "Railroads" of Warren County.

CHAPTER VI.

EDUCATION IN SUSSEX COUNTY.

I.—EARLY SCHOOLS.

THE first schools of the county were of the most primitive type, kept in log school-houses erected often by a few settlers who felt the necessity of giving their children some instruction in the simple rudiments of reading, writing, and arithmetic. A quarter's schooling of this sort was all that could be afforded during the year, and this usually occupied the winter months, when the children's time at home was least valuable. The following description, given by Mr. B. A. Westbrook of an old-time school-house which stood on lands of Capt. Abraham Shiner, in Wantage, and built just prior to or during the Revolution, will suffice to illustrate the class of school-houses of those days and to suggest somewhat the character of the schools taught in them:

"It stood at the foot of a ledge of rocks at the head of the captain's mill-pond, on grounds at present owned by his great-grandson, Jacob Hornbeck. It was in size sixteen by sixteen feet, and built of logs, with plank floor, one story high, with one course of boards for roof, and the cracks battened with slabs from the captain's saw-mill hard by; the oval side was turned to the weather. In one end inside the room was an open fireplace, with chimney laid through the roof and built of sticks and clay. The school-room was entered by the old-style double door, divided horizontally in the middle and opened with a latch and string. There was no ceiling overhead, and the boys sat on slab benches that surrounded the centre of the room and formed a hollow square. A rude desk used for writing, etc., faced the wall in front of the window,—which, by the way, was the only window in the room, and only three panes of glass, placed abreast in it,—the use of which seemed to be for the 'master' alone, as he occupied it almost exclusively. During pleasant weather the upper door was allowed to stand open, in order to benefit from the light thus afforded, or, more likely, so that the boys could see what was passing out of doors."†

Little can be said of education in the county prior to the Revolution. Most of the settlements had their common schools, such as they were at that early day. Many wealthy citizens sent their sons to be educated at Princeton, at Queens College (now Rutgers), and some even to England and Holland. The county was not without its men of education in the professions and in the civil walks of life. Clergymen frequently engaged in school-teaching, and were generally among the most active advocates and supporters of schools. The tendency, however, among ministers, as well as among many others of that day, was to give their support and encouragement to colleges and schools for the higher education of the few, rather than to schools for the primary instruction of the masses.

II.—BEQUEST OF REV. ELIAS VAN BUNSCHOOTEN.

Rev. Elias Van Bunschooten, who was many years pastor of the Reformed Dutch Churches of this county, and during the latter part of his ministry of that at the Clove, in Wantage, made, in 1814, just prior to his death, a bequest of fourteen thousand six hundred and forty dollars, increased by his will to seventeen thousand dollars, the income of which was to be applied to the education of "pious youth who hope they have a call of God to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ." The following is a literal copy of the dominic's bequest:

"The donor has a mind to bestow thirteen thousand eight hundred and forty dollars in obligations, and eight hundred in cash, to the Trustees of Queen's College in New Jersey, in trust on the following terms, viz.: The General Synod of the Reformed Dutch Church in America to appoint a Committee and the Trustees to appoint one also. The two Committees jointly to devise the best plan and most solid foundation to put out said money to interest, which the giver reserves to himself during his life, but after his decease, the Trustees to use and apply said interest for the support and education in the classical and theological studies of pious youth who hope they have a call of God to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ; no one is to be admitted to said benefit but such as are recommended by the General Synod. If the interest of which is now offered, and what in future may be added by him and others, should accumulate above the aforementioned education, such surplus the Trustees, with the advice and consent of the General Synod, may then use and apply to such other purposes as shall most tend to the good of the institution and the benefit of literature; who are to render an account to the General Synod when they require it.

"The giver humbly desires that these terms be recorded in the record of General Synod, and in the record of Particular Synods, and registered in the records of all the Classes belonging to General Synod; and to be read in the said judicatories at their ordinary meetings, not for aggrandizement or self-ostentation, but to be an humble pattern for others to copy after; if the thing being so kept alive and considered, who knows whether God, in His good providence, would not move some to do the like. It will also be the pleasure and delight of him, the bestower, and others, that all the officers of the college live frugal and industrious, and thus set a good pattern to their pupils; and all ecclesiastical officers deport themselves diligent, frugal and pious, before those over whom they are set for edification; thus to prepare not only for heaven, but for the approaching millennium, the commencement of which may be at a further distance than the present living. It is also the humble and sincere request of the donor that the aforesaid officers exhibit no special inclination for luxury and accumulation of wealth, which is offensive and bars the door of donation. On the said terms and recommendations the giver is willing to bestow as before mentioned.

"ELIAS V. BUNSCHOOTEN.

"NEW YORK, June 9th, 1814.

"It is my wish, and I therefore recommend it to the Trustees within named, to require such retribution as they shall deem just and reasonable from any person who shall obtain the benefit of the within mentioned fund, and who may become able to make such retribution.

"ELIAS V. BUNSCHOOTEN.

"JUNE 9th, 1814."

This fund at the present time exceeds twenty thousand dollars, and has educated a large number of useful ministers of the Reformed Church.

III.—CLASSICAL SCHOOLS.

About 1825 the late Rev. Clarkson Dunn, rector of Christ Church, established a small classical school in the village of Newton. This school, though small in numbers, was conducted with dignity, taste, and propriety, and attended with success. The fruits of this early effort at classical education were such cultivated minds as the late Hon. Martin Ryerson, Dr. Thomas Ryerson, Rev. N. Petit, and numerous others.

The school at Deckertown was not, as is supposed by some, the first classical teaching in the northern townships of Sussex. In the fall of 1828 the Rev. Edward Allen, then residing in the Clove, a man of scholarship joined to great benevolence of character, zeal, and activity, opened a room for a small select school, in which he employed William Rankin to teach. This was truly the first classical teaching given in the northern part of Sussex. At this incipient Clove school the late E. A. Stiles was a scholar, and commenced that career of mental cultivation which led to a life of usefulness enjoyed by few. This little Clove school was participated in and upheld by the families of Dr. Herman Allen, of Deckertown, Robert A. Linn, of Hamburg, and Nathan Shafer, of Stillwater. Latin and English grammar were taught, and astronomy by oral instruction or lecture. It continued but one term, at the close of which, by an arrangement agreed upon by the Rev. Mr. Allen and the Rev. Clarkson Dunn, Mr. Rankin removed to Newton and became the English teacher of Mr. Dunn's school in that village, while Mr. Dunn himself taught the classics. Again, in 1830, Mr. Allen, assisted by Mr. Rankin, hazarded the establishment of a boarding-school at Harmony Vale, near Hamburg. This school was at once liberally patronized, reaching about fifty boarders, besides day-scholars. The school at Deckertown was commenced towards the close of 1833. This was a natural growth and advance on what had already been done.

Subsequently arose the Mount Retirement Seminary, which completed the series of pioneering academic schools in Sussex. This seminary was conducted with faithfulness and success for a long term of years. It was opened by Mr. Edward A. Stiles as the "Wantage Select School" in 1833, with three boarders. These gradually increased, so that in 1860 there were sixty, besides a large number of day-scholars, and three assistant teachers were employed. The name was changed to "Mount Retirement Seminary" in 1846. The school continued prosperous under the management of Mr. Stiles till 1865, when failing health compelled him to relinquish it, after having devoted to it thirty-five years of his life.

WILLIAM RANKIN—DECKERTOWN CLASSICAL SCHOOL.

William Rankin, who has been called "the venerable pioneer of classical education in Sussex County," deserves to be mentioned in connection with the history of education in this section. He was born in Greenville, East Tenn., his father having been a soldier in the Revolutionary war. When but a boy his mind thirsted for knowledge, and by untiring industry he early acquired what in those days and in that country was regarded as a liberal education. But, desiring greater advantages than the backwoods of the Southwest then afforded, young Rankin turned his face eastward with the design of ultimately entering Yale College and quaffing knowledge from that fountain-head of learning. On his pilgrimage his scanty means were replenished at times by teaching a quarter in some common school by the wayside.

In 1828 he arrived at Johnsonsburg, now in Warren County, and applied for the village school, which he received after undergoing a thorough and critical examination by Dr. Roderick Byington, father of Rev. Theodore L. Byington, formerly pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Newton, and now a missionary in Turkey. The examination took place at the tavern, and attracted quite a crowd of persons, who expected a "streak of fun" at seeing an uncouth backwoodsman "put through" by the well-educated village doctor. But their merriment was soon turned to surprise, then to admiration, when they found that the rough-looking young man before them was more than a match for his interlocutor. Besides exhibiting a thorough knowledge of history, grammar, and geography, and the common branches of education, he showed himself equally at home in Latin and Greek. During his short stay there he was prostrated several weeks with a violent fever, which came near terminating his life. When he had recovered barely sufficient to be able to walk he visited Newton, where he was kindly received by Rev. Joseph L. Shafer. Here he spent some time as assistant teacher in the school then kept by Rev. Clarkson Dunn in the old Episcopal rectory on the hill, late the residence of Levi Shepherd, Esq. At the conclusion of his engagement with Mr. Dunn he went to New Haven and entered Yale College, thus realizing the dream of his youthful ambition. He remained but a single year, when he again returned to Sussex County.

In 1833 he started a select school at Deckertown. So little interest was felt in the enterprise that he could procure no room for the purpose but a small building about fourteen feet square in an inconvenient part of the village. This, however, he rented, and commenced his first term with a single scholar. This lone pupil was John A. Whittaker,—for many years cashier of the Deckertown Bank, and now its president,—whose father then lived at Unionville, in Orange County. "It was universally looked upon as a romantic and impracticable undertaking. But the school went on, and for the first week with one scholar only, who accompanied his preceptor to and from the school-room at regular hours, resembling a hen with one chicken." Before the ensuing spring, however, the school numbered twenty scholars. From this small beginning it grew to be a power for good, and with its success dawned a new era in educational matters in Sussex. At the end of ten years over a thousand pupils had been under his instruction. Many had been prepared to enter college or to commence professional studies, and a large proportion of the schools in the surrounding country were conducted by teachers qualified at this institution. Among his early pupils was the veteran educator Edward A. Stiles, for many years county superintendent of schools for Sussex County.

Mr. Rankin subsequently taught at Amity, N. Y., but for more than twenty years he was engaged in Morris County, N. J., teaching with his usual force and zeal at Mendham.

Mr. Rankin was not only a master of the classics, but his mind was a perfect storehouse of scientific and useful knowledge, and his memory remarkable for its retention of facts gathered from a wide field of reading and observation. In fact, he has been called "a walking encyclopaedia of all things worth knowing," and his power of imparting to others was equal to the great resources of knowledge which he possessed. He was truly a remarkable man, and his name and self-sacrificing labors will long remain as one of the bright pages in the educational history of Sussex County.

We select from contributions made to the press by Mr. Rankin himself the following account of the school at Deckertown and matters pertaining to education in general in this county:

"I rented from the tavernkeeper before mentioned a small building, which was situated about half-way up a very steep hill. This building had been erected for a tailor-shop, and used for that purpose until the proprietor changed his business and went to tavern-keeping. It had never been painted, and had stood long enough to turn black, or at least blackish. There was no furniture,—neither stove, chair, bench, nor stool. Access to the door was by steps—or, rather, stairs—on the lower side. After examining all within I descended the steps and attempted to regain the main street, which I did by two or three dangerous slides, for the ground was covered with ice. It was now the latter part of the week, and I determined to open my school on the next Monday; consequently, my whole thoughts were turned upon preparation. In the first place, borrowing a pick, I dug out of the frozen ground steps up to those of the house, thus making the whole ascent practicable. I next inquired of the merchants for a stove, but they knew of none to be had nearer than Newton or Goshen. I then made the same inquiry of the tavernkeeper, who at first made the same reply; but then, looking for a moment downward, he raised his head and, striking the counter, as was his manner, said, 'I will rent you a stove, but it is a broken one. A few nights ago the young fellows in my bar-room got tight and in a row broke my stove badly.'—'I will take it,' said I. 'What is your price?'—'I will charge you nothing for the use of it if you will get it repaired.'—'Have you a blacksmith-shop in the place?'—'None nearer than a mile and a half.'—'Have you anything by which I can convey the stove thither?'—'I can lend you a horse, but I have neither sleigh, sled, nor wagon that would answer for such a purpose.'—'Have you a wood-pile?'

—'Do you mean to hitch my horse to the wood-pile and drag it to the smith's shop with the stove on top?'

—'If I injure your horse in the least,' I answered, 'I will indemnify you for the same.' He then laughed, and said, 'Go ahead.' While he went for the horse I went to the wood-pile and selected a couple of poles eight feet long, and, having obtained a hammer and nails, nailed on several cross-pieces; and, putting the horse in these shafts, I loaded up the broken stove and moved off to the blacksmith-shop.

"This the reader will say is partly romance, but I say, upon honor, it is every word strictly true. The repairing accomplished with dispatch, I returned and put my stove in the place for which it was prepared. Having now furnished my room with warming apparatus and a few rude seats, I advertised on the public doors of the village that my school would open on the ensuing Monday morning. I repaired to my lodgings oppressed with anxiety for the future. I had not as yet one single scholar engaged certainly, though all told me they would see about it, and, if I succeeded, they would most likely send.

"I spent that night in sleeplessness, and the ensuing Sabbath day in anything but peace of mind. At length Monday morning came, and I went at sunrise to my newly-prepared school-room and kindled a fire that the room might be warm in time for taking in the school. I then returned for my breakfast, after which I went to open school. Roguish eyes were peering out from behind corners and suppressed laughs were heard as I passed along the street, but no scholars were seen gathering. Ascending the steps, I entered the door; and was there not a single scholar there? Yes, there sat a single one,—a young man of fifteen or sixteen. He arose and handed me a note from his father, a respectable and worthy gentleman of Orange Co., N. Y. This gentleman stated in his note that he had heard of my intention of opening a school, and wished to enter his son at the beginning.

"Thus opened the classical school at Deckertown in 1833, which continued twenty years, always full in numbers and prosperous in other respects. At this school scores of young men were educated who are now eminent in each of the professions throughout this and the adjoining States, and between four and five hundred teachers of schools of all grades in Northern New Jersey emanated from this school, supplying the country with teachers at a time when they were most needed."

Thus Mr. Rankin's school might be called the normal school of Sussex; it had sent out four or five hundred teachers before the State Normal School was founded. We find the following reference to this school in Barber and Howe's "Historical Collections of New Jersey:"

"Although Wantage, Sussex Co., has long been celebrated for the wealth of its inhabitants, it has not, until recently, fostered literature in its precincts. Formerly, the wealthy citizens who wished to educate their children sent them off to boarding-schools in some different sections of the country. Common schools also were in a low condition. No select schools of any permanency had been sustained in the township until near the close of 1833, when an enterprise was undertaken by William Rankin in the village of Deckertown. A few circumstances relative to the establishment of the school at Deckertown will throw light on the subject of education in this region. When the above-mentioned gentleman proposed to open a select school in the central and main village in this township at the time mentioned, so little interest was felt in his proposal that he could procure no room but a small building fourteen feet square in an inconvenient part of the village. This, however, he rented, and commenced the first term with a single scholar; and this lone pupil was not of the State of New Jersey, but from New York. This discouraging commencement did not arise from want of knowledge of or confidence in the teacher,—for he had been favorably known in the country several years previous as a classical instructor,—neither was it because the inhabitants were averse to education, but it stands as an illustration of the strength of habit on communities, and the difficulty of breaking over the barriers of long-continued custom."

IV.—PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

In the progress of public schools the county of Sussex labored under the same difficulties which embarrassed every other portion of the State. For more than half a century there was no action taken by the State to provide for popular education, no law enacted by the Legislature or fund created or appropriation made for educational purposes. The people, left to themselves, did the best they could towards sustaining schools in their respective neighborhoods. The act which gave the first legal authority for laying out school districts and for raising money by vote of the townships for building and furnishing school-houses was passed in 1829. In that year an appropriation was made from the school fund of $20,000 for the entire State, to be distributed according to the ratio of State taxes. An equal sum continued to be appropriated till 1838, when it was increased to $30,000; in 1851 it was raised to $40,000, and an additional $40,000 appropriated out of the State treasury, making the annual amount appropriated for school purposes $80,000, at which it remained till 1867, since which the amount has been $100,000. The act of 1851 changed the basis of apportionment, making it to the counties in the ratio of population and to the townships in the ratio of the school census.

In the year 1837 a considerable fund remained in the treasury of the United States not required for the expenses of the Federal government. It arose mainly, if not entirely, from sales of the public lands of the United States. Congress that year, by law, ordered the distribution of this fund (which was called "the surplus revenue fund") among the several States of the Union. The same year (March 10th) the Legislature of New Jersey, by law, ordered the distribution of her share of this fund among the several counties of the State. The share of Sussex County was $38,689. The law directed that the board of chosen freeholders of each county should loan this fund within this State, "giving a preference to the citizens of their respective counties," and should apportion and pay the interest to the several townships in the ratio of their State tax. By the school law, the townships are required to appropriate the interest of the surplus revenue received by them for the support of public schools, and the county superintendent apportions this interest to the several school districts upon the basis of the last published school census.

The portion of this fund belonging to Sussex County was loaned out by commissioners for a long time, but has been called in and most of it used by the county. In 1858, as appears by the minutes of the board of chosen freeholders, the county had used $21,616.24 of the principal, leaving an unexpended balance of $17,072.76. Since that time the county has used the balance of the principal fund, excepting the sum of $842.38, which remains uncollected. The county, however, pays the interest annually to the several townships, and the same is still employed in the support of public schools.

Among the staunch advocates of a normal school for the education of public-school teachers was Governor Daniel Haines, of this county, who took strong ground in favor of it in his message in 1847. The act was passed in 1856, and on the 24th of April of that year the first board of trustees of the normal school was organized. Hon. Thomas Lawrence, of this county, was among the early friends of the institution, and is the only member of the original organization still remaining in the board. The whole property of the institution, now owned entirely by the State, including normal and model school buildings and the boarding-houses, is valued at $250,000.

The State board of education was established in 1866. In 1867 the present public-school law, in most of its essential features, was passed by the Legislature, the amendment making the schools of the State entirely free being adopted in 1871.

PUBLIC SCHOOL FUNDS.

The funds for the support of public schools are as follows:

State Funds.—The trustees of the school fund are the Governor, President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Assembly, Attorney-General, Secretary of State, and Comptroller. All moneys received from the sale and rental of lands under water, from the tax on the capital stock of banking and insurance companies, and all gifts and legacies are invested and form a permanent fund, and out of the income of said fund there is appropriated $100,000 annually, which is apportioned among the several counties on the basis of the school census. The amount of the State school fund is now $1,660,502, and it is continually increasing. In addition to the above State appropriation there is a State tax of two mills on each dollar of valuation of all the taxable property of the State, which is apportioned among the several counties in the same manner. The amount derived annually from this source and appropriated by the State for the support of schools is about $1,000,000.

County Funds.—The interest arising from the surplus revenue of each county is appropriated to the support of public schools. The amount derived annually from this fund is about $30,000.

Township Funds.—The townships are authorized to raise by taxation an additional amount for school purposes, if necessary. The amount raised in 1878 was $24,199.

District and City Funds.—Each district and city has power to raise funds, by taxation or by the issue of bonds, for the erection and repair of school-houses. About $400,000 is annually raised in the State for this purpose. Each district and city has also power to raise by taxation funds to pay teachers' salaries. About $300,000 is annually raised for this object. All the money derived from the State appropriations, surplus revenue, and township school tax, except twenty dollars for each district for incidentals, must be used for the payment of teachers' salaries and the purchase of fuel. Each district must provide suitable buildings and maintain free school at least nine months in each year to entitle it to a share of the school moneys.

The Two-Mills Tax.—A writer in the New Jersey Herald for April, 1879, gives the following on the workings of the two-mills tax in Sussex County and in the Newton District from 1873 to 1878, inclusive. It is an instructive illustration of the operation of the school law:

"It is provided by law that there shall be assessed, levied, and collected, annually, on the inhabitants of this State, and upon the taxable real and personal property therein, two mills on each dollar of valuation contained in the last abstract of ratables furnished by the board of assessors of the several counties. This two-mills tax is paid by the several township collectors to the county collectors of each county. The county collectors, in their turn, pay to the treasurer of the State the quotas due from their respective counties of this two-mills tax on or before the first day of January, annually, next ensuing the assessment thereof. Then the State superintendent of public schools, on or before the first day of January of each year, apportions the money received from all the counties, raised by the two-mills tax, among the several counties, in proportion to the number of children included in the last published school census of the counties respectively. The census is taken between the first and the twentieth days of July of each year, by the clerk of each school district, and shows the number of children in the district between the ages of five and eighteen years. The State superintendent, on or before the tenth day of January of each year, draws orders on the comptroller of the treasury in favor of the county collectors for the payment of the money thus apportioned. Then the county superintendent of each county is required to apportion the money received from the State treasurer by the county collector of his county to the towns and cities, and also to the several school districts, upon the basis of the last published school census. On or before the tenth day of February of each year the county superintendent is required to draw orders on the county collector in favor of the township collectors of his county for the payment of the money so apportioned.

"It will be seen that the two-mills tax is assessed on the basis of the ratables, and after being collected into one grand mass (if I may use the expression) the money so raised is apportioned at Trenton among the counties according to the number of schoolable children. It will be seen from this, at once, that the operation of this plan results in a gain to the poorer counties, unless the richer ones can hold their own by showing a census of children corresponding in point of number to the excess of their taxable wealth.

"The following statement shows the outgo in Sussex County of the two-mills tax for each year since 1873, and the income (so to speak) received by the county (after apportionment by the State comptroller) for the corresponding years :

Outgo, 1873.....	$32,424.40
Income, 1873.....	33,428.24
Outgo, 1874.....	32,116.74
Income, 1874.....	32,740.19
Outgo, 1875.....	32,116.98
Income, 1875.....	31,754.16
Outgo, 1876.....	31,134.47
Income, 1876.....	30,141.38
Outgo, 1877.....	29,895.59
Income, 1877.....	28,550.11
Outgo, 1878.....	26,421.58
Income, 1878.....	26,436.36

"It will be observed that in 1873 this county received $1003.84 more than it paid; in 1874 it received $633.45 more than it paid; in 1875 the tide turned, and it received $362.82 less than it paid; in 1876 it received $993.09 less than it paid; in 1877 it received $1345.39 less than it paid; in 1878 the tide turned again, and it received $14.78 more than it paid.

"The difference between the two-mills tax for 1873 and that for 1878—to wit, $6002.82—marks, though it does not measure, the rate of shrinkage in values during that period.

"To show the working of the two-mills tax system in the Newton District, I subjoin a statement showing the produce of that tax in the town of Newton for the last six years, and the portion received each year by the same town in the distribution of the money raised by that tax. Newton 'town' and Newton 'School District' may be considered for this purpose as identical in extent, though, in fact, Newton

School District laps over a little on both Andover and Hampton :

Paid, 1873.....	$1054.80
Got back, 1873.....	2469.65
Paid, 1874.....	4011.42
Got back, 1874.....	3264.61
Paid, 1875.....	3874.61
Got back, 1875.....	2613.36
Paid, 1876.....	3049.90
Got back, 1876.....	2925.29
Paid, 1877.....	3284.44
Got back, 1877.....	1958.22
Paid, 1878.....	2213.50
Got back, 1878.....	1501.63

"This shows that a considerable portion of the two-mills tax raised in Newton School District goes to the support of other districts in the same county. Last year (1878) there came back into the county only $14.78 more than went out of the county, yet Newton District received that year (1878) $711.87 less than it paid. Of course, this difference went to the support of some of her weaker sister-districts.

"The State is divided into school districts, numbering now one thousand three hundred and sixty-seven. These districts are corporate bodies, consisting of the inhabitants who are legal voters therein. The executive officers of these corporations are trustees, three in number, one of whom is chosen by each board as district clerk, who is, in effect, the secretary of the board, and by whom, with one other trustee, all orders on the township collector for the payment of money must be signed. The township collectors are the depositaries of the school moneys for final distribution, and that distribution is effected through the instrumentality of orders from the trustees on the township collectors.

"The law provides that if the two-mills tax-money received by any township shall be insufficient to maintain free schools for at least nine months in each year, the inhabitants of the township shall, by township tax, raise such additional amount as shall be necessary for that purpose, and upon their failure to do so the county superintendent shall, unless the State board of education shall for good cause otherwise direct, withhold from such township all that part of the State appropriation derived from the revenue of the State, and shall apportion and distribute the same among such of the townships in the county as shall have complied with the requirements of the law.

"In addition to the two-mills tax-money and the State appropriation, each school district may raise by tax such other sums of money as they may need for school purposes. The sums to be so raised, and the purposes to which, when raised, they shall be applied, are to be determined upon by a majority of the legal voters of the district, in district meeting assembled, and this district tax is assessed, levied, and collected by the township officers on the inhabitants and property of the district in the same manner as other taxes are assessed, levied, and collected.

"It is further provided that no district except those which have less than forty-five schoolable children shall receive less than $300 out of the State school money and the surplus revenue interest, and such moneys as may be raised for school purposes. There are many districts which would not be entitled to as much as this sum under the apportionment upon the basis of the last published school census. To each district, therefore, having forty-five schoolable children, $300 is first apportioned; then the residue is apportioned among them all upon the basis of their census. The result is that a large number of the small district schools are supported in part by the larger and stronger districts. The apportionment of the State school money (including the two-mills tax-money) upon the basis of the school census, in connection with the $300 limitation, results in an annual loss to Newton District for the benefit of other districts in the county, weaker in point of wealth and possibly stronger (proportionally) in the number of schoolable children. This loss varies from year to year as the rates, upon which taxes are assessed, vary in the several townships and counties, and as the census of schoolable children varies in the respective school districts.

"Until this year (1879) the school law provided that in the apportionment of school moneys districts having forty-five children or more should receive no less than $350. Accordingly, all districts with a school census ranging from forty-five to about ninety received this fixed sum. This provision was incorporated in the school law in 1871. In consequence of the yearly increase in the rates of the State, the receipts from the two-mills tax continued to increase till the year 1875, when they reached the maximum. Since then there has been an annual decrease in the rates, and a corresponding decrease in the amount of money received. In 1875 the two-mills tax amounted (in the whole State) to $1,238,115.80; last year (1878) it was but $1,132,501.38, being a decrease of $105,614.42. The school census in the mean time has increased from 298,000 to 321,166, an increase of 24,166. These two causes combined have reduced the apportionment per head of the two-mills tax to the counties from $4.16 to $3.56,—a decrease of sixty cents per child in the amount received by the counties. In consequence of the provision of the law referred to remaining unchanged, the $350 districts received, until this year, the same as theretofore, and the entire loss fell upon the remaining districts. In order to equalize this loss, the Legislature last winter reduced the amount to be apportioned to the weak districts to $300. The loss in the apportionment per head to the large districts since 1875 is seen conspicuously in the case of this, Sussex County. Here the number of $350 districts has increased since 1875 from fifty-five to seventy-five, and the maximum census in those $350 districts from eighty-seven to one hundred and ninety-five. The reduction in the apportionments for the remaining districts is remarkable. In 1875 it was $4 per child, and last year it was but $1.80. Professor Apgar, from whose last annual report I take these statements touching the operation of the $350 district clause of the school law, says that the apportionment to the larger districts will be increased (by the reduction to $300) to the sum of $3.80, making a difference (gain) to those districts of $2 per child.

"The school tax is felt to be a heavy one in these dull times, but it is cheerfully borne. Resting its claim to public support upon its tendency to promote the general welfare, the public school system should be administered in such a manner as to insure thorough instruction in those practical studies which have a direct bearing upon the business of life,—studies which lie at the very foundation of finished scholarship, and at the same time furnish the best equipment for the every-day business of this intensely practical age."

SCHOOL STATISTICS (1879).

The following table, taken from the report of the county superintendent, Mr. Luther Hill, for 1879, gives the school census and the amount of money received by Sussex County from the two-mills tax, State appropriation, and surplus revenue combined, from 1871 to 1879, inclusive:

Report of	School Census.	Public Fund.
1871.....	7790	$39,112.30
1872.....	7725	39,435.04
1873.....	7652	38,518.45
1874.....	7640	37,733.00
1875.....	7691	36,619.75
1876.....	7530	34,022.34
1877.....	7432	33,263.26
1878.....	7362	31,001.04
1879.....	7054	28,829.30

"It will be seen," remarks Mr. Hill, "that we have lost during this period more than seven hundred children from the census, and more than $10,000 in the public money. By reducing salaries we have made an average of nine months in which the schools of the county have been kept open for the year, a fraction less than last year. Of the loss in the census, more than three hundred falls in the present year, and the result is seen in the several columns indicating attendance. Three new school-houses have been built during the year,—to wit, at Tuttle's Corners, Tranquillity, and McAfee. These buildings have taken the place of very poor ones, and have been erected at a moderate expense to the districts.

"We have a surplus of teachers. Our own public schools and private institutions are furnishing many of them. Their averages at examination give evidence of good scholarship. Some of them are teaching with marked success, and others lack experience, chiefly, to render them effective and useful. The few normal graduates teaching in the county are successful, almost without an exception. . . . Nine districts have made application for and secured the metric apparatus furnished by the State. Several new libraries have been procured, and additions made to those already established under the library act. . . . The work done in the schools and advancement made by the pupils are not below that of any previous year."

The school-houses now in the county are generally of a good class. Their improvement is briefly shown by the following statement :

Value of school property in 1866	$39,000
" " " " 1876	154,000

The amount since the last date has somewhat declined, owing to a lower valuation, as will appear by the report of 1879.

Teachers' institutes have been held annually in the county for the past ten or twelve years, and have been very profitable as means of elevating the standard of education.

V.—COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS.

The county superintendents of schools for Sussex County since the passage of the act of 1867 have been the following: Nathaniel Pettit, Newton, 1867-68; Edward A. Stiles, Deckertown, 1869-75; Luther Hill, Andover, 1876-81. Rev. Nathaniel Pettit became rector of Christ Church, Newton, in 1857, and officiated in that capacity till 1867.*

EDWARD A. STILES.

Mr. Stiles died while in office in 1875; to his report of that year was appended the following brief but just tribute to his memory :

"For the first time since the enactment of the law creating the office of county superintendent death has entered this corps of school officers and taken one of their number. Before Mr. Stiles could finish his report, which terminates abruptly, he was called to his eternal home. Mr. Stiles, during his term of office, was faithful in the performance of every duty. He was elected to this office in 1869, and the tabular statement given in his brief report shows what progress was made in his county in educational matters under his administration. He was beloved by all who knew him, and his death occasions profound regret. The following obituary notice appeared in one of the county papers :

"The parents of Mr. Stiles moved from Morris County into Vernon township when he was but two years old. Nine years later, or in the year 1819, they settled on the farm where Mr. Stiles died, and where he spent the greater part of his active years as principal of Mount Retirement Seminary. This school arose from the humblest beginning. In 1833 a half-dozen of boys were instructed in a room of the farmhouse. But the teacher had found his calling, and as he developed with his work his school rapidly increased to a size and reputation far beyond his early hopes. For many years there was an average of seventy-five pupils under his tuition, and it was in full vigor when he relinquished its control in 1865. The graduates of this seminary are to be found in every part of the country, many of them filling high positions, and all ready to testify to the singleness of purpose, the steady devotion to duty, and to the considerate kindness of his supervision, as well as to the thorough and practical tone of his instruction. In 1869 he was appointed to the superintendency of this county, and the constant growth in all matters material pertaining to the educational system of the county, the gradual elevation of public sentiment, the increased efficiency of teachers, all bear witness to the success of his administration. For more than forty years he has been devoted to the work of education, and, whether estimated by his capability or his devotion or ample success, he well deserves the title of "Educator." He had excellent common sense and a most reliable judgment, and behind all his words and actions was a character so far beyond reproach that his purity of motive was never questioned. His last illness was long and most painful, but the religion which had been his life was his support in death. The promise did not fail, but once more the Psalmist's word was verified, and "the end of the upright man was peace." Retaining his faculties in full vigor and giving counsel as to school matters up to the final day, at last he passed away so gently that his watching friends were scarcely aware of his departure.'

"At a meeting of the county superintendents, held soon after the death of Mr. Stiles, the following preamble and resolution were passed :

"WHEREAS, This association of county superintendents of New Jersey has heard with deep emotion of the demise of one of its members, Mr. E. A. Stiles, superintendent of Sussex County, and being deeply impressed because of the fact that in this event death for the first time has entered our circle, and has taken away one of the earliest workers in the field; AND WHEREAS, we recognize in the death of this co-worker the removal of one who, by his unobtrusive manners, his steady devotion to duty, and his gentle nature had commanded our admiration and esteem; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we hereby express our sincere condolence with his bereaved family, and we tender them our assurance that we regard this loss as not theirs alone, but ours also."

LUTHER HILL.

Mr. Hill was born in Green township, in this county, in March, 1834. He was a pupil of Mr. Stiles at Mount Retirement Seminary, in Wantage, previous to his entering the public schools as teacher. After teaching at Springdale, Sussex Co., he engaged in mercantile business, which he pursued till 1873, when he taught the public school at Andover up to the time of his appointment as county superintendent.

CHAPTER VII.

BENCH AND BAR OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

I.—LAWYERS AND COURTS BEFORE THE REVOLUTION.

IN his "Centennial Address," Mr. Edsall gives the names of the first lawyers who practiced at the Sussex bar as follows:

"The names of the lawyers who first practiced in our courts were Bernardus Lagrange, John Smith, Abraham Cottnam, John De Hart, William Pidgeon, Jasper Smith, and Aaron Doud. None of these practitioners resided in our county except Doud, who acted as deputy to De Hart while the latter held the office of county clerk. De Hart belonged to Elizabethtown, and there, I believe, he remained, notwithstanding his official position in Sussex. The attorney-general of the province, Cortlandt Skinner, attended our courts pretty regularly. In his absence Aaron Doud or Jasper Smith acted for him. This Skinner was a zealous royalist, and became a brigadier-general under Sir Henry Clinton in the war of the Revolution, in which position he rendered himself forever infamous by his attempts to procure the kidnapping of William Livingston, the first republican Governor of New Jersey. About the time the court-house was completed in this town, Thomas Anderson, a young lawyer, who studied under Abraham Cottnam, of Trenton, came to Newton and settled here permanently, and proved himself a useful and patriotic citizen. Robert Ogden, Jr., another man of merit and public spirit, subsequently became a resident of Sussex and a practitioner in our courts. Judges Neville, Saltar, and Read, of the Supreme Court, attended in this county when it was necessary to hold Courts of Oyer and Terminer, and the county paid their bills for food, lodging, and drink, the latter item being by no means the smallest in the account rendered."

"I mention this last matter in no invidious spirit. It was the custom in those days for judges to imbibe strong drink; and the records of our county show frequent instances wherein the court adjourned to meet at the tavern for no other purpose than to moisten their judicial clay with milk-punch or rum-toddy. Excess, however, appears to have been regarded as disgraceful, especially by men in authority."

The lawyers mentioned above were probably all who practiced in the county till after the Revolution. During the early part of that period Chief Justice Morris held a term of Oyer and Terminer at Newton, and had occasion to write Governor Livingston the following letter:

"NEWTON, June 14, 1777.

"SIR,—Enclosed Your Excellency has a list of the convictions and the judgments thereon at this very tedious, and I would have said premature, court, if the council had not thought expedient on mature deliberation to have appointed it. I had the pleasure to find Mr. Justice

Synmes here at my arrival, and confess, if I had supposed the council would have spared him for the business, I would not have traveled post over the mountains, through the rain and late into the night, on so very short notice.

"Judges young in office, and not appointed for their legal erudition; associates but reputable farmers, doctors, or shopkeepers; young officers, no counsel nor clerk, for want of timely notice, which was not even given to the sheriff; and this in a disaffected country, both witnesses and criminals to be collected from all parts of the State. Thus circumstanced was a court of the highest expectation ever held in New Jersey; a court for the trial of a number of state criminals, some for high treason, a crime so little known to New Jersey that perhaps the first lawyer in it would not know how to enter a judgment under our Constitution. It would make an excellent paragraph in Gaule's Veritable Mercury; no other printer could venture to publish it. In England, where treasons and rebellions are from immemorial usage become familiar terms, twelve learned judges from the first courts in the world, the members of privy council, and the first gentlemen in the kingdom would have been sent on such an errand, and attended by old and experienced officers and the ablest counsel at the bar, witnesses prepared, criminals to try, and reasonable notice given. But there the law is systematically administered, and the ministers of it have settled forms of practice under an old constitution well understood. And here we have a new-modeled government, incomplete in all parts, young in practice, and contingencies unprovided for.

"Seriously, sir, with due submission to the council, I should have thought that for a court of such consequence, the members of the council and some of the bar ought to have been joined in the commission and requested to attend. We have sat with great patience, and have now closed the third week. Had it not been for the negligence or villainy of a rascally jailer, in suffering John Eddy, the only person indicted for high treason, to escape yesterday morning, I flatter myself we should have acquitted ourselves with tolerable success, and I hope have given satisfaction to the good people. This escape has given me much uneasiness, as I fear it will be undeservedly attributed to the inattention of the court. If the jailer was not privy to the escape, which did not appear, he is perhaps too severely punished. The court, in fixing his punishment, had a retrospective eye to past abuses of this sort, and thought an early example of severity would be likely to prevent them in the future. He appears to be a young, simple fellow, unacquainted with the duties of his office, and not fully instructed by the sheriff, who has been almost daily cautioned on the subject. This jailer's case is recommended to the mercy of Your Excellency and Council, at such season as you shall judge expedient to examine it. Mr. Attorney-General will inform you of the particular demerits of the other convicts; some of them may hereafter be entitled to partial pardons; I wish I could say they were at this time. The little time the members of the court had for considering the commission after my arrival hurried us into a matter which, on further consideration, I confess I am not satisfied with; I mean the short time between the teste and return of the precept for the grand jury. In England, I observe, fifteen days was ordered, on mature deliberation of all the judges acting under the special commission of 1746. What the practice has been in New Jersey we do not know, as the clerk has none of the former circuit papers. If we have erred, it is partly chargeable to the council for appointing the court so shortly after issuing the commission, and they are bound to get the Legislature to cure it. Had I half an hour's time for thinking of the matter it should have been otherwise.

"In your letter notifying me of this court, you observe that my not attending the court at Burlington had given uneasiness. Whatever private individuals might have thought, I am persuaded no member of the Legislature had the least right to expect my attendance. Two hundred miles a day is rather hard traveling; and even that would not have done, unless they supposed me possessed of the spirit of divination. I accepted my present office to manifest my resolution to serve my country. I mean to do the duty of it while I hold it, according to my best judgment. Whenever the Legislature think they can fill it more advantageously, the tenure of my commission shall not disappoint them.

"The court rose without adjournment, as it was not supposed they would have occasion to sit again, unless Eddy should be taken. If this should be the case, I hope one of the other justices will be able to attend; I fear I shall not. I wish the Legislature, before another court sits, would take under consideration the judgment in high treason, old indictments at the suit of the king, and some other difficulties in former practice, which the attorney-general will mention to you.

"I have the honor, etc.,

"ROBT MORRIS.

"GOVERNOR LIVINGSTON."

To understand some of the difficulties referred to in this letter, it must be remembered that at this time, and for many years after, grand and petit jurors were summoned by virtue of venire directed to the sheriff for that purpose. Courts of Oyer and Terminer were held by virtue of special commissions issued by the Governor and Council, in pursuance of the authority contained in the commission from the king. The constitution of 1776 gave no such express power, and doubts were entertained whether the new Governor and Council could exercise it. They did do it, however, holding it to be justified by the act passed soon after the meeting of the first Legislature, which provided that the several courts of the State should be confirmed, established, and continued with the like powers under the present government as before the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence.

Charles Pettit, who was a lawyer and had been the deputy clerk of the old Council and of the Supreme Court, writes to Governor Livingston, June 15, 1777: "You will receive herewith a draught of a commission of Oyer and Terminer, which I have made from one of the old forms; it is a translation as literal as the change of style will admit. I send also, by way of cover, the draught of the late commission for Sussex; so that you may have an opportunity of comparing them. On further consideration (although I have had no opportunity of examining books), I am better satisfied that the Courts of Oyer and Terminer may be legally held under such commission, if it were only by virtue of the act for reviving and establishing the courts of justice. The only doubt that remains is the appointment of assistant justices to those of the Supreme Court, as it may be said they ought to be elected by the Council and Assembly; if so, it might be well at their next meeting to elect a set of associates for each county."

In September, 1777, an act was passed making the punishment for treason the same as that for murder,—that is, hanging instead of quartering,—and that all persons who had committed the crime before July 2, 1776, might be proceeded against and punished as if the crime were committed against the State; and that all indictments found in the name of the king should be prosecuted as if in the name of the State. Another act was passed specially authorizing the Governor and Council to constitute and appoint by commission Courts of Oyer and Terminer, under which commissions for that purpose continued to be issued until 1794, when an act was passed constituting these courts substantially as they are now held.

From this period jurisprudences, courts, and trials assumed a more systematic and settled form, and the profession of the law became fixed and orderly. We give below a list of those who have participated in this honorable profession in Sussex County, from the advent of the first lawyer to the present time, including the dates of their admission, both as attorneys and as counselors.

 Winfield H. Courson,† November term, 1876.
 Theodore Simonson,† February term, 1876.
 Robert L. Lawrence,† November term, 1876.
 Theodore E. Dennis,† November term, 1876.
 Alton R. Shay,† February term, 1877; June term, 1880.
 Charles D. Thompson,† June term, 1877; June term, 1880.
 Henry Huston,† June term, 1877; June term, 1880.
 A. Watson Stockbower,† November term, 1877.
 David B. Hetzel,† February term, 1880.
 William M. Smith,† June term, 1878.
 A. Lewis Morrow,† November term, 1878.
 Frank Shepherd,† June term, 1880.

Two in the above list—viz., Robert Ogden, Jr., and Hon. Daniel Haines—were called to the degree of sergeant-at-law, the former in May, 1780, and the latter in September, 1837.

III.—BIOGRAPHIES AND BRIEF NOTICES OF LAWYERS AND JUDGES.

ROBERT OGDEN, JR., whose name appears second in the list of the Sussex bar, was a great-grandson of Jonathan Ogden, one of the original associates of the * Deceased. † Present members. ‡ Removed.

Elizabethtown purchase, who died in 1732, at the age of eighty-six. He had a son named Robert Ogden, and his son Robert, the father of Robert Ogden, Jr., and of Col. Aaron Ogden, the Governor of New Jersey in 1812, resided at the old borough of Elizabethtown, where he filled several offices of honor and trust, among others that of surrogate for the county of Essex. He was a member of the Council, and several years Speaker of the House of Assembly. Being appointed one of the delegates from the Legislature of New Jersey to the convention which met in New York in 1765 to protest against the Stamp Act, he, with the chairman of the convention, refused to sign the protest and petition to the king and Parliament, upon the ground that it ought to be transmitted to the Provincial Assembly, and be presented to the government of Great Britain through them. This so displeased his constituents that he resigned his seat in the Assembly, saying, in his address delivered on that occasion, "I trust Providence will in due time make the rectitude of my heart and my inviolable affection for my country appear in a fair light to the world, and that my sole aim was the happiness of New Jersey."

When the war of the Revolution commenced he took a firm part on the side of freedom, and was one of the committee of vigilance for his town. His sons were all ardent Whigs. Matthias was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the First Regiment in the New Jersey Line in December, 1775, was wounded in storming the Heights of Quebec, and was distinguished throughout the war as colonel of the regiment and brigadier-general by brevet. His son Aaron, born at Elizabethtown in 1756, graduated at Princeton in 1773, before he had attained the age of seventeen, and became an assistant to Mr. Francis Barber, who was teacher of a celebrated grammar school at which Judge Brockholts and Alexander Hamilton were pupils. In the spring of 1777 both pupils and teacher entered the army. Aaron Ogden was appointed lieutenant and paymaster in the First New Jersey Regiment, and continued in the service till the close of the war, as aide-de-camp, captain, and brigade major and inspector. This last-named officer (now abolished) was during the Revolutionary war, and long afterwards, the most important of the staff-officers of the brigade.

"In the winter of 1776-77, while Maj. Ogden was sleeping in the same room with Gen. Maxwell at Elizabethtown, they were informed that one of the pickets had heard the rowing of the boats of the British, who were coming over from Staten Island to surprise them in the night. Ogden volunteered to reconnoitre, and, approaching a house near the meadows, he observed a light. Slackening his pace, the night being very dark, he found himself all at once surrounded by British soldiers and within reach of a sentinel, who ordered him to dismount. Determined at all hazards to alarm his troops, he immediately wheeled and put spurs to his horse, expecting a shot; he received from another sentinel a thrust of a bayonet into his chest. He had strength, however, to reach the garrison, about two miles distant, and give the alarm. Gen. Maxwell's remark was, 'The pitcher that goes oftenest down the well will come up broken at last.' By proper attention and care at his home he recovered from this wound, which was a very dangerous one. His timely alarm prevented the enemy from doing any mischief."

A complete account of the brilliant services of Col. Ogden in the Revolution would require more space than we have at command. "When the war ended he was among those who, after they had borne the toils, the perils, and the sacrifices of a long and at times apparently a desperate conflict, laid down their arms and retired, most of them to private life and to poverty."

"Towards the close of the Revolution, Robert Ogden, Sr., removed to Sparta, in the county of Sussex, where he owned large tracts of land, and where he continued a life of usefulness to both Church and State until the year 1787, when he died at the full age of threescore and ten."* Mr. Edsall, in his "Centennial Address," makes the date of the arrival of Mr. Ogden at Sparta "about 1765," and that of his son, Robert Ogden, Jr., at the Sussex bar, "some time subsequently" to the first occupation of the court-house, which was during the May term, 1765. As to the senior Robert Ogden the date of settlement given by Mr. Edsall is undoubtedly too early by at least ten or a dozen years. The precise date at which Robert Ogden, Jr., began to practice in the Sussex courts is not known; it was probably about the time his father settled in Sparta. Elmer, in his "Reminiscences of the Bench and Bar of New Jersey," speaks of him as follows: "Robert Ogden, Jr., was a lawyer and had a large practice, and was called 'the honest lawyer.' He was disabled by a fall in childhood, which prevented him from active service in the field; but he was a quartermaster and commissioner of stores, in which capacities he rendered good service, giving his time, talents, money, and credit freely to supply the army." This relates to his career at Elizabethtown during part at least of the Revolution; and, as no mention is made of him at an earlier date in any of the proceedings of the courts of Sussex, we conclude that he did not settle in this county until towards the close of the Revolution. He first appears as a member of the State Council from this county in 1778 and 1779; in 1790 he was a member of the Assembly, with Aaron Hankinson and John Rutherford, after which his name does not appear in the legislative

* Elmer's "Reminiscences," p. 139. We find in a sketch of the early history of Morris County an allusion to the attempts to destroy the furnaces which were of such great service to the Americans during the Revolution. The author says, "Some of the attempts were by Tories, led by Claudius Smith, who once threatened Mount Hope, and who actually robbed Robert Ogden between Sparta and Hamburg, Charles Hoff at Hibernia, and Robert Erskine at Ringwood."

archives. It appears from the records of the Sussex County Bible Society that he was president of that organization in 1825. He died in 1826.

HON. JOHN CLEVES SYMMES.—The subject of this notice never practiced law in Sussex County, but was one of the judges of the County Courts before the Revolution down to the year 1777. He was a son of Rev. Timothy Symmes, of Scituate, Mass., who graduated at Harvard College in the year 1733, and in 1742 settled at River Head, L. I. Rev. Timothy

John Cleves Symmes

Symmes had one other son, Timothy, who was judge of the Common Pleas of Sussex from 1777 to 1791, having been appointed in the place of his brother, John Cleves Symmes, who resigned the position to accept an appointment on the bench of the Supreme Court.

John Cleves Symmes was a delegate from this county to the Provincial Congress, and took an active part in framing the State constitution of 1776. He was appointed one of the justices of the Supreme Court in February, 1777. In 1784 and 1785 he was a delegate to the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, still retaining his position as justice of the Supreme Court.

One of his letters to Governor Livingston, detailing his proceedings in the Courts of Oyer and Terminer of Hunterdon and Cumberland in 1778, will be found in "The New Jersey Revolutionary Correspondence," p. 135. Several persons were convicted of treason and sentenced to death, but whether any of them were executed is now unknown. He presided in 1782 at the court held in Westfield, Essex Co., for the trial of James Morgan, arraigned for the murder of Rev. James Caldwell. The shooting of this gentleman was one of those tragic events of the Revolution which excited the deepest sympathy of the community. He was the Presbyterian minister at Elizabethtown, a zealous Whig, and was chaplain of the Northern army in the fall of 1776. He returned to the State and was incessantly engaged in his parochial and public duties, and was perhaps the most popular man with the army and the people generally in his neighborhood. In 1780 his wife was shot in her house by British soldiers. On the 24th of November, 1781, he was shot through the heart, and immediately killed, at Elizabethtown Point, by Morgan, who was then in service as a militiaman, and who claimed to have been on duty as a sentinel and to have shot him because he persisted in passing him when required to stop. Morgan was an Irishman and a Catholic, and in the excitement which prevailed at the time he was tried—about six weeks after the act was committed—he had but little chance for his life, whether guilty or not. He was defended by Col. De Hart, but after a full and fair trial, said by those present to have been remarkably solemn, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and he was sentenced to be hung. This sentence was carried into execution on the 29th of January, after he had been conducted to the church, where a sermon was preached by Rev. Jonathan Elmer, according to a custom then prevailing.

In 1788, Judge Symmes was chosen by Congress one of the judges of the Northwest Territory, and shortly afterwards removed to Ohio. In connection with Jonathan Dayton, Elias Boudinot, Dr. Clarkson, and other New Jerseymen, he purchased of Congress a large tract of land between the two Miami Rivers, containing nearly two hundred and fifty thousand acres,* and comprising the sites of the present cities of Cincinnati and Dayton. He established his own residence at the North Bend of the Ohio and laid out a city there, but Cincinnati, becoming a military post soon after, took the precedence in growth and became the great city. North Bend is chiefly noted as the place of residence of William Henry Harrison, afterwards President of the United States, who married Judge Symmes' daughter. Judge Symmes died in 1814, at the age of seventy-two.

Judge Symmes was born at River Head, L. I., July 21, 1742. He married, for his first wife, Anna Tutthill, daughter of Henry Tutthill, of Southold, L. I. From this marriage there were two daughters, Maria and Anna, the former of whom married Peyton Short, of Kentucky, and the latter William Henry Harrison. After the death of his first wife Judge Symmes married the "widow Halsey," who lived only a few years. His third wife was Susanna, daughter of Hon. Wil-

JUDGE TIMOTHY SYMMES, of Walpack, is thus spoken of by Mr. Edsall: 'Timothy Symmes, a brother of John C., was an active man in the Revolution, and a judge of our courts. He was the father of John Cleve Symmes, Jr., whose novel theory that the earth, like an eviscerated pumpkin, was hollow—that its interior was habitable, and that an orifice to enter this terrestrial ball would undoubtedly be found at the north pole—attracted great attention throughout the United States some thirty years ago, more especially as a very eloquent lawyer named Reynolds became a convert to Symmes' views and made addresses in support of their soundness in all our principal cities. Poor Symmes wearied out his existence in a vain effort to procure means for fitting an expedition to explore the inner portion of the shell of the earth; he gained, however, more kicks than coppers, and succeeded only in furnishing a theme for the wits of the land to exercise their waggery upon. 'Symmes' Hole' not only figured in newspapers, but grog-shops bore it upon their signs with various devices to illustrate it. One I recollect was the representation of a hollow watermelon, with a tiny mouse peeping out of the orifice at its polar extremity to see if Symmes' expedition had yet 'hove in view.'"

This noted theorist was born in Walpack, Sussex Co., and was named after his uncle, John Cleves Symmes, who adopted and educated him. His father kept one of the earliest hotels near the Delaware in Walpack. After he was appointed judge he came to Newton, and lived two doors above the court-house, in what was recently known as the "Drake house," burned in the summer of 1880.

JOE S. HALSTED.—The family of Halsted is supposed to be of German-Austrian descent, as the name was originally spelled "Halstadt." However this may be, the distinguished ancestor of the family in New Jersey was Sir William Halsted, of England, who was an admiral in the British navy and knighted for some valuable service. The crest is still in the possession of the family.

Timothy Halsted came to this country during the early history of the colonies, and at first settled on Long Island. A large tract of land was afterwards purchased by the family at Elizabethtown, N. J., upon which Caleb, son of Timothy Halsted, located; this he owned and cultivated.

Caleb Halsted's wife was Rebecca Ogden, who was an aunt of Robert Ogden, of Sussex County, and also of Col. Aaron Ogden, of Revolutionary fame.

To Caleb and Rebecca Halsted were born five sons and five daughters, of whom Dr. Robert Halsted was eldest. He was born at Elizabethtown, N. J., Sept. 13, 1746, and was graduated at Princeton College. He was a distinguished physician of that town, and a zealous and fearless citizen in the gloomy days of the contest with Great Britain, conspicuous for his exertions and sufferings in the cause of liberty, it having been his lot to endure the horrors of confinement on board the "Jersey Prison-Ship." On one occasion a notorious Tory informed against him, as a rebel and an aider and upholder of rebellion, and he was temporarily lodged in the old sugar-house, in Liberty Street, New York City. On another occasion he saved the life of Col. Aaron Ogden, who had been seriously wounded by the Hessians while out alone on a military reconnoissance. He was grave, and by some is spoken of as stern, yet he was by all admired and respected, and was a patriot at a time when the title bore a significant and an eloquent meaning. His younger brother, Caleb, was also an eminent physician, born Sept. 15, 1752. On July 15, 1825, while confined to his house on account of illness, he received a visit from Gen. Lafayette, and had the pleasant honor of entertaining that famous son of France.

Dr. Robert Halsted's first wife was Mary Wiley, whom he married April 15, 1773. She was born Dec. 17, 1750, and died May 4, 1785. The children born of this union were Job Stockton, Molly Tillinghast, Rebecca Ogden, William Wiley, and Robert Wiley. His second wife was Mary Mills, born Feb. 20, 1763, whom he married Oct. 1, 1787. The children born of this union were William Mills, Caleb Pierson, Matthias Ogden, Jacob Reading, and Hannah Mills.

Job Stockton, eldest son of Dr. Robert and Mary (Wiley) Halsted, was born in Elizabethtown, N. J., March 4, 1774. At the proper age he became a student in the law-office of Col. Aaron Ogden, a distinguished soldier and officer in the Revolutionary war, and prominent as a lawyer in New Jersey. He was admitted to the bar in 1795, and as counselor in 1798, and shortly after his admission he removed to Newton, N. J., where for nearly half a century he practiced his profession and performed the duties of a good citizen with exemplary faithfulness. Whatever trust was reposed in him was honorably fulfilled; whatever enterprise of public utility was started found in him an ardent advocate; whatever project of philanthropy needed the fostering aid of the Christian or the patriot was sure of receiving at his hands a liberal support. The circulation of the Scriptures and the cause of temperance were in his opinion of vital importance in effecting the moral and religious regeneration of society, and for the promotion of these objects he labored long and efficiently, and with a zeal that death alone could abate. He was emphatically a "gentleman of the old school." His principles were formed in the school of Washington, and he had for his preceptors the founders of our government.

His political rights he never failed to exercise. To vote was with him a duty, and to vote honestly and independently a matter of conscience. No consideration of self, no morbid ambition to attain the higher seats in the political synagogue, ever sullied his public conduct or cast a shade upon the purity of his patriotism.

In 1832, as a member of the National Committee, he cordially joined in nominating Henry Clay for the Presidency, and he remained to the last an earnest friend and advocate of the Statesman of the West. He died April 13, 1844.

His wife was Ann McIntire, who was born at Coleraine, near Londonderry, Ireland, March 7, 1782, came to Philadelphia with her widowed mother during the latter part of the century, and whom he married June 10, 1805. She died Sept. 28, 1838. The children born of this union who grew to manhood and womanhood are:

1. Robert Wiley, born May 21, 1806; graduated at Princeton; studied law with his father; attended law-lectures of Judge Gould, of Litchfield, Conn., and after his admission to the bar practiced law in Newton until his decease, Nov. 19, 1829.

2. James Maner, born May 5, 1808; was a prosperous merchant in New York City, and is in 1880 president of the American Fire Insurance Company of that city.

3. Job Stockton, born March 5, 1810; was a merchant at Charleston, S. C., for several years; was subsequently in business in Hong Kong, China; on account of ill health returned to Newton, where he died, Feb. 7, 1846.

4. Thomas McIntire, born May 21, 1811; studied law with his father, but in consequence of declining health never practiced his profession. He died Feb. 18, 1837.

5. William Mills, born Oct. 7, 1812; was a merchant in New York City until his death, which occurred Oct. 21, 1849.

6. Charles McIntire, born April 13, 1814; was during a part of his life engaged in mercantile pursuits, and died at Newton, May 12, 1853.

7. Mary McIntire, born Nov. 1, 1815; became the second wife of Judge Martin Ryerson, of Newton.

8. Jacob, born Aug. 10, 1817; was for many years a successful merchant in New York, and is in 1880 a resident of that city.

9. Ann Boggs, born Nov. 8, 1818; became the first wife of Judge Martin Ryerson, of Newton, and died April 22, 1855.

10. Matthias Ogden Halsted, born Nov. 16, 1822; was a merchant in New York City, and died March 30, 1855.

WILLIAM T. ANDERSON was a son of Thomas Anderson, who, "about the time the first court-house in Sussex County was completed, a young lawyer, came to Newton and settled there permanently, and proved himself a useful and patriotic citizen."* He (William T. Anderson) was born at Newton in the year 1777, spent his early youth at home, was graduated at Princeton College in 1796, and soon after commenced the study of the law. At the time of the threatened rupture with France he sought and obtained a commission as major in the provisional army of the United States, raised in 1798. In the year 1801 he was admitted to the practice of the law, and in the active duties of his profession he was ever afterwards profitably and honorably engaged. A character for uprightness, capability, and energy, early acquired, gave him a prominent position and forced him into very active participation in the affairs of his native county. He represented her in the "Council" at Trenton in 1821, was appointed surrogate in 1822, and for nineteen consecutive years was director of the board of chosen freeholders. The stockholders of the Sussex Bank chose him as a member of its first board of directors, and he occupied that position until his death,—a period of thirty-two years. His local contemporaries in his profession were Job S. Halsted, Daniel Haines, and Thomas C. Ryerson, while he was on terms of familiar social and professional intercourse with Samuel L. Southard, Theodore Frelinghuysen, Joseph C. Hornblower, Gabriel H. Ford, Jacob W. Miller, James S. Green, Peter D. Vroom, and William Pennington, most, if not all, of whom during the first third of the present century habitually attended the trial terms of the Sussex County courts. Maj. Anderson was at the time of his death, which took place at Newton on the 9th of February, 1850, one of the managers of the State Lunatic Asylum, at Trenton.

HON. MARTIN RYERSON, LL.D., late of Newton, in this county, was born, Sept. 15, 1815, at Hamburg, in this county, and was the eldest son of Judge Thomas C. Ryerson, of whom some account appears in this work. He received a first-class academical education, which enabled him to matriculate advantageously at Princeton College, from which institution he was graduated in the class of 1833, dividing the first honor with three others, and in the assignment of position received the Latin salutatory. He subsequently commenced reading law in his father's office, afterwards continuing his studies with Hon. Garret D. Wall, in Burlington, and concluding his course with the late ex-Governor Pennington at Newark. He was licensed as an attorney in November, 1836, and at once commenced the practice of his profession in the last-named city, continuing there till 1841, when he removed to Newton, where he afterwards resided, excepting for three years between 1853 and 1857, during which he lived at Trenton. He was made a counselor in 1839, and acquired distinction in his profession. He was a prominent member of the convention in 1844 which framed the present constitution of the State. In 1849 he was elected a member of the Assembly, when the late Chief Justice Whelpley was Speaker, and served upon the judiciary committee; it was mainly through his influence and instrumentality in that Legislature that the charter was obtained for the Farmers' Bank at Deekertown. Upon an increase of judges in the Supreme Court he was appointed one of the associate justices by Governor Price, and filled the position only three years, ill health compelling him to resign the bench in 1858. In 1873 he was appointed as one of the judges of the Alabama Claims Commission,—a position which he was compelled to resign in January, 1875, by reason of the complete failure of his health. He had likewise been selected by Governor Parker as one of the commissioners to revise the constitution, which he had assisted to frame in 1844, but was constrained to decline that position also from the same cause.

Judge Ryerson's political opinions were Democratic down to the period when the attempt was made to force slavery upon Kansas and Nebraska and the Democrats surrendered unconditionally to the slave power. At that time he sundered his connection with it and entered with all the enthusiasm of his nature into the work of organizing and building up the anti-slavery sentiment which finally crystallized in the Republican party organization. At the commencement of the recent civil war he was among the foremost supporters of every measure looking to the maintenance of the Union and the vindication of its authority. He was in constant correspondence with many of the most influential men in the country, and by his counsel and advice contributed much towards shaping the policy of the government during the critical periods of the war. His mind was well stored with useful information, and his retentive memory enabled him to draw upon it at will. He engaged actively in the political campaigns which occurred during and immediately after the war, and was mainly instrumental in the revolution in the old Fourth Congressional District when the Republicans triumphed for the first time. He threw himself with zeal and energy into that sharp conflict, and he also did yeoman's service for his party in all the succeeding elections, especially in those of 1868, 1870, and 1872. "He would without hesitation, at a moment's notice, summon a conference of leading politicians, from all parts of the State, at Newark or Paterson or New York, and opposition to his policy was generally in vain. His elan was irresistible and his enthusiasm contagious."

In religious belief, Mr. Ryerson was a Presbyterian, and had been for many years a leading member of the congregation in Newton, of which he had been a ruling elder for ten years, and was likewise frequently selected as a delegate to all the Presbyterian ecclesiastical bodies. He was also a strong advocate of the temperance cause, and was often called upon to attend conventions of that organization. He was a man of great force of character, looking with earnest care to all the details of every enterprise in which he was about to engage, and was the energetic and active leader in every local improvement in the town of his late residence. As a lawyer he occupied the front rank in his profession, and as a judge he was regarded, by those qualified to give an intelligent opinion, as one of the ablest and very best on the bench. He was a kind, considerate, cultivated, Christian gentleman, a scholar, a patriot, an invaluable citizen, and in all the elements of intellectual manhood an honor to his native county and State. In 1869 Princeton College, his Alma Mater, conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

Judge Ryerson was twice married, his wives being sisters, daughters of Job S. Halsted, late of Newton, in this county. He died June 11, 1875, leaving a widow and three children,—two daughters and a son.

HON. THOMAS C. RYERSON, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of this State, was the third son of Martin Ryerson and Rhoda Hull, born May 4, 1788, at Myrtle Grove, in this county, five miles northwest of Newton, the county-seat. He was a great-great-grandson of Martin Ryerson, of Huguenot descent, who emigrated from Holland before 1660 and settled on Long Island, marrying, in 1688, Annetyes Rappelye. From this marriage have sprung large numbers of the name of Ryerson (besides numerous descendants of the female branches of the family), who are scattered over New York, New Jersey, and several other of our States and Canada.

Judge Ryerson's grandfather resided in Hunterdon County, in this State, whence his father removed to Sussex about 1770, dying there in 1820, in his seventy-third year. His father and grandfather were both distinguished as surveyors, his father being deputy of the surveyor-generals of both East and West Jersey, and his father was thus enabled to make very judicious land locations for himself, and at his death left a landed estate even then worth between forty and fifty thousand dollars.

Until the age of sixteen Mr. Ryerson remained at home, working on his father's farm and receiving only the common education of the country. In 1801 his father removed to Hamburg, in this county, and in 1804 the son began to prepare for college. His preparatory studies were finished at the Mendham Academy, Mendham, Morris Co., then taught by Rev. Dorton Armstrong and the Hon. Samuel L. Southard, and in 1807 he entered the junior class at Princeton, graduating there in 1809 with the third honor in a class of forty-four. This school acquaintance with Mr. Southard ripened into an intimate and life-long friendship, and a very warm and enduring friendship grew up between him and the late Judge George K. Drake, who was graduated at Princeton in 1808.

After graduation Judge Ryerson studied law with the late Job S. Halsted, of Newton, and was admitted to the bar in February, 1814. Four years of study with a practicing lawyer were then required, even of graduates, and during part of this time he was out with the New Jersey militia at Sandy Hook to resist a threatened attack of the British. Immediately after being licensed he began practicing law at Hamburg, removing to Newton in April, 1820, where he resided till his death, Aug. 11, 1838, aged fifty years, three months, seven days.

In December, 1814, Mr. Ryerson married the fifth daughter of Robert Ogden, a lawyer residing at Sparta, in this county, elder brother of Col. Aaron Ogden and Col. Matthias Ogden, of Revolutionary memory, the Ogden name, like that of Ryerson, having for several generations been associated, in New Jersey, with the struggles for the rights of all men.

For two years (1825-27) Mr. Ryerson was a member of the Legislative Council of New Jersey, and in January, 1834, was elected by the joint meeting a justice of the Supreme Court, in place of Judge Drake, whose term then expired. Judge Drake had given great offense, but without good reason for it, to the Hicksite Quakers by his opinion in the celebrated suit between them and the Orthodox Quakers, for which they determined, if possible, to defeat his reelection. To accomplish this they aided, in 1833, in electing a large majority of Democrats to the Legislature, which the year before had a majority of the other party. Judge Drake was not a Democrat, yet Mr. Ryerson, with many other influential and leading Democrats in the State, were strongly opposed to the idea of his retirement from the bench, especially at such a juncture as this. To effect his reappointment Mr. Ryerson used all his influence with the four Democratic members from Sussex. He was not in Trenton at the time of the election, and so was not permitted the opportunity of preventing his name being used as an opposition to that of Judge Drake; and, as this use of his name was the only means by which the defeat of Judge Drake was accomplished, he was very loath to accept the office at the expense of so excellent and irreplaceable a judge, his own warm personal friend.

The news of his election was a complete surprise to Judge Ryerson, and with it came letters from prominent Democrats urging him to accept, and assuring him that his declination would not benefit Judge Drake; that party lines had been drawn, and he could not now, under any circumstances, be re-elected. He held the matter under advisement till the receipt of a letter from Judge Drake himself, dated Feb. 3, 1834, urging him to accept, "and that promptly." He said also, "I feel under obligation to you and my other friends for your zeal in my behalf; but it has proved ineffectual, and I have no confidence in the success of another effort." And again: "If the place is thrown open, nobody knows into whose hands it may go. I rejoice that it has been so disposed of that we may still confide in the independence and integrity of the bench." This letter decided him to accept, and he was sworn into office Feb. 25, 1834, holding it till his death, in August, 1838.

Judge Ryerson's course at the bar and on the bench fully justified the opinion of Judge Drake, quoted above, as in all positions he was a man of the firmest independence and strictest integrity. He was an able lawyer, well read, and was remarkable for a discriminating and sound judgment; an earnest and successful advocate, with great influence in our courts and juries in Sussex and Warren, to which counties he confined his practice, although following his own cases to the Supreme Court; and as a judge it is believed that he enjoyed in a high degree the esteem and confidence of the bench and bar, as well as of the people at large. For the last eight years of his life he was a very devoted member of the Presbyterian Church, his first wife having joined it some eight years earlier and dying three years before him. Early in 1838 he married a younger sister of his deceased wife.

Judge Ryerson was very easy and affable in his manners, delighting in social intercourse and conversation, with a great fund of anecdote, very simple and economical in his personal tastes and habits, expending, however, freely in educating his children, and noted for his liberality to the poor around him and to the benevolent operations of his day. So much did he give away that he left no more estate than he inherited, although in full practice for twenty years before his appointment as judge. He often said to his children that he desired only to leave them a good education and correct principles, and that they must expect to make their way in life with only these to depend upon. Both as lawyer and judge he was very painstaking and laborious, conscientiously faithful in the discharge of his duties to his clients and the public. Having a strongly nervous temperament, this mental strain was too great, and resulted at length in a softening of the brain, from which he died after an illness of three months, leaving three sons, a daughter, and a widow—his first wife's younger sister (as above stated)—to mourn an irreplaceable loss. Two of his children remain,—Thomas Ryerson, M.D., of Newton, in this county, and a daughter, who is the widow of Theodore F. Anderson. The youngest son, Col. Henry Ogden Ryerson, was killed in the war of the Rebellion, in May, 1864, at the head of his regiment, on the second day's bloody fighting in the battles of the Wilderness, in Virginia. The eldest, Judge Martin Ryerson, died June 11, 1875. The second son is Thomas Ryerson, A.M., M.D., who at this writing is a practicing physician and surgeon at Newton, and has been since August, 1845.

HON. DANIEL HAINES was born in the city of New York in the year 1801. His father, Elias Haines, was for many years a well-known and successful merchant in that city, and was noted as a man of upright and benevolent character. His ancestors were among the first settlers of Elizabethtown, where his grandfather, Stephen Haines, resided, and, with his sons, took a distinguished part in the war of the Revolution. They were surrounded in their dwelling one night by a strong force, which captured them and took them as prisoners to New York, where they were imprisoned in the "old sugar-house" and were for a long time, with others, great sufferers. The mother of Governor Haines was a daughter of Robert Ogden, of Sparta, and a sister of Governor Ogden.

HON. DANIEL HAINES.

Daniel Haines graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1820, having received his preparatory education under Rev. Dr. Edmund D. Barry, a celebrated teacher of New York, and at the academy in Elizabethtown. He studied law at Newton, Sussex Co., with Hon. Thomas C. Ryerson, was admitted as an attorney in 1823, as counselor in 1826, and as sergeant-at-law in 1837. In 1824 he settled as a lawyer in Hamburg, Sussex Co., where he continued to reside till his death, which event occurred Jan. 26, 1877. His practice as a lawyer, although never very large, soon became quite respectable. The year of his settlement at Hamburg proved auspicious for his entrance into political life, as it brought forward Gen. Jackson, whose cause was espoused by most of the leading politicians of the county, both Democrats and Federalists, as a candidate for the Presidency. Mr. Haines, although of Federalist descent, took an active part in promoting the success of Jackson, and secured for his candidate the entire vote of the township of Vernon, in which he resided. In 1839-40 he took an active part in what was known as the "Broad Seal War," he being that year a member of the Council. A series of resolutions had been passed by the Legislature of 1838-39, which were ordered addressed, not to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, but to "The Honorable Robert M. Hunter, representative of Virginia." Mr. Hunter, as Speaker of the House refused to receive them, justly regarding the address as insulting to that body over which he presided. This rejection excited the Whigs, and new resolutions were introduced into the Legislature in the session of 1839-40, denouncing in strong terms the action of the House of Representatives as equivalent to declaring New Jersey out of the Union and no longer entitled to a voice in the councils of the nation. "Amzi Armstrong, of Newark, and Jacob W. Miller, then members of the Council, were the leading advocates of the resolutions, and Mr. Haines bore the brunt of the contest in opposition. The Whigs, being at that time largely in the majority, carried their resolutions, but the efforts of Mr. Haines and his friends were not lost. The testimony taken in reference to the election which occasioned the difficulty established the fact that the Democratic members had received a clear majority of the votes, and their party grew stronger and stronger in the State, until, in 1843, it carried a majority of the Legislature. The debate in which Mr. Haines took so prominent a part served to make known his ability and to bring him forward as a leader. He served a second time in the Council, and then declined a renomination."*

In the fall of 1843 he was nominated by the Democrats for Governor, and was elected by the joint meeting. While in the executive office he sought to advance the cause of education, and gave his influence in favor of a new constitution. This last measure was adopted under his administration, in 1844. He was the last Governor under the old constitution, and might have been the first under the new had he not peremptorily declined the candidacy. In 1847, however, he was put in nomination by the Democrats, and was elected by a respectable majority. "In his inaugural address and in his message he reiterated his recommendations in favor of education by means of public and free schools. He strongly recommended a normal school for the education of teachers,—a measure which did not then obtain the favor of the Legislature, but which not long afterwards was adopted, and has proved of great public benefit."† During his first term as chancellor ex-officio he delivered several carefully prepared opinions, which will be found 3 Green's Chancery Reports.

At the expiration of his second term he resumed the practice of his profession, and was occupied in it till November, 1852, when, having been nominated as a justice of the Supreme Court and confirmed by the Senate, he took his seat on the bench, and, being re-appointed, held the office fourteen years.

As a judge he was remarkably impartial, always seeking to do justice, and he rarely failed to ascertain and give preponderance to the merits of a cause; by his courteous deportment as well as by his sound judgment he merited and received the confidence and respect of suitors and their advocates. "Few judges were ever freer from the influences of passion or prejudice. For several years he presided in the Newark circuit, the most important and difficult, perhaps, in the State, and left it greatly respected by the bar, who expressed their feelings by a strong testimonial of regard.

Governor Haines was carefully educated as a Presbyterian, and was for many years a ruling elder of the Church. He was prominent as a member of the General Assembly, of the Bible society, the Sunday-school, and interested in other religious and benevolent projects, which always engaged his hearty and earnest attention. In 1845 he was appointed one of the commissioners to select a site for the State Lunatic Asylum, and was a member of the first board of managers of that institution. In 1868 he was appointed by joint ballot of the Legislature "to examine the existing system of the State prison of this State and similar institutions of other States, and to report an improved plan for the government and discipline of the prison." In October, 1870, he was one of the commissioners appointed by Governor Randolph to the National Prison Reform Congress held at Cincinnati, and by that body was appointed one of the committee charged with the duty of organizing a national prison reform association and an international congress on prison discipline and reform, to be held in the city of London in 1872. In the organization of the National Prison Reform Association he was made one of the corporators and a vice-president. For many years he was one of the board of trustees of Princeton College.

Governor Haines was twice married. His children were Rev. Alanson A. Haines, of Hamburg; Capt. Thomas Ryerson Haines, killed in the late war; and one daughter, who married Professor Guyot, of Princeton College.

JUDGE JOHN LINN was a native of Hardwick township, and was of Irish descent. The early part of his life was spent on the farm where he was born until his removal with his family to Hardyston township, where he passed the remainder of his days. In 1805 he was appointed judge of the Common Pleas, and reappointed in 1810, 1815, and 1820. He married the daughter of the senior Richard Hunt, of Hardwick. Judge Linn possessed a strong mind and sound judgment; he was endowed with talents above mediocrity, and exerted more than ordinary influence in the community. He represented the Fourth District of New Jersey in Congress two terms with honor to himself and satisfaction to his constituents, and while in Congress, in the winter of 1823, he was taken ill and died of typhoid fever. His remains were shortly after sent for and brought home to his family. He was an exemplary man and an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Hardyston.

JUDGE JOHN TOWNSEND was a native of Sussex County, having been born in Vernon township, in the year 1815. His early life was spent in rural pursuits, and upon reaching his majority he purchased a rough farm in Warren County and there settled. A few years later he sold it, much improved, and removed to Newton, where his public life began; this was in 1843. Although he had enjoyed but limited scholastic advantages, he possessed naturally strong administrative abilities, a powerful will, and a peculiar faculty for influencing others. Politics—at that time the absorbing question in the county—engaged his ardent and active nature; and yet his ambition never ran in the direction of official honors and preferment. The influential position he sustained in the dominant party of the county and State placed such honors within his reach, but he declined them all, with one exception—that of the appointment of judge of the Common Pleas in 1864, which station he filled with usefulness to the public and with credit to himself until 1868, when declining health impelled him to resign it. He died in 1868, in his fifty-third year. He brought to the bench a singularly lucid and legal mind, and his deportment as a judge was marked with courtesy, dignity, candor, and the strictest integrity.

COL. ROBERT HAMILTON was an attorney and counselor of more than ordinary abilities. He was born Dec. 9, 1809, and was a son of Hon. Benjamin Hamilton, of Hamburg, for several years a member of the Council from this county. He was admitted to the Sussex bar in February, 1836, and in due course was advanced to the rank of counselor, serving three terms as prosecutor of the pleas. As a lawyer he was very shrewd and skillful in the management of causes, an able advocate, and a forcible and eloquent speaker, having a voice remarkable for its peculiar sharpness and penetration. During the time of his practice at this bar he was engaged in most of the important litigations of the county, and did a large business in the Supreme Court at Trenton, in the Circuit Courts, Court of Chancery, Court of Last Resort, and Court of Errors and Appeals. He was very successful in business, amassing a handsome fortune.

It has been the privilege of few to enjoy a larger share of the confidence and respect of the community in which they have lived,—of none to sustain a more enviable reputation in his profession. He received a substantial common-school and academic education, and came to Newton in 1831, after the appointment of Col. J. E. Edsall as county clerk, and assisted in that office for about ten years. At that time he commenced the study of law with Maj. William T. Anderson. He was for several years a chosen freeholder from Newton, and was regularly selected by the board as its director. For his ability he was prominently mentioned for judge of the Supreme Court at the time of the reappointment of Judge Dalrymple. He was elected to the Assembly in 1862, and re-elected the following term. During the session of 1863-64, upon the death of the Speaker, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Hamilton was elected as his successor.

At the announcement of his death the Assembly unanimously passed resolutions of respect. He was the member of Congress from the Fourth District from 1873 to 1877, and held important positions. At the organization of the Merchants' National Bank in 1865, and of the Newton Library Association in 1868, he was in each institution chosen as a director and also selected as president, both of which positions he held at the time of his death. In the church, Mr. Hamilton was an Episcopalian, and represented Christ Church of Newton in the Convention of the Diocese of New Jersey in 1837, and was a delegate almost continuously from that date for over forty years. In that church he was a member of the vestry from 1839, and warden from 1848. He was baptized and confirmed in 1845, and was a communicant for nearly thirty-three years. He was extremely liberal in his gifts for the support of the church, and in its management was continually looked to for judicious advice, which was always cheerfully given and respected. It is a pleasure to say that he was always their counselor, but never their dictator. It is unnecessary in this brief sketch to eulogize his professional attainments or to weave in history the brilliant traits in his character in private life. The esteem in which he was held has been well shown by the many positions of trust and confidence reposed in him. From the commencement of his professional career he enjoyed a large and lucrative practice.

It only remains to record briefly a statement of his decline and death. During the long session of Congress in 1875, Col. Hamilton contracted malarial fever at Washington; he partially recovered, but was seized with another attack during the next session, from the effects of which he never rallied. He was stricken with paralysis on Oct. 29, 1877, after which he was unable to speak but few words, or to otherwise communicate his thoughts. He died March 14, 1878, leaving a widow and only daughter. Daughter, son-in-law, relatives, rector, physicians, many kind friends and watchful nurses, constantly attended and tried to minister to his relief and comfort, notwithstanding which he gradually declined until his death, and left many vacancies to be regretted and mourned by loved ones and by a sympathizing community.

ALPHEUS GUSTIN was a lawyer of good character and fine legal abilities, having been prepared for the bar at the law school in Connecticut. He was a son of John Gustin, and was born in Augusta, Frankford township, Sussex Co., where he began practice in 1820 and resided till the time of his death. In the preparation of his cases he was remarkably orderly and systematic. He was prosecutor of the pleas for Sussex County from 1830 to 1835. Mr. Gustin's surviving widow (third wife) now resides in the village of Newton; also his daughter by his second wife, Mrs. John J. Edwards, and daughter Miss Anna J. Gustin. He died on the 13th of June, 1862.

WHITFIELD S. JOHNSON practiced law in Newton for many years subsequent to his admission as an attorney, in May, 1828. He was a lawyer of good reputation and a citizen of strict integrity. For five years he was prosecutor of the pleas for Sussex County; was for twenty-one years secretary and treasurer of the Sussex Mutual Insurance Company, and also served as Secretary of State from 1861 to 1866.

DANIEL S. ANDERSON was born in Newton, Nov. 1, 1819. He is a son of Thomas Oakley Anderson, an officer in the United States navy, who was with Com. Decatur at the sacking of Tripoli. Daniel S. studied law with his uncle, William T. Anderson, and was admitted as an attorney in September, 1841, when he began practice at Newton. In 1848 he was elected surrogate of the county, and was twice re-elected, holding the office till 1863,—a period of about fifteen years. He then resumed the practice of his profession, in which he continued till 1871, when he was appointed president judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Sussex County, under the act of April of that year, and held the position till April, 1876.

Judge Anderson has discharged the duties of his several offices well, and is highly respected both in his profession and as a citizen. He was for a number of years the law-partner of Hon. Thomas N. McCarter. At one time he did a large business as executor and administrator, his experience as surrogate having given him great familiarity with the laws and rules relating to Orphans' Courts. All his transactions commanded the entire confidence of the people. He was at one time a director in the old Sussex Bank, and its attorney. By a too generous desire to befriend others he became security for certain parties, involving, we are told, the loss of his property, amounting to fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. Judge Anderson still resides in Newton, and is a member of the Sussex bar, though the infirmities of age disqualify him for active practice.

CYRUS S. LEPORT was admitted to the bar in 1838, and began practice at Stanhope, Sussex Co., where he remained several years and then removed to Wisconsin. In 1864, or about that time, he returned to Stanhope, and was for some time prosecutor of the pleas of Sussex County. He was a son of John Leport, a farmer of Byram township, where he was born. His son, William T. Leport, is a practicing lawyer in Dover, Morris Co., N. J.

COL. SAMUEL FOWLER was regularly admitted to the Sussex bar, although he never practiced the profession of the law. He was in some respects the most remarkable man that Sussex County ever produced, and inherited much of his native ability from his father, Dr. Samuel Fowler, of Franklin.

Col. Samuel Fowler—or "Col. Sam," as he was familiarly called—was born at Franklin, and was brought up amidst these mining ideas and interests. He became possessed of the same strong predilection for minerals which characterized his father. At his father's death he inherited the mines and furnace at Franklin, made the discovery of zinc white,—now so well known to the chemist and the artisan,—carried on the mines and furnaces, organized companies, procured charters for them, and handled mining stocks for many years, often, it is said, making as high as eighty thousand dollars in a single operation. He was engaged as a broker in the city of New York, and made money very rapidly there. Retiring from that business, he went to Port Jervis, and did more than any other man towards the building up of that place. While there he was the Democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor of the State of New York.

Genl. Thompson

Col. Fowler was a man of most decided ability, great power of will, and force of character. "At times," says a gentleman who remembers him well, "he was the most eloquent speaker I ever heard. He had a burning eloquence, great personal magnetism, and I have seen him in some of his bursts of eloquence cause a whole audience, instantaneously and all at once, to spring to their feet as if he had every man by the collar. At other times I have heard him make dry and rather tedious speeches, but they were always sound and thoughtful."

HENRY O. FOWLER was a son of Dr. Samuel Fowler, and youngest brother of Col. Samuel. He was born at Franklin, where he continued to reside, and, although educated for and admitted to the profession of the law, like his brother, he never practiced.

GEORGE M. RYERSON, although admitted in 1841, never practiced the profession of the law. He is a surveyor and farmer by occupation, and was at one time engaged as a hardware-merchant and a druggist. He is a son of David Ryerson, and was born in Newton.

BENJAMIN HAMILTON, JR., son of Gen. Benjamin Hamilton, and brother of Col. Robert Hamilton; born at Hamburg, Sussex Co.; studied law with his brother, Col. Robert Hamilton, and was admitted in February, 1845. He practiced law at Hamburg, evincing good abilities in the profession, and sustaining a good character. He was a member of the Assembly in 1852 and 1853, and died while a member during the latter year, in young manhood.

JOHN LINN, son of Andrew Linn, was born at Harmonyvale, in Hardyston township, Sussex Co.; was admitted as an attorney November, 1841, and as a counselor October, 1848; went to Wisconsin soon after his admission, where he remained till 1850, when he returned and settled as a lawyer at Newton. He remained in practice here till 1867, when he opened a law-office in the city of New York, where he remained two or three years, and then settled in Jersey City, where he is still in the practice of his profession.

Mr. Linn was for many years one of the leading members of the Sussex bar, being well up in his profession, a good speaker, and an able advocate and attorney; he is also a sound and safe counselor. A member of the present bar says, "Mr. Linn stood very high while he lived in Newton, both as a lawyer and a man. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, a man of very dignified appearance and manners, and at one time was one of the 'Riparian Commissioners of the State of New Jersey.' He was a candidate for member of Congress from the Fourth District against Andrew J. Rogers in 1862. While here he was engaged in most of the important litigations of Sussex and had a good practice in the higher courts; and he has a good practice where he now lives. He was engaged to some extent in mining interests while in Sussex County, and is still interested in that business, having possession of the 'Williams Mine', near Canisteer, N. J." He built the large brick dwelling-house in Newton, on Liberty Street, and lived there till he removed to New York, in 1867. The residence is still owned by him. Mr. Linn is a hard student and well versed in the ground principles of the law.

ROBERT T. SHINER, son of Amos Shiner, of Green township, and brother of ex-sheriff Andrew Shiner; studied law with David Thompson, Esq., and was admitted to the Sussex bar in February, 1845. He practiced law in Newton, and acted, chiefly in the capacity of a clerk, first in the office of Mr. Linn, and afterwards in that of Thomas Kays, where he remained till the time of his death. Meantime, he served five years as justice of the peace.

HON. THOMAS N. McCARTER, now of Newark, was a prominent member of the Sussex bar from 1849 till his removal to his present residence and place of business, in 1867. He is a son of Robert H. McCarter, who was for many years a prominent citizen and merchant of Sussex County, residing at Newton. The elder McCarter came here from Morris County, where he had been clerk of the courts, and while living here was judge of the Common Pleas and of the Court of Errors and Appeals, holding the latter office at the time of his death, in 1851.

Thomas N. McCarter was born in Elizabeth, N. J., in 1823; graduated at Princeton College; studied law and was admitted as an attorney in October, 1845, and as a counselor in January, 1849. By his ability, self-reliance, and thorough knowledge of the law he attained to a leading position at the Sussex bar during his residence at Newton, and now stands among the prominent lawyers of the State. He was a member of the Legislature from this county in 1861. He married the second daughter of ex-Sheriff Ezra C. Hagerly, of Sussex County, and has three sons and three daughters. One of his sons, a graduate of Princeton, is a law-student with him, and another is in Princeton College.

DAVID THOMPSON.—The progenitor of the Thompson family from whom the subject of this sketch traces his descent was Aaron Thompson, who, with his younger brothers, Moses and Hur, emigrated from Scotland to America in the year 1686. The youngest of these, Hur, settled in New England, Aaron and Moses settled in Elizabethtown, N. J., and their descendants are found at "Connecticut Farms" (Union), "Battle Hill" (now Madison), and Mendham, N. J.

Joseph, youngest son of Aaron Thompson, removed from "Connecticut Farms" to Mendham in 1739. He died in July, 1749. His wife, Lydia, died March 24, 1749. The same year with the death of the parents five of their nine children also died, of a prevailing epidemic called the "long fever."

David, youngest of these children, was born Oct. 4, 1737, and died Dec. 28, 1824. His first wife was Rachel Bonnel (born Oct. 15, 1737; died March 27, 1766), who bore him two sons and two daughters. His second wife was Hannah Cary, whom he married Aug. 11, 1766. She was born April 26, 1747, and died Nov. 19, 1831. Of this union were born six sons and five daughters.

David Thompson was a man of great energy and strong force of character. He was one of the founders of the Presbyterian Church at Mendham, and retained the office of elder most of his life. During the war of the Revolution he commanded a company of minute-men, and at the time the American army was encamped at Morristown, when despair of success and extreme poverty weighed heavily upon the forces, his house became the welcome home of multitudes of famishing soldiers, and his hospitality was limited only by his means of supply. He was a man of good influence in society, and, being well read in Bible truths, his desires were never gratified until all who came in contact with him had received wholesome impressions of a better life from his teachings.

Familiarly known as "Captain," and as often, "Judge,"—which latter title he obtained from being on the bench of the Court of Common Pleas,—he was always the favored guest among both the old and the young, and his retentive memory, quaint sayings, and ready wit, often accompanied with sarcasm, made his companionship agreeable and his narratives and stories of "olden time" instructive. He was a man of keen perceptive faculties and bright intellect, and not only was he a close student of the best authors and the current topics of his time, but he sought to give his children the best opportunities then afforded for an education.

One of his sons, David Thompson, Jr., was graduated at Princeton College in the class of 1804, was surrogate of Morris Co., N. J., for many years, was prominent and influential in local and national politics, and for ten years retained the Speakership in the lower branch of the New Jersey Legislature. He was an intimate friend of the late Samuel L. Southard, and while that gentleman held high places in the State and nation Mr. Thompson's counsel was often sought. He died in 1831, at the age of forty-nine.

Another son of David Thompson was Stephen, father of our subject, who was born Jan. 16, 1775, in Mendham, on the old homestead purchased by his grandfather, Joseph, in 1740. He succeeded to the home property upon his father's decease, resided upon it during his life, and died in June, 1858. He lived a quiet life as a farmer and was not solicitous of publicity, although he was elected to and served one term in the State Legislature. He was a man of good business ability, and was esteemed for his integrity in all his business relations. Like his father before him he was a very devoted Christian man, was elder of the same church for many years, and reared his children under the strictest family discipline of the old Puritan style. His wife was Susanna, a daughter of George and Mary (Boyd) Harris, whom he married Aug. 12, 1802. She was born May 15, 1776, and died in 1841. Her grandfather, William Harris, came from Ireland in 1742, settled in Philadelphia, and belonged to the family who founded Harrisburg, Pa.

The children of Stephen and Susanna Thompson are four sons and one daughter. George, Nancy, and Robert reside on the old homestead in Mendham; Alexander died in 1834, in Charleston, S. C., at the age of nineteen; David was born Oct. 26, 1808, in Mendham. While very young he evinced rare ability as a student, and at the age of eleven was found reading Virgil. He was prepared for college under the tutelage of the late Samuel H. Cox, then a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church at Mendham and at Bloomfield, N. J., and entered the junior class at Princeton in the year 1823 at the age of fifteen, from which he was graduated with the usual honors in 1825. Among his most noted classmates were William L. Dayton and A. O. Zabriskie. For four years following his graduation he was a classical teacher in the academy at Mendham. In 1830 he entered the law-office of Jacob W. Miller, of Morristown, N. J., where he remained one year, and then came to Newton, N. J., and for two years was a law-student in the office of the late Judge Thomas C. Ryerson. He was admitted to the bar as an attorney at the November term in 1833, and at the November term in 1836 he was admitted as counselor.

In the winter following his admission to the bar as an attorney Mr. Thompson opened a law-office in Newton, and has remained in continuous practice until the present time (1880), a period of forty-seven years. In November, 1838, he was appointed surrogate of Sussex County, and held the office for five years. Outside of the duties of his profession, he has been interested in the various worthy local enterprises of the village and county of his adoption, and in an unostentatious way has sought to fulfill all obligations incumbent upon him as a citizen. Since 1844 he has been interested in the Sussex Bank as a director, was for many years its vice-president, and upon the resignation of the late David Ryerson he was elected president of the bank,—now the Sussex National,—which position he now holds.

In politics Mr. Thompson was formerly a Whig, and since the organization of the Republican party he has been a supporter of its principles. Of a naturally retiring disposition, he has never been solicitous of political place or the emoluments of office, but has preferred rather the quiet duties of his profession and business pursuits. His judicious and safe counsel as a lawyer, his sterling honesty and financial ability in business, his moral and Christian influence as a citizen and a member of the Presbyterian Church of Newton, have won the confidence and esteem of all who know him.

His wife was Susanna, daughter of Joseph and Susanna (Anthony) Dederer, whom he married Nov. 11, 1835. She was born Nov. 10, 1815, was a woman of real moral worth and Christian excellence, and died May 28, 1879. Their children were Alexander, died at the age of eight years; Juliana, wife of David R. Hull, of Newton; Susanna Dederer; William Armstrong, a graduate of the Troy Polytechnic Institute in the class of 1868; and Charles Dederer, a graduate of Princeton in the class of 1874, admitted as attorney in 1877, as counselor in 1880, and the law-partner of his father at Newton.

LEVI SHEPHERD. — Deacon Nathan Shepherd, father of Levi, resided in the township of Frankford, and was a farmer by occupation. He was a man of good influences, and one of the pillars of the First Presbyterian Church of Wantage. During his early manhood he commanded a company of militia and was known as Capt. Shepherd. His wife was Miss Ayers, who bore him the following children: Jesse, Moses, Morris, Nathan, Levi, Harriet (who became the wife of Nathaniel Roe, of Frankford), Melitable (who became the wife of George Kymer, of Frankford), and Susan (wife of — Baker, who resided near Cayuga Lake, N. Y.). After his family had grown up Deacon Shepherd removed to Bradford Co., Pa., where he died.

Levi Shepherd was born in Frankford township, Sussex Co., Oct. 28, 1813. In his early life he had but few of the educational advantages which are enjoyed by young men of the present day. His limited knowledge was acquired at the common school and at the academy at Branchville, under the instruction of the well-known teacher Willard Barrows. For some two years prior to his entering the academy he was a clerk in the store of Haines & Broderick, of Hamburg. About the year 1833 he began studying law with Hon. Daniel Haines, afterwards Governor of New Jersey, at Hamburg, where he remained until he was admitted to the bar, in 1839; in his class at that time were Chief Justice Whelpley and Gen. E. R. V. Wright. He commenced practice at Deckertown immediately thereafter. While there, on Jan. 17, 1852, he married Nancy, youngest daughter of Samuel and Nancy Decker, of that place. She was a sister of ex-Sheriff Peter S. Decker, and a descendant of Peter Decker, who built the first house, and settled in Wantage in 1734, from whom Deckertown took its name.* She was born April 2, 1826, and died April 2, 1858. The children of this union are Kittie, wife of Ira C. Moore, of Newton; Frank, a graduate of Princeton in the class of '77, and now a member of the law-firm of Roe & Shepherd, of Newton, N. J.; and Nancy.

In September, 1842, Mr. Shepherd was admitted as counselor,—the only other person in his class being Cortlandt Parker, Esq., now of Newark, N. J. In 1845 he went to Milwaukee, Wis., where he practiced law for a short time in partnership with John Linn, when he again returned to Deckertown, where he remained in uninterrupted practice until 1864. In 1849 he took an active and prominent part in securing the charter of the Farmers' Bank of Wantage, and upon its organization was elected one of its board of directors, a position which he held until his removal from that township.

In the spring of 1864 he came to Newton and again entered into a law partnership with John Linn, maintaining it for about two years, when he withdrew from the firm and continued the practice alone until his death, which occurred Aug. 11, 1875.

In May, 1869, he was elected county collector,—a position which he held for six years. He was chosen a director in the Sussex National Bank, in the place of George D. Turner, resigned, and soon after was made its vice-president, in the place of David Thompson, who was promoted to the presidency of that institution. In this as in all his other official positions his sound judgment, unflinching integrity, and correct business qualities were of great value and gave him high standing.

"A man of more than ordinary judgment and of great purity of character, he possessed the very soul of honor, as all those who came in contact with him can attest. In a public business life in his profession of nearly forty years—in which he transacted business with thousands of persons and held important trusts, the labor and care of which wore out his physical energies—we have yet to hear for the first time that he ever betrayed the confidence reposed in him or did one mean or dishonorable act. His nature was above meanness, and no man regarded sham pretense and dishonesty in others with greater indignation than he.

"Those old fashions of rectitude which he inherited from his father and the good men of his time were never laid aside for a moment, but were made the governing principle of his life. He was very guarded in his intimacy with others, but when he once formed an attachment it was as lasting as life itself. His motto was, 'Stand by old friends;' and he had hosts of them who would stand close by him in all emergencies.

"Few men in the county had greater influence than he, and his power over others was not acquired by craft or intrigue, but by his known good judgment and sterling and unyielding honesty. The secret of his popularity was in the fact that the people had faith in him; and those who trusted him were never deceived.

"As a citizen he was public-spirited and enterprising almost beyond his means. All projects for the benefit of the community and to promote the best interests of society in which he lived found in him a willing and liberal supporter."

In his profession he was not a man who would be termed a brilliant advocate, but his talents were more fully developed as a counselor; and his opinions were generally safe, judicious, and given with strict integrity and on the side of justice and of right.

SIMEON M. COYKENDALL.—Moses Coykendall, grandfather of Simeon M., was born Dec. 11, 1767, and was one of the early settlers of Wantage township. The wife of Moses Coykendall was Hannah, daughter of Samuel Decker, born May 9, 1771, also representing a pioneer family of Wantage. The issues of the marriage were Henry, born Oct. 11, 1789; Samuel D., father of our subject; Elijah, born Sept. 17, 1793; Susannah, born Aug. 6, 1795; Mary, born June 16, 1799; Jonathan, born Oct. 14, 1802; Sarah, born April 6, 1805; Margaret, born Aug. 23, 1807; Julia, born Nov. 28, 1809; Madson, born June 8, 1812; Harrison, born May 26, 1815.

Samuel D. Coykendall was born Sept. 8, 1791, and married, on June 29, 1822, Huldah, daughter of Samuel Adams, born March 31, 1804. Her mother was Mary Cuddeback, and her grandparents James and Mary (Westbrook) Cuddeback. Of the union were born three children,—namely, Ellis M., April 15, 1823; Simeon M., our subject; and Adams D., July 5, 1831. Samuel D. Coykendall died Sept. 12, 1837.

Simeon M. Coykendall was born in Wantage township, on Nov. 29, 1824. His early life was passed upon his father's farm, and his education was obtained at the district school of his neighborhood and at the excellent academies of Messrs. Rankin and Stiles, of Deckertown. At the age of sixteen, owing to a change of circumstances, he was thrown upon his own resources, and thus early entered upon a life of self-discipline, labor, and toil. He commenced by securing employment on a farm, and after a while engaged in school-teaching in his neighborhood,—an occupation that he continued for a number of years. In the year 1847 he commenced the study of law in the office of Levi Shepherd, Esq., of Deckertown, and after three years entered that of Hon. Daniel Haines, where he continued one year, being regularly admitted to practice by the Supreme Court at Trenton on April 3, 1851. He located in the exercise of his professional duties at Unionville, N. Y., where he established a business for himself, and for fourteen years enjoyed an excellent practice, occupying a prominent and an influential place in the community. On April 19, 1865, he removed to Deckertown, where he continued to practice until his death, on March 12, 1872.

Mr. Coykendall may be said to have passed away just at the time when he was becoming best known, and when he had reached a prominent and influential position among his fellows. One of his chief characteristics was great energy, industry, and perseverance, coupled with the most exact method and system. Everything he touched received careful and analytical treatment and was thoroughly digested before it was passed by. As a lawyer he was careful, systematic, and painstaking, and his advice and judgment were ever to be relied on. As a man he was liberal, generous, and public-spirited, and universally respected for integrity and uprightness of character. He took an active interest in all local affairs, was town superintendent of schools in 1850, one of the directors of the Farmers' National Bank of Deckertown, and was especially interested in the project of bringing the Midland Railroad to Deckertown, contributing fifteen hundred dollars to that end, besides devoting his time and using his influence towards the accomplishment of the purpose. In politics he was a Democrat, but no seeker after position. He was a warm supporter of the Union cause in the late war, and did yeoman service in gathering recruits and perfecting the muster-rolls of the town of Minisink, Orange Co., during the struggle. Early in life he was imbued with strong religious convictions, which throughout his days exerted a controlling influence over him. He possessed a singularly deep devotional nature, and in all his transactions was guided by the moral and religious precepts of the Man of Nazareth. The commission of a dishonest or dishonorable act seemed impossible with him, and in his private life he was one of the purest of men. He was a member and trustee of the Presbyterian Church of Unionville for a number of years, and took an active interest in all of its affairs.

Mr. Coykendall was married on Oct. 27, 1858, to Frances, daughter of John and Mary (Wilson) Fuller, of Deckertown, who survives him.

HON. MANNING M. KNAPP, son of William Knapp, of Newton; born in that village; studied law with Col. Robert Hamilton, and was admitted as an attorney in July, 1846, and as a counselor in January, 1850. Shortly after his admission Mr. Knapp removed to Hackensack, N. J., and opened a law-office, where he has remained ever since. For many years he was a leading lawyer of Bergen County, possessing fine abilities, varied information, and excellent character. He is now one of the justices of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, having been appointed to that office by Governor Bedle in 1875.

COL. HENRY OGDEN RYERSON, the youngest son of Judge Thomas C. Ryerson, was born at Newton, in this county, Jan. 10, 1826. On the mother's as well as the father's side he was descended from patriotic stock. His father's family had their representatives in the Revolutionary army, among both the combatants and the non-combatants. His father, as seen elsewhere, did his tour of duty in the militia in the war of 1812, and the records of the State Historical Society sufficiently show the part taken by his mother's family in the war of the Revolution, her father and uncles being field- or staff-officers in the Continental army, and her grandfather one of the New Jersey Committee of Safety. Her uncle Aaron Ogden was aide to Lafayette and a trusted agent of Washington in connection with the affair of André and Arnold.

"Hubert Kendall"

Col. Ryerson, declining a collegiate course, passed from the grammar-school directly to the study of the law, and was licensed in 1847. From that time until 1855 he lived an unsettled life in Chicago, California, and the Sandwich Islands. After returning to New Jersey and taking his counselor's license, he lived in Belvidere until 1857, when he returned to his native town, where, at the breaking out of the Rebellion, he held the office of public prosecutor. While engaged in taking depositions in chancery at Jersey City he saw the first call for volunteers, returned home, and, baggage in hand, walked directly to the recruiting-office and volunteered as a private. Elected captain by his comrades, he led them to the field as Company B of the gallant Second Regiment of New Jersey. As an officer of this regiment—captain, and afterwards major—Ryerson had high reputation for soldierly bearing, tactical skill, and high discipline. His enthusiasm led him to practice the bugle-calls of the skirmish-line, and when assigned to command in brigade drill he was always ready and accurate.

At the battle of Gaines' Mill, June 27, 1862, six companies of the Second Regiment, under Col. Tucker and Maj. Ryerson (promoted to that vacancy in his regiment just before leaving Alexandria), were sent in to relieve a whole regiment. So rapid and effective was their fire that they kept an entire brigade at bay until our line had fallen back on both sides of them. Exposed to a double cross-fire, and the gallant Tucker mortally wounded, the regiment began a hasty retreat. Maj. Ryerson seized the standard, and was rallying the battalion when he fell, shot through both thighs and bleeding so profusely as he was carried away that his attendants reported him mortally wounded in the abdomen, and left him on the field. There he remained ten days, three of them without food. Water, however, was abundant in the swamp. That ten days' exposure and three weeks (before his exchange) in a Richmond prison gave him a fever, which aggravated his wounds and kept him away from his regiment until the 1st of October. With one wound still open, he rejoined his regiment as lieutenant-colonel, hurried to the field by the record of his comrades at Crampton's Gap. Just as the army began to move towards Manassas he was placed by Gen. Torbert over the Twenty-third Regiment of nine months' men, and received a regular commission as colonel. With this regiment he participated in the first battle of Fredericksburg, where they were for a short time under heavy fire and suffered severely.

In March, 1863, some three months before the Twenty-third was mustered out, Col. Ryerson was transferred to the Tenth, which regiment did most important service both before and after his taking command. At Suffolk, against Long-street, after Col. Ryerson took command, this regiment did most excellent fighting. With his command Col. Ryerson was sent to Philadelphia to suppress the threatened riots during the draft, and afterwards to Pottsville and Mauch Chunk to suppress the virtual hostilities in our rear. Here Col. Ryerson was effective in performing excellent and important service, sitting as president of a commission to try those engaged in these most dangerous riotous proceedings. While at Suffolk, Col. Ryerson performed (for a part of the time) brigadier's duty, and in that capacity received Gen. Peck's written compliments for his vigilance, knowledge of the strategic character of the country, etc.

At his urgent request the Tenth was assigned to the First New Jersey Brigade, in the Army of the Potomac, in the spring of 1864, when it participated in all the battles of the Wilderness. It was on the 6th of May, during these battles, that Col. Ryerson fell, being struck in the head by a ball from a sharpshooter, who had taken the corps badge upon his cap as a mark. He was carried to a log cabin in the rear, where two of his captains, with Capt. Cooke, adjutant-general of the brigade, waited by him through the night, unable to get surgical assistance, and expecting his speedy death and the sad duty of burying him. During the night our line fell back, and early in the morning the whole party were taken prisoners. Col. Ryerson was left at Locust Grove Confederate hospital, where he died on the 12th, attended by a paroled Vermont surgeon, who marked his grave and so described it that at the close of the war his remains were found and reinterred in the cemetery at Newton.

Col. Ryerson was said to be conspicuous for courage, showing it often to the admiration of his fellow-soldiers. He never was conscious of personal danger, but of his men he was scrupulously careful in action and in camp, because he was responsible for their welfare both to his superiors and to the country's cause. A strict disciplinarian also, he was yet beloved because impartial to both officers and men. Along with the other officers of our army, he showed his conviction of the righteousness of our cause by the assistance furnished for religious instruction both in the camp and on the march. It was known, by the voluntary assurance of President Lincoln to his brother, Dr. Ryerson, that had he lived, he would have been promoted at an early day; but, falling, he received, as was believed, higher than earthly promotion from the Captain over all, under whose banner he had long been enlisted.

THOMAS KAYS, lawyer, of Newton, is the son of the late Thomas and Mary (Bale) Kays, and was born Oct. 15, 1825, at La Fayette, Sussex Co., N. J. He is of Scotch, German, and English descent, and his ancestors, paternal and maternal, were among the early settlers of his native county. His paternal grandfather, John Kays, was a Scotchman, born April 22, 1739, in Edinburgh, Scotland, and came to this country in 1760 and married Sarah, one of the thirteen children of the late Benjamin and Anna (Duer) Hull. He located in Frankford township, near Moden, and resided there in the occupation of a farmer until his death, in 1829, at the advanced age of ninety years.

Benjamin Hull was of English extraction, and settled in that section of the Delaware Valley above Flatbrookville as early as 1750. Mr. Kay's mother, Mary Bale, was born Sept. 10, 1791, and was one of eleven children of Peter Bale, of Baleville, in this county, who was the eldest son of Henry Bale, a German, who came to this country and settled at La Fayette as early as 1750, and there erected one of the first flouring grist-mills in Sussex County. His grandmother on the maternal side was Elizabeth (Struble) Bale, one of nine children of Leonard Struble, who was also of German descent and one of the pioneer settlers of that section of Hampton township west of Baleville. His father, Thomas Kays, born June 5, 1785, was a justice of the peace, and owned and operated the old grist-mill at Lower La Fayette from April 1, 1819, until his death, May 9, 1830.

His parents, Thomas and Mary (Bale) Kays, had ten children: Sarah, Martha, and John, all of whom died young; Elizabeth, who married Benjamin Dormida; Mary S., who married George W. Collver and died soon after her marriage; Henry B., who married Sarah Morris; Dorcas, who married George W. Collver; Phebe, who married Samuel Shottwell; Martha, who married Judge James B. Huston; and Thomas, the subject of this sketch, who married Amanda E., the eldest daughter of the late Hazlet Slater, of La Fayette, on Sept. 24, 1857.

His father died when the subject of this sketch was only seven months old, leaving a small estate, which was spent in the support of the family. He was thus left at an early age with only his widowed mother to care for him, but, most fortunately for him, she was the best of Christian mothers, and his education and moral training were looked after with the most scrupulous care; which debt was paid in after-years by every known want of the mother being diligently supplied. He received only a common-school education, and at the age of sixteen went with his older brother, Henry B. Kays, to learn the trade of a pattern-maker, machinist, and millwright. He continued this, occasionally clerking in a store, until his majority, becoming thoroughly acquainted with all the details of the business. While learning his trade he spent all his leisure hours in study, and obtained a thorough knowledge of most of the higher branches of education, and especially of mathematics, for which he had a natural aptitude; during the same time, to some extent, he read law, towards which profession, at an early age, he had a strong inclination.

He taught school a few months in 1851, and in 1852 formed a copartnership with Dr. Franklin Smith. They carried on a very heavy and extensive foundry, machine, and milling business at La Fayette until 1859, when he sold out his interest to his partner and devoted his whole time to the study of the law.

While heavily engaged in business, in 1858, he commenced the study of law with Hon. A. J. Rogers, and continued it under the preceptorship of his cousin, Hon. Martin Ryerson, and Mr. Rogers, until February term of the Supreme Court, 1863, when he was licensed as an attorney-at-law. He immediately became an equal partner with Mr. Rogers, at Newton, which connection continued until 1867, when Mr. Rogers removed to New York City, since which time Mr. Kays has continued the practice of law alone. Soon after this he was called as a counselor-at-law and a special master in chancery, having continuously had a very heavy practice in all the higher courts in the State and the United States Circuit Court, and more recently admitted to practice in the United States Supreme Court. He is a member of the board of directors of the Sussex National Bank and counsel for the same, and was for several years president of the Celluloid Harness Trimming Company of Newark, N. J.

Mr. Kays is emphatically one of the self-made men of the times. Left fatherless in infancy, without means or influential friends, and thrown wholly upon his own resources, he sought and obtained outside of schools a thorough education, and by like close application acquired a large store of general knowledge and rapidly advanced to prominence in business, politics, and his profession. As a business man he was recognized as one of the most active and successful in the county, forcing himself to the head of the business in which he was engaged in spite of all opposition and obstacles. By the burning of a leased grist-mill filled with grain he lost many thousand dollars, but more than made up this loss in a single year by the purchase of the premises on which the burnt mill was located, the sale of seven feet of the water-power, and the building and sale of a new mill.

Mr. Kays became a prominent member of the bar of his county almost as soon as admitted. He is self-reliant, is a close, rapid, and logical thinker, and has a strong, clear legal mind. His nature is not only to do systematically whatever he undertakes, but to do it in the most thorough manner, whether working for pay or not, and whether the amount involved is large or small. His knowledge of mathematics and mechanics and his experience in business have aided him very much in his profession, and balanced, if not overcome, the disadvantage of his not earlier taking up the practice of law. He has been a hard student, earnest in his work, always making his client's cause his own; has great power of concentration; is cool and self-possessed, grasping the strong points and justice of the case; is usually a logical and deliberate debater, yet has at his command a rapid and powerful utterance. He always prepares his causes in the most thorough manner, and presents them to the court and jury with all the power of which the law and the facts will admit. For many years he has devoted most of his time as counsel in causes and in preparing briefs and arguments in litigated cases. He selects his business and stands as one of the leading members of the bar of the county, and among the prominent lawyers of the State.

In politics Mr. Kays has always been a decided and uncompromising Democrat. During the late Rebellion he warmly espoused the cause of the Union, urging enlistments by public speeches in aid of the integrity of the Union, yet claiming and exercising at all times the right freely and boldly to criticise the acts of the party in power.

From early manhood he has been generally active in politics. Well versed in the fundamental principles of government and the political issues of the day, with recognized honesty and a thorough knowledge of human nature, bold, fearless, and with decided power over the minds of men in influencing their judgment and uniting them and getting discordant elements to work harmoniously in a common cause, he naturally became a prominent man in his party in the county and in the State. He refused a seat in both branches of the Legislature when quite young, and never sought, but has always refused to accept, any political office, either by appointment or by election by the people. While decidedly outspoken in his political views of men and measures, he scrupulously respects the honest opinions of his opponents, and has many warm friends among them.

As a citizen Mr. Kays occupies a prominent position, and is recognized as a man of strict integrity, public-spirited, and of broad and liberal views.

HON. ANDREW J. ROGERS—well known to this bar as a prominent lawyer and politician, and now residing and practicing in the city of New York—was born in the township of Lafayette, Sussex Co., and was admitted to the bar in 1852. In that year he commenced practicing in the village of Lafayette, and continued there till 1857, when he removed to Newton and conducted a successful law business there for ten years. In 1867 he established his office in New York City, and has continued there ever since. He was known in Sussex County as a very prominent and influential lawyer and politician. In his successful practice he amassed quite a large sum before he went to New York. Thomas Kays was his law-partner from 1863 to 1867, under the firm-name of Rogers & Kays. They did a very extensive business.

Mr. Rogers was a Democrat in politics. In 1862 he was elected to Congress from the Fourth Congressional District of New Jersey, and was re-elected in 1864. While in that body he acquitted himself with ability and credit. He was appointed public administrator of the city of New York, and served in that capacity four years. Mr. Rogers was very popular with the masses and highly effective as a speaker. He was also a man of great abilities and energy of character.

SAMUEL H. POTTER studied law with Hon. Daniel Haines. He was admitted as an attorney in January, 1849, and as a counselor in November, 1854. He first began the practice of law at Deckertown, thence removed to Hamburg, and thence to Newton, where he remained some time. He then removed to Janesville, Wis., where he practiced till the time of his death.

Mr. Potter married a sister of Thomas N. McCarter, who survives him and resides at Newton, Sussex Co.

MICHAEL R. KEMBLE, of Hamburg, was born in Franklin, and is a son of Gerret Kemble. He became a member of the Sussex bar in January, 1849, having studied law with Governor Haines at Hamburg, where he has ever since practiced. He has been engaged to some extent in mining interests, and has realized considerable profit therefrom.

HON. THOMAS ANDERSON, present law judge of Sussex County, is a son of William T. Anderson, and was born at Newton, Jan. 28, 1811. He studied law with Governor Peter D. Vroom, in Trenton, and with Governor Daniel Haines, and immediately after his admission in 1856 began practice at Newton. He remained a member of the Sussex bar until quite recently, when he opened an office in Newark, where his business is now done, except that pertaining to his position as judge of the Court of Common Pleas, to which he was appointed by Governor Bedle in 1876, as the successor of Hon. Daniel S. Anderson. He was at one time editor of the New Jersey Herald.

Judge Anderson is a gentleman of unblemished character and of good standing as a lawyer. He was at one time the associate of Joseph Coult, under the firm-name of Coult & Anderson, and afterwards a partner of Robert T. Johnson.

LEWIS COCHRAN.—Dennis, son of Michael and Jane Cochran, and father of our subject, was born in Manor-hamilton, County Leitrim, Ireland, March 5, 1800. He came to America at about the age of twenty years, and soon after located at Newton, N. J., where he afterwards resided until his death, Feb. 20, 1880. Having learned the trade of a butcher in his native country, he carried it on for several years after settling in Newton. He purchased a hotel in Newton, of Nathan Drake, naming it the "Cochran House," and about 1843 built the present hostelry of that name, of which he continued to be proprietor until about 1855, when he retired from active business except to manage his farm, near the town limits. Under his management the Cochran House became a first-class hotel, which reputation it has retained until the present time.

Mr. Cochran was an active and enterprising business man, and favorably known not only to his own town's people, but to men of prominence in this and other States. He was a genial, kind-hearted man, and esteemed by all who knew him. His father died in Ireland, but his mother soon after came to New York, where she died before he saw her. He had three brothers and four sisters, who also settled here as follows: Lewis located in Philadelphia and there died; John resided in the same city; Michael resided there for several years, but was also a resident of Pottsville, Pa. His sister Rose was not married; Margery became the wife of Johnson Vanderen, of Port Jervis, N. Y., and after his death removed to Philadelphia, where she died; Ann became the wife of a British officer serving in India, named Wise; and Margaret became the wife of Mr. Cassidy, the father of Lewis C. Cassidy, a distinguished lawyer and Democratic politician in Philadelphia.

Dennis Cochran married, May 7, 1831, Lydia, daughter of Benjamin W. and Margaret Hunt, who bore him the following children: Jane, the oldest, became the wife of William E., son of Samuel D. Morford, of Newton, and resides at Los Angeles, California; Michael resides in Newark, N. J.; Sarah C. was the wife of Dr. R. A. Sheppard, of Newton, and died April 22, 1868, leaving a daughter Minnie; Margaret A., became the wife of John Winans, a prominent lawyer in Janesville, Wis., and died there Dec. 22, 1878, leaving no children; John Cochran, after graduating at Princeton College, read law with his cousin, Lewis C. Cassidy, in Philadelphia, and since his admission has practiced his profession in that city. He was for nine years a member of the Select Council there, and is in 1881 a Democratic State senator, representing a district of the city. Phebe became the wife of Edward M. Wildrick, a salesman in the store of the Franklin Iron Company at Franklin Furnace; Lewis, subject of this sketch; Benjamin II. resides in Newton; William, a salesman in the clothing-house of McGregor & Co., Newark, N. J.; Mary, the present wife of Dr. R. A. Sheppard; and Kate, the youngest child, died when four years of age.

Mrs. Cochran was born in 1810 and died in Newton, April 16, 1871. She was closely identified with her husband in every work in which he was engaged, was well known, and no one enjoyed more of the good will and esteem of the people of Newton than she for her many virtues and her devotion to friends and family. Her death was an irreparable loss to her family.

Lewis, third son of Dennis Cochran, was born in Newton, Feb. 3, 1843. His preliminary education was received in the public schools of his native place. He read law with his brother-in-law, John Winans, at Janesville, Wis., and was admitted to the bar there; he was also a student in the office of John Linn, Esq., at Newton. He was admitted to the bar as an attorney at the November term of the Supreme Court of New Jersey in 1862, and as counselor at the February term in 1872. Immediately after his admission as attorney he began the practice of law in Newton, where he has ever since continued it. On March 25, 1874, he was appointed prosecutor of pleas for Sussex County, and upon the expiration of his term, March 25, 1879, was reappointed for a second term of five years.

During his incumbency of this office several of the most important cases known to Sussex County have fallen to his care to conduct, among which are the following:

The trial of "Jack" Hughes for the murder of his wife; he was convicted and executed in July, 1875. In this case he was assisted by the late Jacob Vannatta, then attorney-general of the State of New Jersey.

The trial of John Sawyer and two others, masked burglars, who broke into the house of Sanford Hough, of Wantage, Nov. 2, 1879; they were convicted and sent to the State prison for a term of fifteen years.

The case of Clarence Campbell, Peter Kane, alias "Mickey," and John Clark, indicted for the murder of Melancthon S. Washer, who was killed Feb. 16, 1880, on Spring Street, Newton, in which Campbell and Kane were convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to State prison for twelve years, Clark being acquitted.

The trial of Frank F. Patterson, editor of the Newark Courier, for libelous publications against Hon. Henry C. Kelsey, Secretary of State, in connection with his management of the insurance department, tried in February, 1880. In this case, the prosecutor was assisted by ex-Governor Bedle, Thomas Kays, and Joseph Coult, against Judges Stevens and Fort, of Newark. Patterson was convicted and sentenced to the county jail for thirty days and to pay a fine of two hundred and fifty dollars and costs.

The case of Frederick Crill, which was not only a most important case, but a most peculiar one. Crill was indicted for the murder of his daughter, Eliza Babcock, of Vernon, June 5, 1879. He was indicted and tried at the September term of the Court of Oyer and Terminer in the same year, was found guilty of murder in the first degree, and was executed at Newton, April 24, 1880, after having been once reprieved by the Governor.

In these important cases, and many others, Mr. Cochran not only has been successful as prosecutor, but has won the confidence of the people and the esteem of his fellow-members of the profession, for the fair and impartial manner in which he has performed his duties.

For several years he was the law-partner of Capt. Lewis Van Blarcom, but since the spring of 1880 he has had no associate. He prepares his cases with great care, is very discriminating in his examination of a witness, and his familiarity with and correct knowledge of the law have made him successful in his profession. He has had a large experience in conducting cases in the higher courts, and is recognized as a superior

LEWIS VAN BLARCOM.

The paternal grandfather of Lewis, Garret, was born in Bergen Co., N. J., about the year 1780, and married Mary De Graw about the year 1804. Of this union were born two sons and two daughters,—viz., Samuel, William, Susan (wife of L. L. Conklin, of Paterson, N. J.), and Mary A. (wife of J. F. Dunn, of Belle Plain, Iowa).

Garret Van Blarcom served in the war of 1812. He was a mason by trade; settled in Sussex County about 1820, where he carried on farming the remainder of his life. Both he and his wife were members of the North Church (Presbyterian) of Harlyston. He died in 1834. His wife was descended from one of the Huguenot families, was a devout Christian woman, and died in 1864, aged about eighty years.

Of their children, William was father of our subject, and was born at the "Ponds," in Bergen County, in 1814. He removed to Lafayette township, Sussex Co., in 1852, and died in 1854. He was a practical farmer, led a quiet life, and never sought political place or the emoluments of office.

His wife was Catharine A., daughter of Jacob and Haonah (Rorick) Sutton, of Harlyston. Her parents removed to Michigan in 1858, where both died. She was born in 1814, and survives in 1881. Both William Van Blarcom and his wife were active members of the Christian Church, and assisted in building the church-edifice at Monroe Corners.

Their children are Lewis, Garret, Lucy A. (wife of James E. Price, of Romeo, Mich.), Susan C. (wife of Nelson Ackerson, of Lafayette), Joseph, Andrew J., and Hannah (wife of Charles Y. Dolsen, of Newton).

Lewis, eldest son of William Van Blarcom, was born in Sparta township, July 19, 1835. His early education was obtained at the common school in his native township, and under the private instruction of Edward A. Stiles, a well-known teacher of Wantage.

His minority was mostly spent at home, where he became inured to farm work, and learned the inestimable lessons of self-reliance and perseverance. After reaching the proper age he was a teacher for four terms.

In 1858 he began to read law with M. R. Kimble, of Hamburg, and after one year entered the law-office of John Linn, of Newton.

On Aug. 25, 1862, Mr. Van Blarcom enlisted as first lieutenant, Company D, Fifteenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and for meritorious service he was promoted in June, 1863, to captain of Company C. This regiment was a part of the First New Jersey Brigade, which formed a part of the Army of the Potomac, First Division, Sixth Army Corps.

Capt. Van Blarcom was in the following engagements: Fredericksburg, December, 1862; second Fredericksburg, at Salem Heights, May, 1863; Gettysburg, July, 1863; Rappahannock Station, November, 1863; Spotsylvania, May 8, 1864.

In this last engagement he was wounded and captured by the rebels, and had his leg amputated by them. After remaining in the hospital for ten days, he was carried to Richmond and placed in Libby Prison, where he remained until Sept. 12, 1864, when he was exchanged and placed in the hospital at Annapolis. He received his discharge from service on Dec. 19, 1864, and returned home.

After his return to Newton he resumed the study of the law, which he completed, and was admitted to the bar as an attorney at Trenton, at the June term in 1865, and as counselor at the June term in 1868.

After his admission as an attorney he began the practice of law in Newton, where he has successfully practiced his profession since. From 1869 to 1873, Joseph Coult was associated with him in business, and from 1873 to 1880, Lewis Cochran. He was appointed prosecutor of pleas by Governor Randolph, March 25, 1869, and discharged the duties of that office with acknowledged ability and justice for a term of five years.

Capt. Van Blarcom is, politically, a Republican, and leading and influential in his party in Sussex County.

Upon his return from the war in the fall of 1864 he was the Republican candidate for county clerk, but failed of election on account of his party being largely in the minority.

For two years he was one of the chosen board of freeholders, and he has been chairman of the Republican county committee for the past eight years.

He married, Aug. 17, 1871, Mary, daughter of Dr. Alexander H. Thompson, of Marksborough, Warren Co., N. J. His children are Kate and Andrew.

Chas. J. Roe

chancery lawyer. In his speeches he gives little attention to rhetorical effect, but they are usually marked by terseness of diction and great earnestness.

Mr. Cochran is a Democrat in politics, and has been an influential member of his party for several years. He was a director of the board of chosen freeholders of the county for several years, and was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention held at Cincinnati, in June, 1880, which nominated Hancock and English for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency of the United States. Although not a candidate, his name was prominently mentioned in connection with the Democratic nomination for Congress in the fall of 1880. He married, in 1869, Miss Ella S., daughter of Andrew and Theodosia (Cummins) Shiner, of Newton, and has three children,—Fred. A., Jennie M., and Lewis Cochran, Jr.

CHARLES J. ROE.—The paternal great-grandfather, Jonas Roe, came from Scotland with two of his brothers, and settled at Florida, Orange Co., N. Y., about the year 1730. A deed of the property owned by him is dated 1737, and is written on parchment. He reared a family of seven sons and several daughters, of whom Nathaniel resided near Unionville, N. Y., and has several descendants there; William and Jonas have descendants in Orange County; Benjamin married and reared a family in Sussex Co., N. J., and William J., John, and Edward Roe, of Frankford township, are his grandchildren.

George Roe, youngest of the family, married, in 1797, Margaret, daughter of Leonard Struble, and granddaughter of Peter Struble, who emigrated from Alsace, Germany, in 1748, and settled on Smith's Hill, in the old township of Newton, Sussex Co., in 1752, from whom descended the large family of Strubles in New Jersey. Margaret Struble was born in 1777, and died at the age of seventy-two years.

George Roe was born at Florida, N. Y., in 1777, and died in 1815. He lived at his native place for a short time after his marriage, and about 1798 purchased five hundred acres of land at the intersection of the outlet of the "Ponds" and the Paulinskill, in the township of Frankford, Sussex Co., N. J., upon which he settled, and where he resided the remainder of his life; this property is now owned by his descendants. He was a somewhat public-spirited man, and was familiarly known as "Capt. George Roe," from his connection with the old State militia. His children were six sons and four daughters,—viz., Leonard, Nathaniel, Timothy, James, Charles, William H., Eliza (became the wife of William Cory, of Sparta, and settled in Bradford Co., Pa.), Phebe (was the wife of Levi Lewis, of Jerseyville, Ill.), Charlotte (became the wife of John Williams, of Branchville, N. J.), and Sarah Jane (became the wife of James Shotwell, of Branchville). Only four of these children are living in 1881,—viz., Charles, William H., Charlotte, and Sarah Jane.

Charles Roe, son of George, is father of our subject, and was born on the homestead, near Augusta, April 23, 1812. He began mercantile business at Branchville in 1836, and continued it successfully until 1863, when, upon his election as surrogate of Sussex County, he removed to Newton, where he has since resided. By re-election he held the office continuously for fifteen years, and discharged the duties incumbent upon him with credit to himself and with justice to the people. In May, 1879, he purchased a drug-store in Newton, and he continues to carry it on in 1881.

Mr. Roe's first wife was Lucy Coult, daughter of Joseph and Jerusha (Price) Coult, of Frankford, and granddaughter of Isaac Coult, who was a large land-owner in that township and lived to be about one hundred years old; his will was dated in 1764. Mrs. Roe died very soon after her marriage, and Mr. Roe married, for his second wife, September, 1842, Elizabeth Ann, a sister of his first wife. She was born in 1814, and died Jan. 1, 1876, leaving one son and three daughters,—viz., Lucy M., a graduate of Bordentown College, died in April, 1877, aged twenty-eight; Charles J.; Anna M., a graduate of Vassar College in the class of 1876; and Jennie J.

Charles J., only son of Charles Roe, was born at Branchville, in Frankford township, Sept. 11, 1850. He obtained his preparatory education at Chester Institute, in Morris Co., N. J., and at Newton Collegiate Institute; entered Princeton College in 1867, and was graduated from that school with the usual honors in the class of 1870. The same month with his graduation he entered the law-office of the late Levi Shepherd, a prominent lawyer at Newton, and was admitted to the bar as attorney at the June term in 1873, and as counselor at the June term in 1876. He began the practice of his profession in Newton immediately after his admission to the bar as attorney, and has continued to do a successful business since. On July 1, 1880, he associated with him as a law-partner Frank Shepherd, under the firm-name of Roe & Shepherd.

In 1877, Mr. Roe was admitted to practice in the United States Circuit Court, and in 1878 he was appointed a special master in chancery.

HON. WILLIAM E. SKINNER was admitted to the bar of this county in November, 1860, and practiced at Hamburg, Newark, and Newton till his removal to Hackensack, Bergen Co., a few years ago. He married a daughter of David Ryerson, of Newton. After his removal to Bergen County he was appointed by Governor McClellan president judge of the Court of Common Pleas, which office he now holds.

Judge Skinner is a lawyer of good abilities and acquirements, and a man of strict integrity.

MARTIN ROSENKRANS.—His great-great-grandfather was Alexander Augustus Rosenkrans, who came from Holland to New Amsterdam in 1689, accompanied by his wife, whose maiden name is not known. He reared a family of sons and daughters, among whom was John Rosenkrans, who was born

May 18, 1724. He married, Aug. 8, 1751, Margaret De Witt (a cousin of De Witt Clinton), who was born April 18, 1731.

The wife of John Rosenkrans was a descendant of the De Witts who came to New Amsterdam about 1639 and were the progenitors of the family in America.

John Rosenkrans resided in Walpack, Sussex Co., and was one of the earliest settlers. During his day the Indians were numerous in that section of the country. He often related to his son, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, many interesting and thrilling narratives concerning his adventures and associations with the red man of the forest. Bands of Indians would often come to his house and partake of the generous hospitalities which he offered. Frequently a score of them found shelter beneath his roof for the night, sleeping on the kitchen-floor. Often in the dead of night he would hear the Indian war-whoop ring out in hideous tones, sending terror to the bravest heart. He visited their wigwams, whose locations were marked by the curling smoke ascending from their camp-fires high above the tallest trees of the then dense forests that crowned the banks and flats of the Delaware on either side. The river was dotted with Indian canoes, in which the Indians would transport their families, provisions, and weapons from place to place in the Delaware valley.

When the Revolutionary war broke out he entered the army, and was soon commissioned to the rank of colonel for his gallantry. He (Col. John Rosenkrans) accompanied Gen. Sullivan in his campaign against the Indians of the upper Susquehanna and Genesee valley, in 1779. In that memorable campaign he commanded a brigade. He was the leading man on the Delaware in the section where he resided, and carried news to headquarters in the State, and kept the government posted on the affairs of the Northern country, in peace as well as in times of trouble. He lived in a large stone house, now belonging to the estate of John Berk, deceased, which may be seen in 1881 in good condition, having withstood the blasts of more than a hundred winters.

In the Revolutionary war he was shot in the shoulder, from the effects of which he never recovered. A physician at Morristown, in the treatment of his wound, scraped the bone of his shoulder, which caused it to grow worse. He died June 5, 1786, and was buried in the old Shapanack graveyard, near his residence, where stood a low Dutch church built of logs, of which he was an elder.

His children were John, Jacob, Orianna, Orianna (2d), Alexander, Catharine, Charick, Elijah, Levi, Joseph and Benjamin (twins), Simeon, Simeon (2d), and Mary. Of these children, Benjamin was the grandfather of our subject, born March 31, 1770; married, Oct. 27, 1790, Margaret Schoonover, who was born Nov. 16, 1774, and died Feb. 1, 1842. He died Dec. 30, 1848. He was a representative farmer in his time, owning a large tract of land of some five hundred acres on the Delaware, in the township of Walpack.

During the war of 1812 he was in command at Sandy Hook as major, and was subsequently connected with the old State militia, and ranked as colonel. His children were Rachel, born April 17, 1791, wife of John W. Vanauken; John B., born July 19, 1792; Roanna, born July 14, 1794, wife of John Young; Nicholas, born Jan. 31, 1796; Everitt, born June 8, 1798; Levi, born March 10, 1800; Maria, born March 14, 1802, wife of James C. Bevans; Abraham, born Nov. 11, 1803; Elijah, born March 11, 1806; Sally, born April 4, 1808, wife of Everson Wheat, second wife of James C. Bevans; Amanda, born Feb. 4, 1811, wife of Simeon Cole; Lucinda, born Dec. 4, 1813, wife of Leonard Bell; Anson, born May 22, 1815, died young; Margaret, born Feb. 28, 1817, wife of Daniel Knight. Abraham, Elijah, Sally, Amanda, and Margaret are living (in 1881).

Of these children, seven sons and seven daughters grew to manhood and womanhood and raised families. Everitt Rosenkrans was the father of our subject. He was born in Walpack, June 8, 1798, and married for his first wife Mary Smith, who bore him four children,—viz., Benjamin, born Dec. 23, 1823, and died Dec. —, 1874; Margaret M., died at the age of twenty-one; Phebe Jane, wife of John Swartwood; and Jacob.

His second wife was Mary Buss, daughter of Jacob and Elizabeth (Miller) Buss, of Monroe Co., Pa. She was born Sept. 1, 1812, and died Sept. 5, 1878.

The children born of this union are Martin; Sarah E., wife of Martin Decker; Amanda, wife of Daniel S. Smith; John S. Seely; Maria; Martha A.; Aquilile; and Celestia, wife of L. Milton Wilson.

Everitt Rosenkrans died July 7, 1874. He led a quiet life as a farmer, and was a judicious and successful business man. He took great interest in the education of his children, and always lent his influence for the good of society.

For many years he was an elder of the First Reformed Church at Walpack, and took an interest in all worthy local objects tending to the welfare of the community in which he resided.

Martin Rosenkrans was born Sept. 11, 1840, in Walpack, and spent most of his minority at home, where he became inured to farm-work and received the advantages of a district school education (going to school during the winter seasons). At the age of twenty he engaged as a teacher, and after teaching several terms, following his early inclinations, he began his preparation for college, which was in May, 1862. He received his preparatory education at Mount Retirement Seminary, and at Blairstown Presbyterian Academy, and entered the Sophomore Class at Princeton in 1864, from which institution he was graduated with honor in the class of '67.

In June of the same year he commenced the study of law in the office of Coult & Anderson, at Newton, where he remained for one year. For two years following he was a law-student in the office of Capt. Lewis Van Blarcom, at Newton. He was admitted to the bar as an attorney at the June term of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, in 1870, and as counselor at the June term in 1873. In 1875 he was appointed a special master in chancery by Chancellor Runyon.

During his law studies he taught for two terms in the Newton Collegiate Institute, and for one term in the Stillwater Academy.

Immediately after his admission to the bar he opened a law-office in Newton, and since that time has given his undivided attention to the practice of his profession.

He married, March 21, 1871, Martha, daughter of Samuel and Eliza (Gunderman) Van Blarcom, who was born May 16, 1848, in Sparta township, Sussex Co. Their children are Lillian M., Addison P., and William.

HON. LEWIS J. MARTIN is a son of James J. Martin, second son of Humphrey and Isabella Martin, who was born in Wantage township, Sussex Co., N. J. Upon attaining manhood the latter entered into active business life, and became generally known throughout the county. He was at one time engaged in the mercantile business in Newton, in partnership with Michael B. Titman, and subsequently filled the important office of county clerk of Sussex County, of which he was the incumbent at the time of his death, in January, 1869. His wife was Eleanor Ann, daughter of Roy and Mary McCoy, of Wantage township, and the issue of the union Mary B., who became the wife of Oakley B. Pellet, Lewis J. Martin, and Alice L., wife of Dr. John Crater, of Hackettstown, N. J.

Lewis J. Martin was born on the Humphrey Martin farm, near Deckertown, N. J., on Feb. 22, 1844. Until he attained the age of eleven years he remained upon the farm, and enjoyed the educational advantages afforded by the district school of his locality. In April, 1855, he removed with his parents to Newton, and completed his educational career at the private school of Miss Agnes McCarter, and at the Newton Collegiate Institute. In the fall of 1861 he entered upon the study of the law in the office of John Linn, Esq., of Newton, and was formally admitted to practice at the February term of the Supreme Court, at Trenton, in 1866. For one year after his admission Mr. Martin engaged in the practice of law at Branchville and Newton, when, owing to the declining health of his father, then the clerk of the county, he was obliged to enter that office, and performed the duties of the position, as deputy, until the demise of his father, in January, 1869. He was then appointed by Governor Parker to fill the unexpired term of office, and acted as county clerk until November, 1869. In February, 1870, he located, in the practice of his profession, at Deckertown, where he is at present. He was appointed president judge of the Court of Common pleas of Sussex County in April, 1881, for a term of five years.

Mr. Martin, though yet in the prime of life, with the opening future yet before him, has achieved, by a course of self-discipline and close personal application, a prominent place in life, and is known and recognized as one of the leading and representative men of Wantage township. As a lawyer he is well read, careful, and successful, and brings to the treatment of his cases an amount of skill and a fertility of resource not common in the profession. Politically he is a Democrat, and has occupied various positions of prominence in public life, and enjoys wide influence in the counsels of his party. He was town clerk of Newton for two years, as well as county clerk, and has represented Sussex County in the State Legislature for the past three years,—viz., 1879-81. As a legislator he has proven a faithful and able representative of his constituency, and secured recognition by the members of the House as a useful and valuable coadjutor in the important work of legislation, serving on such important committees as those on "Banks and Insurance," the "Judiciary," and on the "Revision of Taxes." He is a terse and argumentative speaker, and is justly popular at home, where he is best known, and is identified with the various institutions of his locality, and with all movements tending to advance the moral, social, or educational interests of the community in which he resides. He has been for a number of years the attorney of the Farmers' National Bank of Deckertown, of which he is also a director; is the presiding officer of Samaritan Lodge, No. 98, A. F. and A. M., of Deckertown, and trustee of School District No. 92, of that place. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church of Deckertown.

Mr. Martin was married on Oct. 14, 1868, to Frances M., daughter of George C. and M. Antoinette Shaw, of Newton, and has a family of five boys,—namely, Frank, George, Scott, Lewis, and Sayre Martin.

JOSEPH COULT was born in Frankford township, Sussex Co.; studied law with Hon. Thomas N. McCarter at Newton, and was admitted to the bar in February, 1861. After a short period of practice by himself at Newton, he formed a partnership with Hon. Thomas Anderson, president judge of the Sussex County Common Pleas. He subsequently became a member of the firm of Coult & Van Blarcom, to which Lewis Cochran, now prosecutor of the pleas, was afterwards added, constituting the firm of Coult, Van Blarcom & Cochran. Mr. Coult moved to Newark in 1870, and formed a copartnership with Mr. Leonard, the former partner of Chancellor Runyon, in which he remained for a while, when he became associated with Thomas N. McCarter and Orsen Keen, in the firm of McCarter, Keen & Coult. After a time this was dissolved, and Mr. Coult united with James E. Howell, under the firm-name of Coult & Howell.

Mr. Coult was one of the leading lawyers of the Sussex bar, and has taken a prominent place at the Essex bar since his removal to Newark. A Republican in politics, he was the leader of his party in Sussex County while he resided in Newton. He was also during his career in this county a very enterprising and public-spirited man; had much to do in building the present Presbyterian church at Newton, the public school building, and other interests. He was one of the organizers of the Merchants' National Bank of Newton, and was counsel for the Sussex Railroad Company and a director in that corporation. While in Newton he built the fine brick residence on Elm Street now occupied by Mr. Levi Adams.

ALFRED ACKERSON is a native of Lafayette, Sussex Co. He studied law with Hon. A. J. Rogers, was admitted to the bar in June, 1861, and commenced practice at Newton. He subsequently removed to Sparta and thence to Newark, and is at present engaged in the duties of his profession in that city.

ELIAS M. WHITE was born near Andover, Sussex Co., N. J., and is a son of Samuel S. White. He studied law with David Thompson, Esq., at Newton, and after his admission, in June, 1864, went to practice at Dover, Morris Co. He served as a member of the Legislature from that county, but is now practicing on Staten Island.

DOWSON WOODRUFF, admitted in June, 1866; son of Moses Woodruff; born in Sparta, Sussex Co.; studied law with Col. Robert Hamilton and with Hon. A. J. Rogers, and is at present a member of the Sussex bar. He was admitted also in the State of New York, and for a while practiced law at Port Jervis.

WILLIAM S. LEPORT, formerly of this bar, is a son of Cyrus S. Leport, and a native of Stanhope, Sussex Co. He studied law with his father; was admitted in 1867; began practice at Stanhope; removed thence to Newton, and thence to Dover, Morris Co., where he now resides. He has the reputation of being a good lawyer and a man of integrity.

THOMAS M. KAYS, son of Henry B. Kays, born in Lafayette, Sussex Co. He studied law with his uncle, Hon. Thomas Kays, was admitted in June, 1873, and has since practiced in Newton.

WALTER I. ROSS, of Stanhope, formerly practiced at Lafayette, in this county. He was born at Augusta, and is a son of Jacob Ross. He was admitted as an attorney in June, 1870.

ROBERT T. JOHNSON, born at Marksboro', Warren Co.; studied law with John Linn; was admitted in September, 1870, and commenced practice in Newton, where he was at one time a partner with Hon. Thomas Anderson.

CHARLES M. WOODRUFF, son of Moses Woodruff, born in the township of Sparta, Sussex Co.; studied law with his brother, Dowson Woodruff; is in practice at Newton.

JAMES HOWELL, formerly of this bar, is now practicing at Newark in partnership with Joseph Coult.

He was born in Beemersville, Sussex Co., and studied law at Newton with Coult & Van Blarcom.

THEODORE SIMONSON, son of Thomas T. Simonson, late sheriff of Sussex County; studied law with Hon. Thomas Anderson, and commenced practice at Newton, but subsequently removed to Vernon, where he is now in business.

ROBERT L. LAWRENCE was born at Hamburg, Sussex Co., N. J., and is a son of Hon. Thomas Lawrence, present State senator from this county. Robert L. studied law with Hon. Thomas Anderson, and after his admission, in November, 1876, commenced practice at Newton. He is now a promising lawyer of Jersey City.

WINFIELD H. COURSEN, son of George H. Coursen, farmer and justice of the peace; born in Newton; studied law with Van Blarcom & Cochran at Newton, where he is in the practice of his profession.

THEODORE E. DENNIS is a member of the Sussex bar, practicing at Hamburg, where he studied law with Michael R. Kemble.

HENRY HUSTON, son of Judge James B. Huston; born at Lafayette; studied law with his uncle, Hon. Thomas Kays, and is in practice at Newton. He was admitted as an attorney in June, 1877, and as counselor in June, 1880.

A. LEWIS MORROW, attorney-at-law, Deckertown; son of Samuel Morrow, of Wantage; born in that township, and studied law at Newark with his brother Samuel.

A. WATSON SLOCKBOWER, born in Andover; studied law with Van Blarcom & Cochran, and is in practice at Deckertown, Sussex Co., N. J.

DAVID B. HETZEL, attorney-at-law, Newton; born in Hope, Warren Co.; studied law with Van Blarcom & Cochran.

FRANK SHEPHERD, son of the late Levi Shepherd; born in Deckertown, Sussex Co., and studied law with Charles J. Roe, whose partner he now is,—firm of Roe & Shepherd.

WILLIAM M. SMITH, attorney, born at Newton, son of Samuel Smith; studied law with Hon. Thomas Kays; was admitted in June, 1878, and has practiced since at Newton.

CHARLES D. THOMPSON, young lawyer in practice at Newton; son of David Thompson, Esq., studied law with his father, and was admitted as an attorney in June, 1877, and as counselor in June, 1880.

ALLEN R. SHAY studied law partly with Hon. Thomas Kays and in part with Charles J. Roe; was admitted to practice as an attorney in February, 1877, and advanced to the rank of counselor in June, 1880. He is a son of Timothy E. Shay, and was born in the township of Sandyston; is in practice at Newton.

IV.—IMPORTANT TRIALS IN SUSSEX COUNTY.

Crimes of magnitude, according to Mr. Edsall, had occupied but a small portion of judicial attention during the first hundred years of the existence of the county. We quote the following:

"The doom of death has been denounced against only six persons since our county had an existence, and two of these had not committed murder. The two who were thus executed with hands fortunately unstained by human blood were named Maxwell and McCoy, and were the first victims to capital punishment in the county. They were hung on the public green in the year 1781 for breaking into the house of John Maxwell, of Greenwich township, robbing the same, and severely beating and bruising the owner. They protested their innocence to the last; and it subsequently was made manifest that their dying asseverations were true. Though two girls who were in the plundered house, and were compelled to light the robbers through the apartments, swore positively to the identity of Maxwell and McCoy, it was nevertheless discovered that the crime was committed by a party of Tories, who a few years afterwards returned the property stolen to the owner.* Thus, the first use of the gallows in Sussex was most unfortunate, and is still treasured in the memory of aged citizens not as an event in which justice was vindicated, but as a most deplorable judicial tragedy.

"The main business of our County Courts from the beginning has been the collection of debts and the settlement of disputed land-titles. The adjudications of all matters in dispute have been treated with respect. Impartial justice has been administered from the first by our courts, and never were any people more distinguished than those of Sussex for an abiding reverence for the precepts and principles of public law. No difficulty has ever been experienced in executing the decrees of our courts. Insubordination and contempt of the constituted authorities are not among the characteristics of our citizens, and never have been. Our courts of justice, from the very outset, have so acted as to secure the respect of the people. Guarding the rights of others, they have never permitted their own immunities to be infringed without stern and dignified rebuke. At a very early period a certain hot-headed person, who mistook the simplicity with which our judges administered the law for a lack of self-respect, ventured to pronounce them in open court a pack of rascals; but he found the joke a costly one: he was made to pay instantly the sum of twenty pounds for his temerity, and was glad to escape as cheaply as that when he saw the spirit which his insolence had evoked not only from the bench, but from the spectators in the court-room. Another individual, summoned as a grand juror, made his appearance at the proper time, but refused to be sworn or affirmed, and thought by his obstinacy to weary the patience of the court. But he took nothing by his notion, unless, in journeying home, he found it facilitated locomotion to travel with pockets pretty effectually emptied.

* Robert S. Kennedy, Esq., of Greenwich, a great-grandson of John Maxwell, writes that the family never believed that the evidence afterwards discovered was sufficient to establish the absolute innocence of the men executed. Besides the testimony of the two girls, there was a great deal of strong circumstantial evidence; one point in particular Mr. K. regards as very decisive,—viz.: In the desperate struggle old Mr. Maxwell placed his hand, which was bloody, upon the back of one of the robbers, and by the mark on his coat thus made he was apprehended next day. This was certainly strong proof, but we are informed that the man proved on the trial that upon the evening in question he visited a girl whom he was courting, and the family, when he arrived at her house, were cleaning a quantity of shad. He took a knife and assisted the party, and while their hands were bloody from handling fish entrails some playful scuffling took place, in the course of which he must have received the mark on his garment.

John Maxwell, whose life came very near being sacrificed in this affair, was the first settler of that name in Greenwich; he was one of the first elders and founders of the Presbyterian Church in that township, and was the father of Gen. Wm. Maxwell and Capt. John Maxwell, of the Revolutionary army, both of whom were absent in the service of their country when the robbery was committed. He had one son, Robert, at home at the time, who was assailed in the beginning of the affray, knocked senseless, and left for dead. He did not revive until the plunderers had accomplished their work and left the premises.

"Prior to the Revolutionary war, as I have before stated, there was no execution for murder or other crime. Neither was there any trial had for an offense involving the forfeiture of life upon conviction of the defendant, except in the case of one Charity Moore, a woman, who was indicted for murder in 1767, but was not hung. The next nearest approach to a trial for a capital crime was in reference to one Robert Seymour, who was apprehended upon a charge of murdering an Indian, but by the assistance of three friends he broke jail and fled to parts unknown. His three friends were indicted for aiding his escape, but I have been unable to find in the court minutes any record of their conviction and punishment. The offense next in magnitude to that perpetrated by Seymour was committed by one William Atkinson, in the year 1775. He stole a horse, was pursued, taken, found guilty, subjected to thirty-nine lashes, and imprisoned until the costs of his prosecution should be paid. Here he remained four hundred and eighteen days, running up a board bill with John Pettit, jailer, of fifteen pounds three shillings six pence, being an average of about nine pence a day. The county paid the bill, and also seven pounds to Thomas Anderson for prosecuting him to conviction, but was loath to incur expense any longer, and so, upon application to the court, an order was made to put up Atkinson at public sale and dispose of his services for what they would bring. He was struck off for the sum of eleven pounds to one Hugh Quig, of Morris County, who gave his note, payable a few days after date, and departed with his purchase. Before the note became due Quig went over to the British army, and forgot to leave funds behind to pay the county of Sussex. This was an unexpected turn of the wheel, and puzzled our worthy board exceedingly. They hated to be outwitted in this way, and so, upon taking legal advice, they authorized Thomas Anderson to bring suit for the amount of the note against 'The Morris County Commissioners for seizing absconding Tories.' The only result of this step was an increased expenditure, and at last they gave up the chase, satisfied that, as the matter thus far had been without profit, its further pursuit would be equally unproductive of honor.*

The executions which have taken place in the county since the Revolution are briefly sketched as follows:

In December, 1795, a man named Matthias Gottlieb, familiarly called "Cutlip," was executed in Newton. He resided on Main Street, near the entrance of the old cemetery. The house in which he lived is still standing. Gottlieb had been butchering beef for a neighbor. He returned home somewhat intoxicated, and said to his little daughter, "I have been butchering cattle to-day, and now I am going to butcher your mother." The cries of the child and entreaties of the mother were without avail; the inhuman wretch seized her and gave her three stabs in the abdomen with a large butcher-knife, inflicting such a terrible wound that she died in a very short time. The little daughter was the only witness to the deed, and it was on her evidence that the father was convicted. Gottlieb was hanged by Sheriff James Hindshaw in the lower part of Newton, known as Kerby Hollow.*

Mary Cole was hanged on the 26th of June, 1812, by Sheriff Ephraim Green, Jr. Her crime was that of murdering her mother in what is now Lafayette township. The body of the murdered woman was concealed under the hearth of the house in which she lived. Mary Cole's husband, Cornelius Cole, was believed to have been the master-spirit in the concoction and committal of the crime, the motive being to come into possession of his mother-in-law's property. Mrs. Cole was convicted of murder in the first degree, but her husband was acquitted. The sentence of death was pronounced by the court on the day of the conviction. Her execution took place in Newton, in an open field near where the Sussex Railway depot now stands, and was witnessed by thousands of people, some of whom are still living. The scene of the execution has ever since been known as the "Mary Cole Field." It is said that, on seeing her husband smile at the gallows, the poor woman said, "Ah! I could tell something that would change that smile into tears."

Peter Brakeman was executed by Sheriff William Darral, June 30, 1820. He murdered a peddler named Francis E. Nichols, with whom he had traveled from Montrose, Pa., in the character of a friend, but evidently with the intention from the start of taking his life in order to possess himself of the money which he knew Nichols to have. They stayed for two days at a tavern in Lafayette, where they spent most of the time gambling. They stopped together at Sparta, and were seen in company four or five miles farther on. After that Brakeman stopped at the tavern at Woodport, two miles from where he and Nichols were last seen, and called for supper, but took some lunch and hurried on. The next day a boy with a dog came upon the body of the murdered man, shockingly mangled and covered with blood. A large knife and an ugly club which Brakeman had carried were found by the body. The murderer went to Philadelphia, and from there to Montrose, where he was soon after arrested. He was convicted after a four days' trial, and on May 30th was sentenced to be hanged. The execution was public, and took place near Drake's Pond, one mile from Newton. Spring Street, which leads in that direction, was for many years known as "Gallows road." Brakeman made a confession to Benjamin Stewart, a resident of Newton, the evening before the execution, in which he said he had passed most of his life as a counterfeiter and thief; he related the incidents of four robberies and of one murder that he had committed, previous to this one, and said he had assisted in others. The judges at his trial were Gabriel H. Ford, John Johnson, John Gustin, Morris Robeson, Thomas Stewart, John Ogden, Walter L. Shee, Simon Cortright, etc.; Theodore Frelinghuysen, Esq., attorney-general for the State; William Halsey, Thomas C. Ryerson, and William Chetwood, Esqs., counsel for the prisoner. The jury who decided his fate was composed of Noah Hammon, Richard Whittaker, Jr., Thomas M. Armstrong, Andrew Sutton, John Beedle, William Mattison, Jacob Day, David Brands, Nathaniel Martin, William Gibbs, Charles Beatty, Peter P. Struble. It is said that from eight thousand to ten thousand persons witnessed his execution.

Wilhelmus Vanauken was executed Jan. 25, 1822, by Sheriff Vauclae Moore. He was tried and convicted for murdering his wife, Leah, in Montague township, in the spring of 1821. His trial took place at the November term of the court, before Justice William Russell. The trial was begun November 30th, and sentence was pronounced December 3d following. He was executed in a meadow on the lower side of Newton.

John Cruener was executed Jan. 23, 1862, by Sheriff Charles Arvis. His crime was the shooting of Allen Skellenger, in Sandyston township, on Sept. 15, 1861. He was tried before Justice Whelpley at the December term, 1861. The execution took place in the court-room, and was witnessed by about two hundred spectators. The poor fellow was so weak and unstrung that he had to be supported to the scaffold. It appeared more like hanging a dead than a live man. Cruener was a poor, weak-minded, and illiterate person, who could scarcely be regarded as responsible for what he did. Skellenger had acted the part of a bully over him for years, frightening him and threatening to whip him at every favorable opportunity. On the fatal day Skellenger met him in the woods, and at once commenced his old process of persecution. Cruner had his gun with him, and, retreating, forbade Skellenger to follow, or he would shoot. Skellenger thought him too much of a coward to do so, and, advancing, was fired at and killed. The almost universal verdict now is that it was a shame to hang him, and it is said that Justice Whelpley deeply regretted ever after that he was in any way instrumental in sending the poor ignorant wretch to the gallows.

* The account of this case appears in the New York Weekly Museum of Jan. 2, 1796.

The next execution was that of John Hughes for the brutal murder of his wife in the village of Ogdensburg on the 7th of January, 1875. Jack was a natural bully, and frequently abused his wife. On the evening of the above day he quarreled with her, and ended by knocking her brains out with a sharp axe. He then set fire to the clothing in the room and left the house. The fire was discovered by the neighbors and extinguished, and Mrs. Hughes was found reclining in a rocking-chair with six awful gashes in her head, through which her brains had oozed. She was ill and almost helpless at the time of the murder. The crime was a deliberate and most brutal one. After leaving the house Hughes became intoxicated, and while in that condition made inquiries concerning his wife which led to his detection. His trial was commenced before Justice Albert Reed on the 10th of May following. After a three days' trial the prisoner was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentence of death was passed a short time after. He was hanged by Sheriff William E. Ross, July 2d, in the presence of about sixty people, in an inclosure within the jail-yard.

Frederick Crill was hanged at Newton, N. J., on the 24th of April, 1880, for the murder of his daughter, Eliza Babcock, near Hamburg, N. J., on the 5th of June, 1879. About two years before, he had gone to live with his daughter and her husband, William Babcock, who treated him with the utmost kindness, notwithstanding his ill temper, which was partly aggravated by his feeble state of health. On the day of the murder Crill had been out shooting in the morning. When he came in he hung the gun over the door, between the kitchen and sitting-room, and then went in to dinner. The dinner passed pleasantly, and afterwards Babcock went to the corn-field and Eliza commenced washing clothes. The little boy, Eliza's son, and a great favorite of Crill's, commenced playing with a half-bushel measure. Crill had just taken the gun down preparatory to going out again. He told Eliza that the measure did not belong to them, and that the child would injure it. Then he replaced the gun, took the measure away from the child, and carried it up-stairs. To stop the little boy crying his mother got the measure and gave it to him again, and then went on with her washing. Crill again took down the gun, and just as he did so Eliza said something about the half-bushel which made him angry, and he raised the gun and fired. The charge entered the back of her head, dashing her brains and blood all over the side of the room. Crill looked up and saw his wife standing by speechless with horror. She soon recovered her voice and asked him what he had done that for, to which he answered, "She has aggravated and tantalized me till I can't stand it any longer, and I have put an end to it." That he intended at first not to make a confession is evident. He knew his wife's evidence could not be admitted against him, and she was the only witness. He told her not to speak of what she had seen, and then started for Hamburg to consult his counsel, first telling Babcock that Eliza had died in a fit. On the road he met three men, to whom he told the same story. He stopped at his lawyer's house, but he was out. He went to look for him, and on the street in Harrisburg he met Babcock with a crowd of men. The husband charged him with the murder, the crowd surrounded him, and in the excitement he made an admission; then, seeing he had given away his case, he confessed the whole matter and gave himself up to a justice. In September he pleaded not guilty to an indictment for murder, and the court assigned counsel to defend him. Up to a few days before the trial Crill talked and acted sensibly, although he appeared to be suffering from a nervous disease. Then his manner changed completely; he pretended to be unable to talk, and acted like a fool. His defense at the trial was insanity, but he acted his part so badly that the jury saw through it. He was convicted of murder in the first degree. A strong effort was made to have the sentence of death commuted, but the Court of Pardons refused to interfere. On April 1st, Governor McClellan granted him a reprieve of three weeks from April 3d, and on Wednesday, April 21st, he sent the death-warrant to Sheriff Decker, fixing the hanging for Saturday, the 24th. The last of his family to take leave of him was his daughter, Harriet Onshorn, who visited him on Monday. Before she was admitted she was searched, and a bottle of laudanum was taken from her. Crill was very much affected at parting with her, and cried pitifully. During the last few days he refused to see anybody, spending the greater part of his time in prayer.

This was the first execution that occurred in New Jersey under the new law, which admits of only twelve persons appointed by the court, twelve special deputies commissioned by the sheriff, three members of the condemned man's family, and two ministers of the gospel designated by the condemned, to be present and witness the event. The hanging took place in an inclosure, sixteen by twenty feet, adjoining the jail, in which a platform twelve feet square had been built, and on this platform stood the new gallows. At a quarter to eleven o'clock the jury of twelve men appointed by the court to witness and report the execution were sworn and subscribed their names. The following were the gentlemen named: William M. Smith, Thomas G. Bunnell, Richard F. Goodman, Whitfield Gibbs, Dr. Thomas Ryerson, Dr. Levi D. Miller, Dr. Martin Cole, Jr., Job J. Decker, Joseph McMicke, Nathaniel K. Bray, Obadiah P. Armstrong, and Luther Hill.

Frederick Crill was born in Warren County, near the Sussex County line. When he was about five years old his parents moved to Canisteer, in Sussex County. His parents were very poor and ignorant, and his mother was subject to fits and other diseases. Crill never received any education, except a little at Sunday-school and what he picked up himself. Notwithstanding this great disadvantage, he grew up to be a shrewd man. He probably inherited some nervous affections from his mother, and his temper, which was bad in his youth, grew worse as he grew older, until it became almost uncontrollable. He quarreled frequently with his friends and neighbors, and often these quarrels would end in a fight. He gained a reputation during his early years as a fighting man, and people said he was "able to lick anything around Canisteer." He appears to have always had a passion for women. At eighteen he fell in love with a young woman whom he called Fan Slack. After about a year he ceased his attentions, but she soon afterwards came to him with an infant and induced him to marry her. After living together a short time they disagreed, and Crill says they went before an officer and signed a paper mutually agreeing to separate, with the privilege of each marrying again. According to report, Crill soon afterwards married again and moved to Paterson, where it is said he shot his new wife, but had her buried secretly, and told such a plausible story that the matter did not get out until several years after, when it was revived at Sparta. Then Crill explained it by saying that he was cleaning his gun, not knowing it was loaded, and that it went off accidentally and shot her. Crill afterwards denied this story, and said he never had more than two wives. Not long after this Crill married his last wife, in Paterson, and returned to Sussex County, where a number of children were born to him. He chopped wood and worked in the mines for a living. He spent a great deal of time hunting game, and was a splendid marksman with both rifle and shot-gun. Once, when out shooting with his son, it is said, he became angry at the boy for not answering promptly when called, pointed his gun at him, and pulled the trigger; but the cap was defective, and the gun failed to go off. Another time, it is alleged, he threw a hatchet at the same boy, barely missing his head. It was not safe to anger him at any time when there was a dangerous weapon within his reach. For several years he was a member of the Methodist Church at Canisteer, and was quite an exhorter. At the same time he was thieving and gambling, but this did not become known until he sued a man for a gambling debt of forty dollars. He was immediately dropped from the church-roll, and he then said he could make more money serving the devil than the Lord. Crill had dyseptic trouble for nearly twenty years, and about four years ago it rendered him unfit to do manual labor. He had frequently pleaded in petty lawsuits before the justices of the peace, and when he was obliged to give up hard work he made this his regular business. He was a good speaker, and he made himself so well acquainted with the law applicable to justices' court cases that he frequently won suits over lawyers of large experience. He became known as "Crill the Pettifogger."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION IN SUSSEX COUNTY.

I.—EARLY STATUS OF THE PROFESSION.

ALTHOUGH the county had been settled for over half a century, it is doubtful if in the year 1766 it contained a single physician. At that time its people—engaged, as their descendants mostly are to-day, in agriculture and mining—were hardy, industrious, and healthy, consequently seldom required the aid of the physician, surgeon, or obstetrician. Roots and herbs were the common remedies, and the midwife was more in repute than the regular physician. In fact, medical men were few. Mr. Edsall, in his "Centennial Address" of 1853, speaking of Johnsonsburg—the first seat of justice of the old county—says, "Here Dr. Samuel Kennedy, the first practicing physician we have any word of, fixed his location. His practice extended so far over the county that professional rides of twenty or thirty miles were common events in his career. He was an able practitioner, and prepared a great number of students for the profession. Drs. Linn and Everitt, and several other physicians of the last generation, derived their first knowledge of the healing art from this Æsculapian veteran of old Sussex. Dr. Kennedy died, at an advanced age, in the year 1804. I may as well remark here as elsewhere that the practice of medicine has never been a lucrative business in this county. The air of our mountains is peculiarly favorable to health and longevity."

In 1824, when Warren was formed and Sussex County was restricted to its present limits, with a population of less than twenty thousand souls, the ratio of physicians was quite respectable, eleven doctors were at that date practicing medicine in the county,—viz., David Hunt, Samuel Hopkins, and Jacob Sharpe, of Newton township; Elijah Everitt, of Greene; Jacob and Elias H. L'Honmedieu, of Hardyston; Berret Haveus and Heman Allen, of Wantage; Jacob E. Hornbeck and Jacob L. Van Deusen, of Montague,—none of whom are now living.

"The leading mind was Dr. Fowler. He came into the county a few years prior to its division, and soon compelled all its physicians either to take license or retire. Into his hands speedily passed the consultation business, and his opinions may therefore be taken as a fair indication of the scientific status of the profession at that time. A very able practitioner of the present day [1866], who was contemporaneous with the last years of Dr. Fowler, says of him, 'He was by far the best naturally-endowed practitioner I ever knew.' Of acute perception, vivid imagination, and yet of judicial mind, an original thinker, his native talents placed him far in advance of his day, when Cullen and his disciple Gregory shaped the theory and practice of the country. He was as familiar with Brown and Darwin as with Cullen and with the other writers of his time. He knew the institutes of medicine, and could formulate as well as practice them. . . . He was fond of saying that 'the whole art of medicine consisted in knowing when to stimulate and when to deplete,'—an aphorism that requires but slight modification to be level with the present knowledge."⁸

In more recent times, with the growth of the county in population and wealth, has been a corresponding increase in luxury, which, with the injudicious use of stimulants and narcotics, has "conspired to disturb both mental and physical functions, to injure the various organs and cramp and distort the intellect. Whilst the influences named have increased the tendency to and complication of zymotic disease, disorders of nutrition, perversions of special functions, and derangements of the general balance, the growth and development of the county has so improved the face and soil of Sussex that malarious affections are manifestly diminishing."

As to the status of the profession in this county, if success be the criterion, the practitioners of Sussex enjoy a fair share of it.

II.—THE DISTRICT MEDICAL SOCIETY OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

Dr. Thomas Ryerson, in his report to the State society, in 1866, says, "The District Medical Society of Sussex County was formed in 1829 by Samuel Fowler, Samuel Marshall, Elias L'Hommédieu, John B. Beach, and Stephen Hedges, to whom were added Francis Moran and John R. Stuart." This is evidently an error, as the following documentary proofs clearly show. The first is a notice published in the Sussex Register, and bears date of "Newton, June 1, 1818." It is as follows:

"MEDICAL NOTICE.

"At the annual meeting of the medical society of New Jersey, which was held at New Brunswick on the 12th inst., appeared in the society Drs. Ruel Hampton and George Hopkins, who expressed a desire to have a society organized in the county of Sussex.

"Resolved, That a District Society be formed in the county of Sussex; and that Drs. Ruel Hampton, George Hopkins, Samuel W. Fell, Gideon Leeds, Jabez Gwinnap, John S. Hughes, George Van Nest, James Fowler, and Elias L'Hommédieu be authorized to meet at Mrs. Bassett's Inn, in Newton, on the second Tuesday in July next, at o'clock 11 A.M., for the purpose of organizing said society.

⁸ Dr. Thomas Ryerson's "Report to the State Medical Society," 1866.

"It is sincerely hoped that not only a general and punctual attendance will be given by those physicians appointed to organize the society, but also by all who are residents in the county.

"By order of the Society,

"Wm. M'KIBBICK, Sec'y."

The meeting was held and the society organized, as appears from the following, published in the same paper:

"MEDICAL SOCIETY.

"At a meeting of a respectable number of physicians of the county of Sussex, held at Newton, on the 14th inst., in conformity to a resolution of the medical society of the State of New Jersey, and agreeably to an act of the Legislature of the same, Dr. John S. Hughes was called to the chair and Dr. Samuel W. Fell was chosen secretary. It was then unanimously

"Resolved, That it is expedient that a district medical society be formed in and for the county of Sussex, in the State of New Jersey.

"After which a society was organized, to be known and distinguished by the name of the 'District Medical Society of the County of Sussex in the State of New Jersey.' The officers elected for the present year were John S. Hughes, President; Ruel Hampton, Vice-President; Samuel W. Fell, Corresponding Secretary; George Hopkins, Recording Secretary; and Elias L'Hommédieu, Treasurer. A considerable business was done, and the society adjourned to meet again on the 3d Tuesday of October next.

"By order of the Society,

"GEORGE HOPKINS, Sec'y.

"NEWTON, July 20, 1818."

The society also met in annual session in 1819 "at Mrs. Bassett's hotel," April 20th, as appears by the secretary's notice, dated April 5, 1819, and published in the Register. Whether this was the last, or whether any subsequent sessions were held, is not known, as the records are lost or destroyed. It evidently had become inoperative before 1823; otherwise, we cannot explain the following notice, published in the county press:

"TO PHYSICIANS.

"The physicians of the county of Sussex are requested to meet at Samuel Korbach's Hotel, in Newton, on the 1st Tuesday in October next (1823), at 10 o'clock A.M., for the purpose of choosing delegates to attend the State Medical Society, preparatory to the establishment of a District Medical Society for the county of Sussex."

Whether it was reorganized we cannot say; but if it was, it must have died out after a brief existence. In fact, the early years of this society's existence were marked by an indifference on the part of the profession in the county which rendered it difficult to sustain it, and was no doubt the cause of its frequent suspensions. After its resuscitation, in 1829, as before stated, for several years it had a struggle for perpetuity. Although it managed to hold its sessions regularly, it was with but feeble vitality. But since 1843, when the State society virtually demitted the licensing power to the counties, the District Medical Society of Sussex County has had a far more vigorous existence. Since that time nearly all the medical practitioners in the county have been members of the society, and so salutary an influence has been exerted upon the profession and the public by the mere momentum of the organization that few irregular practitioners have remained in the county.

The following is the roll of membership of the society since 1829, obtained from the society's records:

- Aug. 22, 1829.—*Samuel Fowler, *Stephen Hedges, *Elias L'Hommedieu, and *Seymour Halsey, named by the State society; ‡*John B. Beech, *Samuel Marshall, and *Francis Moran.

Andress; 1876, P. N. Jacobus; 1877, Martin Cole, Jr.; 1878, Ephraim Morrison; 1879, Hugh McD. Struble; 1880, Carlos Allen.

SECRETARY.

- 1829-32, John B. Beach; 1833-44, John R. Stuart; 1845-55, Anthony D. Morford; 1856-64, Thomas Ryerson; 1865-66, Eugene Schumo; 1867-68, David L. Duncan; 1869-75, Jonathan Havens; 1876-80, Levi D. Miller.

* Deceased.

† Removed from county.

‡ Withdrawn from the society.

§ David Hunt was also named, but his name is not on the roll.

At the late annual meeting, held June 8, 1880, Dr. Martin Cole, Jr., was appointed state reporter; Drs. Ferguson, C. V. Moore, and Jacobus, county reporters; Drs. J. Miller and C. K. Davison, delegates to the American Medical Association; Drs. E. Morrison, L. D. Miller, T. H. Andress, J. H. Morrison, and H. C. Fithian, delegates to the State Medical Society; Drs. C. V. Moore and J. Miller, delegates to the Warren County Medical Society; Drs. T. H. Andress and C. F. Cochran, delegates to the Morris County Medical Society; and Dr. T. H. Andress, essayist.

III.—REMINISCENCES AND PERSONAL SKETCHES.

The following reminiscences and personal sketches of Sussex County physicians are gathered from various sources, but we would here acknowledge our indebtedness to Dr. Jonathan Havens, of Newton, for much valuable information. That gentleman has for many years acted as the historian of the profession in Sussex County, during which time he has been indefatigable in his efforts to rescue from oblivion the incidents connected with the lives and practice of the medical men of his district during the generations that are passed.

SAMUEL KENNEDY was one of the earliest, if not the first physician, to practice in Sussex County. But little is known of his history. He was located early at "Log Jail" (Johnsonsburg), and died, at an advanced age, in 1804. Drs. Andrew Linn, Elijah Everitt, and others read medicine with him. He practiced for many years, and married, for his second wife, a Miss Shafer. Dr. Kennedy's farm was in Hardwick, near Johnsonsburg, and his residence, a stone house, is still, or was very recently, standing. George Armstrong was his executor. Dr. Kennedy belonged in that part of Sussex which has since become the county of Warren.†

BERRET HAVENS was one of the pioneer doctors in the present Sussex. He was the son of Jonathan Havens, M.D., and was a native of Sag Harbor, L. I. Born in 1762, about the age of twenty he emigrated to Sussex Co., N. J., crossing the country on horseback, and settling at Deckertown about the year 1782. It is not known where or with whom he pursued his medical studies, but he commenced practice very early, acquired a good reputation, and had an extensive practice. He was undoubtedly the first medical practitioner in Northern Sussex, and was possibly the earliest in what is the present county. He married, in the Clove, a daughter of William Titworth and a sister of Dr. John Titworth, of Wantage. He had only two children,—James C., and Jane T., who became the wife of Dr. Samuel Marshall, of Newton,—both deceased. Dr. Jonathan Havens, of Newton, is a grandson of Dr. Berret. He acquired by industry and economy quite a competence, and his homestead place, about two miles from Deckertown, towards † See chapter on "Medical Profession of Warren County," for further mention.

Sam Fowler

JOSEPH FOWLER, from whom Dr. Samuel Fowler is descended, was of English ancestry. He is mentioned as one of the first settlers near Mispat Kills, L. I., as early as 1665.

John Fowler, the father of Samuel, and sixth in descent from Joseph, resided at Newburg, N. Y. He married his cousin, Glorianna Fowler, the daughter of his uncle, Samuel Fowler.

Dr. Samuel Fowler, the subject of this sketch, was born Oct. 30, 1779, at the family homestead, Newburg, N. Y. He received a thorough academic education at the Montgomery Academy, and his medical education under the instruction of Dr. David Fowler, of Newburg, N. Y., and attended the lectures of the Pennsylvania Medical College, at Philadelphia, Pa. After completing his medical studies he removed to Hamburg, N. J., and was licensed to practice medicine in that State, being at that time a little over twenty-one years old. In 1808 he married Anna Breckenridge Thomson, the daughter of Col. Mark Thomson, of Changewater, N. J., who was a member of Congress from this State during the administration of Washington. After pursuing the practice of his profession at Hamburg, N. J., for a few years he removed to Franklin, N. J., where his first wife died, leaving one child, a daughter, the wife of the late Hon. Moses Bigelow, of Newark, N. J. In 1816 he married his second wife, Rebecca Wood Platt Ogden, daughter of Robert Ogden, Esq., formerly of Elizabethtown, N. J., but at this time of Sparta, N. J., where he removed in 1786. The children of this marriage were Mary Estelle, Henry Ogden, Robert Ogden, John, Rebecca Ogden, and Clarinda. He died Feb. 20, 1844, at Franklin, aged sixty-five.

An interesting account of the estimation in which Dr. Fowler was held as a physician is given by Dr. Thomas Ryerson in his report at the centennial meeting of the New Jersey Medical Society, held at New Brunswick, N. J., in 1866. In speaking of the early physicians of Sussex County, Dr. Ryerson says: "The leading mind was Dr. Fowler; he came into the county a few years prior to its division, and soon compelled all physicians to take license or retire. Into his hands speedily passed the consultation business, and his opinion may therefore be taken as a fair indication of the scientific status of the profession at that time."

The District Medical Society for the county of Sussex was formed in 1829 by Dr. Fowler and others. He was for many years owner of the iron-works at Franklin Furnace, N. J., which in their various branches he conducted, while at the same time he attended to the arduous duties of his profession, his medical practice extending all over the northern counties of this State and into the neighboring counties of Pennsylvania and New York. He also found time to take an active part in national and State politics, representing his county in the New Jersey Senate, and afterwards his State in the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Congresses, during the administration of Andrew Jackson, of whom he was a warm supporter and one of his earliest friends in New Jersey. As a mineralogist and geologist he is estimated by men of science as among the first in the country. He was a member of the leading scientific societies of his day, both in this country and in Europe. The rare mineral "fowlerite," first discovered by him, was named in his honor by his brother-mineralogists. He is supposed to have given the name of "franklinite" to the valuable ore of iron known by that name. He made it known to mineralogists over the United States and Europe, and awakened an interest in it which has since resulted in its successful development and manufacture. The extensive zinc mines of Sussex, affording the only red oxide of zinc known in the world, were once owned by him, though disposed of before his death. He made several efforts to have them worked, offering liberal inducements, but the untried nature of the ore and the difficulties of obtaining competent operatives caused a failure of his plans, without lessening in his mind the value of the ore and the ultimate success that would be likely to attend future attempts to work it.

In all his habits Dr. Fowler was strictly temperate and exemplary, an early riser and of untiring industry, and endeavored to devote all his leisure-moments to the attainment of useful knowledge. His remains are interred in the valley of Hardyston, which near half a century before his death he sought, a youthful stranger, with no fortune but that which he carried in his own brave heart and will to use with industry the talents which Providence had given him.

Beemerville, embraced about one hundred and forty acres at the time of his death. Among many other bequests, he made a liberal one to the Clove Church. He died suddenly, of apoplexy. His wife's demise occurred previously. He was one of the pioneer physicians of Northwestern Jersey, a man of considerable reputation and influence in his day, popular, and esteemed. He was of Irish descent, and had a habit of using the term "'Od zounds!" which caused the same to be applied to him as a sobriquet. He was a liberal contributor to and an attendant of the Clove Presbyterian Church, in the cemetery of which he was buried. The following is the inscription upon his monument:

"DOCT. BEBRET HAVENS,

Died Dec. 23, 1845,

In his 83rd year.

Here lie with those of

Wife and Daughter,

The remains of a man of worth.

He was born at Sag Harbor,

And settled in Wantage,

Where he lived a life of Industry and integrity;

and at his death,

to the Clove Church."

ANDREW LINN was born in Hardwick township, Sussex Co., in 1755. His parents were Joseph and Martha (Kirkpatrick) Linn, originally from Hunterdon County. He practiced first in Hardyston, but removed to Newton and practiced until his death, in April, 1799, aged forty-four. He was buried in the old cemetery.

CHARLES McCARTER.—It is asserted that Dr. Charles McCarter was an army surgeon from Sussex in 1776.*

ELIJAH EVERITT, son of Samuel Everitt and Nancy Thatcher, was born between 1770 and 1780, in Kingwood township, Hunterdon Co. His preparatory education was under the supervision of Rev. Dr. John Hanna, of Kingwood. He studied medicine with Dr. Samuel Kennedy. He had no license. He was married in January, 1800, after which time he practiced medicine at Greenville, where he had an extensive practice, covering an area of ten square miles. He died Jan. 11, 1850, at the house of William Mattison (son-in-law), of Sparta, whither he had gone on a visit, and was buried at the Yellow Frame. Between 1816 and 1818 he had in copartnership a Dr. Chadwick, who came to Greenville from Bottle Hill, or Madison, and who, about two years later, died there of typhus fever. Elijah Everitt was appointed justice in 1814 by joint meeting of the Legislature. He was the father of Samuel A. Everitt, of Branchville.

JOHN B. BEACH, son of Isaac and Mary Bigelow Beach, was born at Troy, Morris Co., N. J., April 5, 1785. He studied medicine with the late Dr. Lewis Condict, of Morristown, and commenced practice in 1811, in Frankford township, this county, continuing there in the active labor of his profession until the day of his death, which occurred at Branchville, June 19, 1851. From April, 1846, to April, 1849, Dr. J. L. Allen was his partner. He joined the District Medical Society in 1829. He married, in 1811, Elizabeth C., daughter of James Haggerty, Esq.; she died Nov. 23, 1823, and he married, in 1825, Eveline, daughter of Judge Thomas M. Armstrong, of Frankford, who lived until Feb. 10, 1849. He left two sons and five daughters. "As a physician he was efficient, faithful, and sympathizing. He ministered as willingly unto the poor as the rich. As a gentleman and scholar his dignified and courteous intercourse with his fellow-citizens endeared him to all. Dr. Beach was endowed with that order of intellect which would have qualified him to discharge honorably the duties of the most exalted station, but he was retiring, domestic, and unambitious." While he was a public-spirited man, the allurements of public life had few charms for him.

SAMUEL SWEZY SEWARD, father of the late eminent statesman William H. Seward, probably practiced medicine in this county. He was the eighth child of Col. John Seward, of Hardyston, who commanded the Second Sussex Regiment of Volunteers during the war of the Revolution. Col. John Seward was a son of Obadiah Seward, who came from Wales and settled on Lamington River, in Somerset County, where his son John was born May 22, 1730, and married Mary Swezy, March 22, 1751. Col. John Seward and his family settled in Hardyston prior to 1767, in which year his name first appears as a member of the board of freeholders from Hardyston township.

Dr. Samuel S. Seward was born in Hardyston, Sussex Co., Dec. 5, 1768, married Mary Jennings, of Goshen, N. Y., and after living for a time in Vernon removed thence to Florida, Orange Co., in 1795, where he pursued the practice of medicine during his life. The village of Florida, Orange Co., is just over the Sussex boundary, and distant five miles from Goshen, on the Pine Island branch of the Erie Railway. It contains the Samuel S. Seward Institute, an academy named in honor of its founder, Dr. Samuel Swezy Seward. In the heart of this village, fronting on the main street, is a little low one-story, gable-roofed wooden building, still standing, in which William H. Seward was born.

Dr. Samuel S. Seward, besides his practice as a physician, was a member of the Legislature of New York in 1804, and in 1815 county judge of Orange County. He was subsequently first judge, and became distinguished for his wealth and liberality. In 1846 he established the institute which bears his name, donating the grounds, erecting appropriate buildings, and endowing the school with the sum of twenty thousand dollars.

Dr. Seward died in 1849, leaving an estate of about three hundred and fifty thousand dollars and making his son William H., and his friend Maj. Grier, of Goshen, his executors. The will was proved in Sussex County, as well as in Orange, and is on record in the office of the surrogate of the former, at Newton. Matters connected with the estate brought William H. Seward to Newton several times after his father's death, and there he formed a pleasant acquaintance with the late B. B. Edsall, Esq., of the Sussex Register.

ROBERT W. COOKE, a father in medicine, and a light of the profession, who died, "full of years and full of honors," Dec. 27, 1867, was a native of Sussex County. He was the son of Dr. Ambrose Ellis Cooke, and was born at Newton, Jan. 21, 1797. He pursued the study of medicine, preliminary to entering the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York, with his father and Dr. Valentine Mott. Shortly after receiving his license as a practitioner of medicine he removed to Holmdel, Monmouth Co. (1820), where he continued in active practice till stricken with the sickness that preceded his death. His disease was peritonitis from ileo-cæcal obstruction. He was buried at the "Brick church" near Marlborough. A fine tribute to Dr. Cooke's memory, by the late Dr. Alfred B. Dayton, may be found in the annual transactions of the Medical Society of New Jersey for 1868.

STEPHEN HEDGES, son of Joseph Hedges and Elizabeth Woodhull, was born at Chester, Morris Co., Feb. 15, 1798. After a good scholastic education in the best schools of those days, he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Lewis Condict, of Morristown, and continued for a short time with Dr. George Hopkins, of Newton. He attended lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York, and received a diploma from that institution in April, 1819.*

Dr. Hedges was examined by the censors of "The District Medical Society for the County of Morris in the State of New Jersey" at Morristown, July 15, 1819, and was licensed to practice at that time. A letter of commendation signed by the board of censors by whom he was examined says,—

"His examination was not merely satisfactory, it was interesting and gratifying to the society in a very unusual degree. His medical reading appeared to have been extensive and discriminating; but what gave us uncommon pleasure were his judicious answers to an unusually wide range of practical questions, into which his intelligence led the members of the society. In one word, we do but express the unanimous sentiment of the society in saying he was one of the most accomplished candidates that has ever come before us."

The above was signed by William A. Whelpley, Lewis Condict, and John B. Johnes, then the board of censors at Morristown.

After the death of Dr. Hopkins, at Newton, in 1819, he succeeded to his practice, occupying the same

* It is supposed that he was the first graduate in medicine ever settled in Sussex. Dr. Fowler attended lectures, but it is not shown that he was a graduate; and if Dr. D'Abigne, of Sparta, was, it must have been of a foreign school. At that date (1819) but few attended more than one course of lectures, and were licensed to practice by censors.—Dr. Hives.

house. "Like most young physicians, Dr. Hedges found his path to success tedious and difficult, but his kindly qualities of mind, united to professional skill, won him firm and fast friends," by which he gained an extensive practice throughout the county, and held the same until his death from typhoid fever, Aug. 10, 1845.

The memory of Dr. Hedges needs no further record than the fact of the well-sustained recommendation given by the board of censors, by which he was introduced to the county. In 1824 he was married to Rachel Ann, daughter of Jonathan Baldwin, of Newton, where she is still living. At the time of his death he left seven children,—Elizabeth, Sarah, Joseph, Mary, Frances, Julia, and Emma. The son, Joseph, is a practicing physician at Branchville; Sarah, now deceased, married Theodore Little, a prominent lawyer of Morristown; and Elizabeth, also deceased, was the wife of George H. Nelden, the present clerk of Sussex. The remaining children surround the fireside of their mother's home, where, mourning their bereavements, they still remain a united family.

ALEXANDER LINN, son of Hon. John Linn, was born at Harmony Vale, Sussex Co., July 17, 1811. He married Julia, a daughter of the late Horace Vibbert, in 1845. He was a graduate of Union College, 1831; began the study of medicine under Dr. R. Byington at Johnsonsburg, N. J.; attended lectures at Jefferson Medical College, 1833-36, receiving his diploma from that institution in March, 1836. In 1837 he located at Deckertown, where his skill and earnest devotion to his calling soon gave him command of a large practice, which he retained until prostrated by his last illness. He formed a partnership with W. H. Linn, May 1, 1849, which was dissolved in April, 1856. He was a great student, and possessed a remarkable memory. Became a member of the Sussex County District Medical Society in 1840, and his associates looked up to him "as the most brilliant star in their circle." He was a member of the State Medical Society, and was twice elected as one of its vice-presidents. After months of great suffering he died, May 12, 1868, leaving a widow and four sons, together with a large circle of warm friends and patrons, to mourn the loss of one who, had he cared less for theirs and more for his own health, might have yet been spared; but such was not his conviction of duty.

JOHN R. STUART was born in Newton, N. J., March 11, 1809, and died there Jan. 15, 1873. He was adopted, reared, and educated by his uncle, Daniel Stuart; his educational advantages were of the best. In 1827 he was graduated from Rutgers College, and began the study of medicine in his native town with the late Stephen Hedges, then one of the most popular physicians of the county. He attended lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, and was licensed to practice in the fall of 1831. He at once commenced his labors at Newton, and in the following spring united himself with the District Medical Society, which he served for several years as an efficient secretary, and in 1849 was elected its president. His interest in the society was maintained throughout his life.

In February, 1843, he went to Sparta to take the practice left vacant by Dr. D. M. Sayre's removal to Morris County. Soon after this change Dr. Hedges died, and Dr. Stuart (in 1845) returned to Newton, where he established an extensive practice, which he pursued with energy for ten or twelve years. After twenty-five years of active professional life he gradually withdrew from practice and devoted most of his time to the sale of drugs, in which business he was engaged at the time of his death. His confidential friends, Judge D. S. Anderson, of Newton, and Secretary of State Henry C. Kelsey, of Trenton, were his executors.

Dr. Stuart was well known as an excellent physician and a courteous gentleman, of fine hospitality, generous to the poor, and much beloved by his patients and friends. His social qualities were remarkable. As a physician he was guided more by the cautious experience of an observing mind than by medical theories; trusting much to the curative efforts of Nature, he was content to be her ministering servant, finding his chief employment in removing the obstructions which impeded her wise course to returning health.

JOHN TITSWORTH.—The first of the name to settle within the limits of Sussex County was William Titsworth, one of the first settlers of the township of Wantage. He came from the Neversink settlement during the French and Indian war, driven thence by the hostilities that then prevailed, and located on the tract of land near Deckertown on which his descendants have since resided. He was the great-grandfather of Dr. Titsworth; died March 4, 1791.

Stephen Titsworth, son of the first William, was born on April 8, 1734, and early occupied land in Wantage township, near that of his father. He married Catharine Coykendall, and had children,—Sarah, born Nov. 5, 1752, died March 14, 1777; William, born Aug. 12, 1758; Henry, born Dec. 3, 1764; and Josiah, born Feb. 23, 1774. Stephen Titsworth died April 17, 1777, and his wife on Nov. 17, 1805.

William Titsworth, father of the doctor, was born in Wantage township, on the date indicated above, and occupied the ancestral acres of his father and grandfather. Over one hundred years ago he erected the stone house still standing on the Clove road, in Wantage, near the residence of his grandson, William; this was his dwelling-place for life. Besides being a thrifty and industrious farmer, owning a large tract of land, he operated a grist- and saw-mill on the Clove stream, near by. He took an active interest in church affairs, was one of the signers of the original petition for forming the Clove Church, and was for many years an elder in that body. His wife was Margaret Middaugh, born Oct. 8, 1757, and the children were Jane, born March 24, 1780 (married Dr. Berret Havens, an old and prominent physician of Wantage), died Jan. 9, 1807; Stephen, born July 24, 1783; Amos, born June 23, 1787, died Feb. 19, 1856; John, born April 19, 1793, and the subject of this sketch. William Titsworth died March 3, 1837, and his wife, Margaret, on March 31, 1841. His property was divided between his sons Amos and John, and is still occupied by their descendants.

John Titsworth

Dr. John Titsworth was born in Wantage township on April 19, 1793. His early life was spent on his father's farm, where he passed through the usual routine experiences of a farmer's son. When about fourteen years of age he left home for school at Chester, in Morris County, where he received the benefits of careful academic instruction, and subsequently attended the academy at Newburg, N. Y. Being thoroughly fitted, he entered Yale College, at which institution he was graduated in the class of 1813. Among his classmates were Samuel B. Ruggles, Daniel Lord, Theodore Dwight, Joshua Leavitt, William L. Stores, and others who have since become favorably known in connection with the public affairs of the country.

After graduation Dr. Titsworth pursued the study of medicine in New Haven, and attended full courses of lectures in both New York and Philadelphia. Upon being duly licensed as a physician he commenced the practice of his profession in New Haven, and also with a partner engaged in the drug business in that city. He continued in active business life at that place until the year 1826, when, owing to failing health, he removed to his native township and settled on the old homestead. A few years later he erected the present residence of his son, William Titsworth, where he passed the remainder of his life.

For many years he practiced as a physician in Wantage, and was recognized as a learned and skillful practitioner. Possessed of an inquiring mind, he studied his cases carefully, and brought to their consideration the most exact and scientific treatment. He kept abreast with the discoveries of the times, and carefully avoided the grooves and routine habits of his medical brethren. He was frequently called into consultation by other physicians, and his skill was greatly appreciated by them. In his later days he somewhat relinquished his practice, and devoted his time to reading, study, and scientific investigation, which was more congenial to him than the details of practice, as well as less wearing on his somewhat weakened constitution. He took daily exercise in his garden, and was greatly interested in horticultural affairs. In politics he was a Whig, and was also one of the main pillars of the Clove Presbyterian Church, of which he was for many years a trustee and an elder. He was a man of generous impulses, of warm and liberal spirit, of strict integrity, and a prompt contributor to the various benevolent and philanthropic enterprises of his day. After a long life of usefulness and honor he passed away on Feb. 1, 1873, and was laid to rest with his fathers in the neighboring cemetery.

Dr. Titsworth's wife, whom he married on May 31, 1819, was Abigail, daughter of Deacon Nathan and Mary Beers, of New Haven, Conn. She was born April 10, 1795, and died Dec. 27, 1863. The children of the union were Barret Havens, born July 25, 1822, died April 1, 1837; William, born July 12, 1824 (residing on the old homestead); Margaret M., born May 27, 1828 (wife of Mahlon Cooper, of Warwick); and Mary P., born Dec. 12, 1829, died July 26, 1830.

JACOB HORNBECK, third son of Philip Hornbeck, was born in Rochester, Ulster Co., N. Y., about the time of the Revolution. He studied medicine in his native town with Dr. Abram K. Dewitt, completing the course in October, 1800, after which he removed to Montague, Sussex Co., N. J., then known as the Minisink Valley. He was licensed to practice in this State, Oct. 5, 1802. The next year he married Esther, only daughter of John I. Westbrook. As a citizen he was honored and respected. He served one term in the Legislature (elected in 1820) with great acceptance. He was a physician of decided abilities, and sustained a high reputation among his professional brethren. In his early practice he rode for miles into the wilderness of Pike Co., Pa., and for a great distance over the hills of Sussex, encountering dangers unknown to the present day. He continued in active practice until a few years before his death.

Dr. Hornbeck was a man of extreme modesty and reserve; he eschewed politics, and, with one exception, held no public office. He died Sept. 12, 1859, at the residence of his son-in-law, Archibald Drake, in Frankford, and was buried at the Reformed Dutch church of Montague, in the neighborhood of where he had for fifty-nine years labored to alleviate and minister to the ills of the people. His daughter, Sarah, became the wife (in 1854) of Dr. Cornelius Stillwell, of Caroline, Tompkins Co., N. Y. His son, Jacob E., is a miller at Deckertown, this county.

JACOB T. SHARP, son of Edward Sharp, of Hamburg and Newton, and Martha Thomson, daughter of Mark Thomson, of Marksboro', was born at Newton, N. J., May 16, 1802, graduated at Princeton, and studied medicine in Philadelphia with Thomas C. James, professor of obstetrics in the University of Pennsylvania, from which he obtained a diploma in 1825, at the age of twenty-three. Not long after this (about 1826) he commenced practice at Newton, where he remained about one year, and then went to Washington, Warren Co., where he practiced for three or four years. He thence removed to Philadelphia, and three years later to Salem, N. J., where he practiced fifteen years; then relinquished his business to his son, Edward S. Sharp, M.D., and removed to a large tract of land at Port Elizabeth, Cumberland Co., N. J.

SEYMOUR HALSEY was born at Monroe, Morris Co., N. J. He studied medicine with Dr. John B. Johnes (?) at Morristown. In 1824 he began the practice of medicine at Sparta, and was one of the original members of the District Medical Society. In 1829 he left Sparta and went to New York, where he attended a course of lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, graduating in 1830. Through the influence of his intimate friend, Dr. John R. Rhineland, he afterwards entered one of the city hospitals, in which he served until after the season of cholera. He then went to Newark, N. J., where he remained but a few years, being persuaded by his friends to go to Vicksburg, Miss. While there he was married to a widow, with whom he lived but a short time before his death took place. He was a surgeon in the Mexican war.

FRANCIS MORAN was born in the county of Leitrim, Ireland, Sept. 29, 1793, and died in Newton, of an affection of the heart, Dec. 24, 1854. He commenced his medical education in Trinity College, Dublin, and after coming to this country continued his studies with Dr. Young, of Amity, N. Y., and attended a course of lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. He commenced the practice of medicine in this county about 1821, at House's Corner, where he remained but a few months, when he came to Newton. He became a member of the District Medical Society of Sussex County, Aug. 22, 1829. As a physician and surgeon he stood at the head of the profession, combining high scientific knowledge with that wisdom and experience which only mature age and a life devoted to the practice of the profession can achieve. Not only medicine, but philosophy, mineralogy, chemistry, agriculture, and other kindred topics, shared in his studies and investigations. He was not alone the friend, but the consistent advocate, of temperance. His death was sincerely mourned by the whole community in which he had lived.

DAVID HUNT was a son of Richard Hunt, of Hardwick. His early life was one of toil and privation, and whatever prominence he acquired in the profession to which he was so ardently attached may be mainly attributed to his studious course in early life. His tutor was Thomas C. Teasdale, then principal of Newton public school. He followed Teasdale to the South, and finally commenced the study of medicine at Yale College. He afterwards entered the office of Dr. Linn, and at the time of the latter's death they were partners. For about a year (1815-16) he was a partner of Dr. George Hopkins. He lived on the hill, in the old Johnson house, now owned by Chester L. Teel. He died in Newton, and is buried in the old cemetery, where the inscription on his tombstone reads:

"To commemorate departed worth, this stone is erected sacred to the memory of Dr. David Hunt, by his affectionate daughters. He died March 2, 1831, aged 54 years."

ELIAS L'HOMMEDEU, one of the original members of the District Medical Society of Sussex County at its formation, in 1829, was born in 1794; commenced practicing at Hamburg in 1816. May 20th, that year, he announced his advent by an advertisement, in which he stated that he had "taken board at James Horton's Inn," and would punctually attend the calls of all who should favor him with their patronage. Edsall & L'Hommeieu operated iron-works in Hamburg for a number of years. He was appointed "judge and justice" in 1832, and again in 1837, serving for ten years. He appears to have retired from active practice, for an advertisement dated Newark, N. J., April 1, 1846, associates him ("late of Hamburg") with John Y. Baldwin in the wholesale grocery and commission business. He died at his residence, in West Bloomfield, July 28, 1853, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. He was a popular man, a successful physician, and worked faithfully and hard while he practiced, but the later years of his life were devoted largely to commercial enterprises.

JACOB L. VAN DEUSEN was of Holland descent. Jacob Lansing Van Deusen was born at Albany, N. Y., July 17, 1785. After a classical education at the Cambridge (N. Y.) Academy, he chose and commenced the study of medicine, under Dr. Woodruff, of Albany. In 1806 he received his degree from the University of the State of New York. He then attended lectures in Philadelphia, under the celebrated Drs. Rush and Physick. In 1808 he married Nancy I., daughter of Sanford Clark, Esq., of Albany, and there he practiced for twelve years. After four years more spent at Genesee, N. Y., he changed his abode for the last time, settling at Montague, among the healthful hills of "old Sussex." There he completed the faithful work of a life, and there, where he experienced life's vicissitudes and trials, as well as comforts and joys, he ended his days. He was happily devoted to his profession, pursuing it with his whole heart. He was much interested in educational matters.

Dr. Van Deusen's specialty in surgery was in diseases of the eye, he being quite successful in operations for the relief of cataract. About 1860 he relinquished his practice. He died Sept. 25, 1867. Of his eight sons, six are living and engaged in pursuits closely allied to that of their father, five being druggists. For thirty-five years and until his decease he was a useful member of the Reformed Church of Montague.

JOHN JORDAN LINDERMAN, an eminent physician of his time (born 1791; died July 19, 1872), soon after completing his medical studies, in 1818, settled at the "Brick House," now Montague, Sussex Co., where he successfully practiced for a year or more, and then removed to Pike Co., Pa. During his long residence at the last-named place his services were frequently sought and rendered in the region from Flatbrookville to Tuttle's Corner. During 1846-47 he and his son Dr. Henry R. (late director of the United States Mint) had an extensive practice in Sandyston and Montague during an epidemic of bilious fever with decided typhoid tendency. His successful treatment of this class of ailments won for him an eminence which he maintained during the continuance of his professional career.

Dr. Linderman, when he settled at the Brick House, was associated with Dr. Jacob Hornbeck, or took his practice.

DAVID EUEN.—It is stated that Dr. Euen was a native of Elizabeth, N. J.; his parents were William and Margaret Euen, of that city. He received a thorough medical education, and was a skillful physician and surgeon. He studied medicine with Dr. Treat, of New York City. It is also related that he was a surgeon on an English vessel before the Revolution. The time of his advent in Sussex is not known. He was a bachelor, and eccentric in his habits. He lived in an old, unfinished house, which stood where is now David Foster's residence. He died on his birthday, June 3, 1814, aged sixty. It is supposed he was buried in Newton. The second wife of Dr. R. Byington (deceased), of Belvidere, is his niece.*

HEMAN ALLEN, youngest son of Elisha Allen, was born at Williston, Vt., July 4, 1779. He commenced his medical studies with his elder brother, Elibu, continued them with Dr. Phillips, of Phillipsburg, C. E., attended lectures in Columbia College during the winter of 1805-6, and clinical lectures in New York

* Dr. W. S. Johnson.

Hospital. He was examined and licensed to practice in New York State in 1807, and settled in Unionville, Orange Co. From thence he removed to Deckertown, this county, about 1820, and followed his profession there for twenty-five years. It is said that for forty years he suffered frequent attacks of pneumonia, from one of which he finally died, Dec. 22, 1859. He was buried in the yard of the First Baptist church of Wantage, now known as "Deckertown Cemetery."

HULL ALLEN, a native of Westport, Conn., and licensed at Newark, N. J., came to Sparta about 1820, but remained only a few months, as Dr. Vail, who came about the same time, paid him to surrender the field to him. Dr. Allen then went to Sugar Loaf, but subsequently returned to Connecticut, to Milford, where, after over fifty years' professional labor, he was still located in June, 1875.

JONAS ROE was born in Orange Co., N. Y., Aug. 26, 1792. The vicinage of his birth and the correlation of dates incline us to think he was a brother of Drs. Jacob D. and Thomas Roe. He was graduated from the University of New York, and received a diploma or license from the "Medical Society of the Eastern District of State of New Jersey." Married, in 1817, Matilda Hopkins; commenced practice near Orangeville, Pa.; in 1820 was located in Sparta township, and removed to Beemerville about 1825; died at Bristol, Elkhart Co., Ind., May 12, 1870, of pulmonary consumption. His wife died in 1859, and was buried at Bloomsburg. He practiced about fifty years in Sussex County and vicinity. He ranked among the first as a physician, and was no less successful in operative surgery, among other cases being several difficult operations for cataract.

CHARLES VAIL was born in Morris Co., N. J., Sept. 25, 1793; commenced the study of medicine about the year 1817, under Dr. John S. Darcy, then of Hanover; subsequently attended lectures in New York, and was admitted to practice by the censors of the medical society of Morris (or Essex) in 1821, and immediately entered upon his medical career in Sparta, Sussex Co. In 1824 he removed to Dauphin Co., Pa., and the next year to Stroudsburg, where he married and remained until his death, Jan. 19, 1836. He left one son, a member of the Philadelphia bar. His widow still survives. "He was an intelligent, conscientious, devoted, and most faithful physician. While he lived he enjoyed the confidence and esteem of those who knew his worth. Dying, he left no stain upon his name."

THOMAS ROE was the son of Benjamin and Drucilla Van Kirk. He was born in Frankford township, N. J., Dec. 13, 1807. He died of heart disease at Sandyston, Oct. 23, 1878. Licensed to practice by the president of the State Medical Society, Sept. 29, 1832; married Susan Smith in Sandyston, March 22, 1834; commenced practice in Milton, Morris Co., in 1832, and about fifteen months subsequent removed to Sandyston, where he followed his profession until his death. He was an early member of the District Medical Society of Sussex County. In a letter which he wrote to the secretary of the society, July 1, 1869, he says, "I believe I am one of the three oldest of the present members of the society."

JACOB D. ROE, an elder brother of the above, born at the same place, Dec. 21, 1795; attended lectures at College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, in winter of 1819-20; licensed by State society, May 3, 1820; commenced practice at Milton, N. J.; came to Beemerville in 1836-37; in 1820 married Cynthia Headley, and had six children; died of typhoid fever at his home, in Frankfort township, Nov. 11, 1857, and was buried at Beemerville. He was of good standing in the profession, and was a modest, unassuming, upright man. A sound judgment, united with indomitable energy, made him a successful practitioner.

DAVID COOK was born in the year 1795, at Hanover, N. J.; his parents' names were William and Elizabeth. He was a graduate of the New York Medical College, and received his diploma in 1818. He studied with Dr. Darcy; commenced his practice at Milford, Pa., in 1818, and the following year was married to Sarah, daughter of Henry Beemer. Soon after, he located at Beemerville, and for ten years was a physician and surgeon there, until his death (1830), caused by internal injuries resulting from being thrown from his carriage. His wife was born 1799; died in 1873. Of his six children, two are deceased.

GEORGE HOPKINS was born Nov. 23, 1794, on Long Island. His mother was a Woodhull, related (how nearly is not known) to Gen. Woodhull, of Revolutionary fame. He read medicine and attended lectures in New York (College of Physicians and Surgeons); came to Newton in 1815, and was for a short time associated with Dr. David Hunt. The copartnership was dissolved Feb. 14, 1816. He was a well-read and skillful physician and surgeon, and had attained no little reputation in his profession when his promising life was cut short at the early age of twenty-five, Oct. 28, 1819. His wife was Eliza M., daughter of John Johnson, Esq.; she died in 1826. He left two sons,—Samuel J. and George W. He was a member of and an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Newton.

Dr. Hopkins died in the house which he built, on Newton green, now occupied by Dr. Miller, and was buried in the old graveyard, as was also his wife.

HARVEY HALLECK was a son of Israel Halleck, of Monnt Hope, Orange Co., N. Y., where the doctor was born in 1802; followed in early life the vocation of a school-teacher. He subsequently studied medicine with Dr. Newkirk, of Unionville, and afterwards with Dr. Stephen Hedges. He became a successful practitioner. He followed his profession for a short time at Middletown, N. Y., Marksboro', N. J., Hillsboro', Pa., Johnsbury, N. J.; then went to Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1842, returning to this State in the spring of 1847, when he located in Newton, N. J., with his office and residence at Mrs. McCarter's, opposite the Presbyterian church. But he suffered for years from chronic neuralgia, which finally caused him to relinquish his profession and take charge of the Newton Academy. He had discharged the duties of principal but a few months when he was taken ill of jaundice. His malady had a fatal issue; he died June 21, 1852.

"Dr. Halleck was a man of extensive acquirements and fine abilities." He was made an honorary member of the District Medical Society of Sussex County, April 20, 1846. He married Eleanor McCarter, who was a daughter of John McCarter ("Old Man of the Mountains"), of Morris Co., N. J.; she is still living in Newton.

DAVID MELANCTHON SAYRE was born March 26, 1807, at Hanover, Morris Co., N. J.; he was of English descent. At an early age he began the study of medicine with the late Dr. John S. Darcy, of Newark, but then at Hanover. In 1829 he took charge of the practice at Sparta, vacated by Dr. S. Halsey. While practicing at Sparta he attended lectures, and received his degree of M.D. from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, in 1836. In 1843 he went to Hanover, and there for a short time was a partner of Dr. Kitchell. A year later he returned to Sparta (1844), "at the urgent solicitations of its citizens." He practiced there until 1863, when he went to the Hanover homestead farm; but, having little taste for an agricultural life, in February, 1865, he moved to Newton and entered into partnership with Dr. Stuart and G. L. Smith in the drug-firm of J. R. Stuart & Co. The following year he withdrew from the business, opened an office, and resumed professional labors, although for a few years prior to his demise he had given up general practice. He died suddenly, of heart disease, Aug. 3, 1876.

Dr. Sayre was in some respects a peculiar man. He never married, nor was he in any degree fond of children. Fortune smiled upon him in a pecuniary sense, for he became quite wealthy, yet was as generous and liberal as the majority of his brethren or fellow-citizens. His gift of five thousand dollars to the Newton library is proof of this. He was a member of the District Medical Society, joining it in 1834. "He was honest, imbued with self-respect," very ambitious, had a great love for the science of medicine, of which he was a life-long student and distinguished representative. His professional career was a successful one, in all respects.

DR. D'AUBIGNE was a native of Waterford, Ireland, and owned a large property there. Having been an active participant in the Irish Rebellion, he was compelled to flee. He sold his property and embarked for America, landing in New York, some time prior to 1809, with fifty-three thousand guineas in gold. He invested forty thousand dollars in the first cotton-factory established in Paterson, which was entirely destroyed by fire in 1809. He came to Sparta, this county, from Milton, N. J., in 1818. In 1821 he moved to Pennsylvania, and about three years later died at Bethany, Pa., in the almshouse. He was a remarkably benevolent man.

THOMAS RYERSON, son of Judge Thomas C., and grandson of Martin Ryerson, was born at Myrtle Grove, Sussex Co., Feb. 18, 1821. He was graduated at Lafayette College in 1840; studied medicine with Dr. Hedges; was graduated at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, in 1844. He immediately commenced the practice of medicine at Belvidere, Warren Co., although he remained but a short time, removing thence to Newton, Aug. 22, 1845. At this place he has since resided and practiced for a period of over thirty-five years. He is the prominent physician of the county. He was president of the State Medical Society in 1857,—the only Sussex County physician who ever enjoyed that distinction. Besides being a Fellow of that organization, he has been a prominent and official member of the medical society of this county. In 1878 he became a member of the American Academy of Medicine, then recently organized. In 1866-67, at the outbreak of Asiatic cholera, he was appointed by Governor Ward a member of the sanitary commission which instituted the first measures for securing general and local health boards for this State.

Dr. Ryerson's contributions to the literature of his profession may be found in the published "Transactions" of the State Society. He took a very prominent part in the raising of troops in Sussex County during the late war of the Rebellion,—services which he gladly rendered gratuitously, and for which he is justly entitled to a large meed of praise. He was also medical examiner for recruits and exempts under the first draft. In 1850 he led to the altar Margaret Matilda Brouwer, of New York City; has one son, Henry O., a druggist in Newton. Mrs. Ryerson died in January, 1878. Dr. Ryerson is a member of the Presbyterian Church of his town, uniting with it in 1846, and often has been its representative in the Presbytery and Synod, and in 1876 in the General Assembly which met at New York City.

JOSEPH S. BEEMER was a son of Joseph and Phoebe Beemer. He was born at Beemerville, May 9, 1820. He began the study of medicine with Alexander Linn, and was graduated at Jefferson College, Philadelphia, about the year 1842. He commenced to practice the healing art at Hamburg, where he remained for eight years, after which he removed to Beemerville (Wykertown?) and practiced, but one year later he died,—May 14, 1851. He was buried at Beemerville. May 11, 1843, he married Miss Catherine A. Lewis, of Pleasant Valley, Sussex Co., N. J. He associated himself with the County Medical Society in 1846.

JOHN NEWTON DEE was a native of Connecticut, but was formerly a resident of Sussex County, of whose medical society he was elected a member in 1856. He also practiced at Marksboro', Warren Co., and died there, May 22, 1857, of phthisis pulmonalis. A monument was erected to his memory by the District Medical Society of Sussex County.* He read medicine with Dr. John Miller.

SAMUEL MARSHALL was of Irish nativity. He came to Newton in 1820, and established himself in the office of the late Dr. Hopkins. He practiced in Newton until 1835, when he removed to the West, where he was soon after shot by some unknown party while seated in the sheriff's office. He was one of the first members of the Sussex County Medical Society. His wife was Jane T., only daughter of Dr. Beret Havens, of Wantage; she died Sept. 17, 1833, in her twenty-third year.

Dr. Marshall was a practical and successful practitioner, a leader in the profession during his stay in this county, much consulted, and greatly esteemed both in and out of the medical fraternity.

JOHN MILLER.—Andrew Miller, grandfather of Dr. Miller, was of German descent, came from Pennsylvania, and settled in Harmony township, Warren Co., N. J., during its early history, and there carried on farming until his death. He was the owner of considerable real estate, and was one of the builders of the Harmony Presbyterian church, of which he was a member. He was also engaged in the French and Indian war. Of his children, William, seventh son, was an electropathic physician in New York City, and accumulated a large property by his practice; Joseph was a surveyor, and remained on the old homestead, near the Harmony church.

There were seven sons altogether, of whom Peter, father of Dr. John Miller, was born in Harmony, and married Margaret, daughter of Tunis Smith, of the same place. For several years he was connected with the Presbyterian Church of Harmony, but subsequently became one of the pioneers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in that locality. He belonged to the Jeffersonian school of politics, and became a member of the Republican party upon its organization.

His children are John, Tunis, Levi De Witt, Asa, Christiana (wife of William Kimple, of New York), and Sarah (wife of Henry Woolever, of Harmony).

Dr. John, eldest son of Peter Miller, was born in Harmony, in 1816. His early education was obtained in the schools of his native place. At the age of sixteen he became a clerk in his father's store at Harmony, and about the same time began the study of medicine with Dr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania. Here he remained for five years, and for four years he was engaged in mercantile business near Blairstown, N. J. He completed the study of medicine with Dr. Albright, Paulina, a physician of some prominence in New Jersey, with whom he practiced for some time. After attending two courses of lectures he was graduated at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, and in the spring of 1846 settled at Andover, Sussex Co., N. J., where he has since resided, remaining in continuous practice.

Dr. Miller became a member of the Sussex County Medical Society soon after his settlement at Andover, and was for one year its president, and was also one of its board of censors. For several years he has acted as reporter for the society. He is also a member of the Medical Society of New Jersey, and of the American Medical Association.

As a physician Dr. Miller is skillful, judicious, and successful, and his long and varied experience has given the people comprising his large ride full opportunity to judge of his ability as a physician, which they hold in highest esteem.

Dr. Miller's location at Andover, in near proximity to the mines, where frequent and serious accidents occur to the employees, has given him a great opportunity for the practice of surgery, with which he is said to be so familiar that during his entire practice of thirty-four years, in nearly every case his operations, although often difficult, have been skillfully and successfully performed.

Dr. Miller is a supporter and earnest advocate of the most successful mode of treating traumatic tetanus, and he acted as consulting physician in the Smith case, attended by Dr. Cook,—a case which attracted considerable attention and was reported. In this case Dr. Miller's advice was followed and the man cured.

In many instances Dr. Miller has undertaken, with successful results,—even to saving life,—surgical operations thought impracticable by other attending physicians. One very difficult and peculiar case was his removal of a malignant tumor from the face of the late Robert Slater, of Andover; another, the successful extraction of a malignant tumor, of the size and form of a hen's egg, occupying the space between the angle of the jaw and the parotid gland, crowding the carotid artery and jugular vein, and covered in part by the facial artery and vein, without the necessity of ligating a single blood-vessel. The patient was a Miss Syckles, aged fourteen.

Characteristic of Dr. Miller is his great care for and sympathy with those whom he treats, and his attention is devoted none the less to those from whom he expects no remuneration besides good will than to those who are obliged to make no sacrifice to pay him for his services. His wife was Rhoda, daughter of Christopher and Elizabeth Sharp, of Harmony; they have an only child,—Frank.

Dr. Levi De Witt, third son of Peter Miller, was born Feb. 22, 1836, and received his preliminary education at the common school and at the Belvidere Classical Academy. He began the study of medicine with his brother, Dr. John Miller, at Andover, in 1852, attended lectures, and was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, in New York, in 1855. He established himself in practice at Lafayette, Sussex Co., immediately after his graduation, and there remained until 1862, when he was appointed assistant surgeon of the First Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and for two years he was the only surgeon of that regiment in the Army of the Potomac. To give a history of Dr. Miller's career in the army would be to narrate the battles, marches, privations, and sufferings of his regiment during the entire time of its service, in which his skill as a surgeon was fully developed and proved successful in difficult operations.

Returning from the army, Dr. Miller settled in New York City, where he carried on a drug-store and also practiced his profession for three years. In 1858 he settled in Newton, N. J., and has remained in the continuous practice of his profession since. Dr. Miller has been a member of the Sussex County Medical Society, and has served as secretary of the society for several years. His wife is Mary E., daughter of Wesley Cummins, of Lafayette, whom he married Sept. 30, 1858. Their children are Fred Sherman and Sayre Wesley (deceased).

LEWIS WESTFALL, son of Matthew Westfall, Esq., of Wantage, this county, was born in that township, Oct. 29, 1839; pursued his earlier medical studies at Cambridge, N. Y., under the direction of Dr. Henry Gray, and was graduated at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, in the city of New York, in March, 1863. In the same month he was appointed acting assistant surgeon in the United States navy, and was ordered to duty in the West, on the United States gunboat "Queen City." He was a faithful officer, and admired and respected by his shipmates. At the battle of Clarendon he was wounded; after a few months' absence on sick-leave, he returned to duty on the United States steamer "Siren," from which he was transferred to the United States hospital "Pinckney," at Memphis. Honorably discharged Nov. 6, 1865, with especial commendations from his superiors in the medical department, he returned to his home, resting and recruiting his impaired health until 1867, when the late Dr. Alexander Linn invited him to take charge of his wide practice. He entered upon the work with zeal, but his strength was unequal to the task. In February, 1869, he was compelled to relinquish practice, and on the 29th of May in the same year he died, greatly regretted by all, leaving a young wife, to whom he had been united but a few months. He was a physician of attainments and promise, and as a man and a citizen won deserved esteem.

JONATHAN HAVENS* is the son of James C. Havens, of Deckertown, grandson of Dr. Berret Havens, of the same place, and great-grandson of Dr. Jonathan Havens, of Hartford, Conn. He was born Aug. 16, 1840, at Deckertown, this county; educated at Flushing Institute, Long Island, at Newton Collegiate Institute, New Jersey, and at Deckertown Classical School. He studied medicine with Dr. Alexander Linn at Deckertown, and at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, graduating therefrom in 1862. For some time after graduating he served as assistant physician at the Nursery Hospital and House of Refuge, on Randall's Island. He settled at Sparta in 1863; removed to Deckertown in 1864, and in 1866 to Newton, which has since been his residence. He is a member of the American Medical Association and of the District Medical Society of Sussex County, serving as secretary, president, and historian of the latter. He has written considerable on medical topics,—notably, an article contributed to the American Medical Times in 1863 on "Puerperal Tetanus," and various reports and mortuary notices to the New Jersey State Medical Society. Since September, 1875, he has held the position of United States examining surgeon for pensions.

The doctor is possessed of considerable literary ability, with quite a taste for historical and antiquarian research, and may justly be considered the historian of the profession in Sussex County. In January, 1871, he married Margaret A., daughter of the late John H. Nelden, Esq., of Newton, and sister of Dr. C. R. Nelden, his professional partner at that time. Dr. Havens is now practicing alone.

EDWARD S. BELL was born in New York City, May 6, 1815; removed with his parents early in life to Mansfield, Ohio, at which place he received his education and commenced the study of medicine.

* Atkinson's "Physicians and Surgeons of the United States," p. 376.

He completed his studies with Dr. John B. Beach, of Branchville, Sussex Co., N. J., during the winter of 1837-38; attended the University of New York, College of Physicians and Surgeons, and received his diploma as M.D. June 7, 1839. He married, in 1838, Catharine L., daughter of his preceptor, Dr. Beach. Resided at Stillwater from June, 1838, to April, 1839; at Lafayette until 1840, at which time he removed to Stanhope, where he followed his profession until his death, Oct. 23, 1844. He left a widow and one son, Theodore, who now reside at Paterson, N. J.

ISAAC S. HUNT, for many years a resident practitioner of Sandyston township, and well known throughout Sussex County, was born near Newton, in the year 1818. He was literally a self-made man, and whatever prominence he acquired in the profession of his choice may be mainly attributed to his studious course in early life. He established himself at Sandyston in 1846, and secured a large practice; he there married, in 1848, Sarah Ann, daughter of Joseph Fleming. Dr. Hunt was eminently successful in his treatment of the celebrated "Finch fever,"—a species of typhoid, which so disastrously raged in that section years ago, counting its victims by the score,—and was eventually taken down by the same disease, barely recovering from the baleful effects of the scourge. He removed in 1865 to Port Jervis, N. Y., which was his residence up to the time of his death, Nov. 23, 1875, at the age of fifty-seven. He left two sons and three daughters, all living,—Dr. J. Halsey, Victor, Mrs. Ella Gallup, Stella, and Rebecca.

Dr. Hunt was a skillful physician, and gained not only fame, but a reasonable competency. He was a prominent member of the Masonic order.

ALFRED WYKER, another physician, who was a native of this county, was born in Frankford township, July 12, 1827. His parents were Henry and Mary Wyker, well-to-do farmers. His schooling was obtained at Deckertown and Mount Retirement; he then began the study of medicine with Dr. Alexander Linn, at Deckertown. Two years later he entered Jefferson College, Philadelphia. In 1852 he commenced to practice in Beemerville. In 1856 he emigrated to the West, and from Niles, Mich., in 1862, entered the Fourteenth Michigan Volunteer Regiment, as assistant surgeon. Weakness and poor health, induced by overwork, caused him to resign his commission, May 19, 1863. He returned to Michigan and commenced to practice in Ionia, but, his health becoming poorer, he returned to New Jersey, where he died, at the residence of his father, Nov. 24, 1864. In 1852 he married Julia Frances, daughter of Thomas I. Ludlum, deceased. They had but one child, a son.

Dr. Wyker was a Presbyterian, joining the church of that denomination at Branchville, N. J., at the early age of fifteen.

A. W. HAIGHT made his advent at Lafayette about 1837, as would appear from the following advertisement, published in the newspaper at that time:

"PHYSIC AND SURGERY.

"ALVAN W. HAIGHT, M.D., Graduate Columbian Medical Institute, of the city of New York, a member of the Delaware Medical Society, &c., tenders his professional services to the public. Particular attention paid to all chronic complaints, and diseases of the chest, &c. Residence at the house of Lewis Peters, near Lafayette.

CARLOS ALLEN, a member and president of the Sussex County Medical Society, is a native of Vermont. He was born at Huntington, Sept. 18, 1814. The academies of Richmond and Williston, Vt., furnished his preparatory education; he then entered the Medical Department of Dartmouth College, and was graduated thence M.D. in November, 1837. During the ensuing five years he practiced his profession at Richmond, Vt., from 1842-46 at Deckertown, N. J., and since the date last given has been established at Vernon, in this county, where he is at present practicing. In 1877 he had the operation performed upon himself for Dupuytren's finger contraction, according to the method of Prof. Busch, as described by Madelung. The operation was successful, and the benefits derived from it were so great that he is a strong advocate of it. He married, Nov. 15, 1838, Arvilla Browning, of Richmond, Vt.; she died in May, 1867. Three years afterwards he married Susan, daughter of Maj. William Simonsou, of Vernon, Sussex Co., N. J.*

THEOPHILUS H. ADDRESS, son of Hampton and Martha E. Address, was born Jan. 10, 1841, in Stillwater township, Sussex Co., N. J. Having acquired his academical education, he chose the profession of medicine, and entered the office of Thomas Ryerson, A.M., M.D., of Newton, where he remained until he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York. After attending his first course of lectures, he served as medical cadet in the United States army for one year. Returning to the College of Physicians and Surgeons, he remained there until he was graduated, in March, 1864. In the following May he located at Sparta, in his native county, taking the clientele of Dr. David M. Sayre, one of the leading physicians of the State. He at once entered into full practice with all the ardor and enthusiasm of one in love with his profession, and with a determination to succeed. The following year he married a daughter of the late Dr. Cutler, of Morristown, and granddaughter of Judge Vail. The year following he moved to the city of Newark, but after six months' residence, at the urgent solicitations of his many friends, he returned to Sparta, where he has ever since remained in full practice, enjoying the confidence of his patrons and the esteem of his professional brethren.

The doctor's taste or speciality has been more particularly surgery, and being surrounded by the great mining interests of the county, more opportunities to practice that branch of the profession have been afforded him than many of the profession in the country could enjoy. In emergencies he is cool and collected, prompt in his decisions; and, having decided what course to pursue, he is firm and undaunted in his operations, but not foolhardy, and always willing to listen and give due respect to the suggestions and opinions of others. He never stoops to the little acts that bring forward little men, but stands fairly on his merits for his professional success; and now, at the age of forty, in the prime of life and full vigor of manhood, he is actively engaged in his professional duties.

FRANKLIN SMITH, son of John T. and Mary Smith, was born in Newton, May 13, 1820. His parents came from Philadelphia and settled at Newton about the year 1812. His father died in 1822, and in 1826 his mother became the wife of Dr. Francis Moran, with whom Franklin studied medicine. He commenced the practice of his profession in 1843, at Papakating, in Frankford township. He went to Lafayette the following year, where he remained five years. In 1849 he removed to Hamburg, and practiced there until 1856, when he changed his location to Newton, which has since been his residence. He married Mary, a daughter of Benjamin Northrup, of Andover, but a native of Zanesville, Ohio. He is the oldest living member of the District Medical Society of Sussex County.

SIMEON ROSENKRANS, formerly of Walpaek, died at Cocheont, Steuben Co., N. Y., Aug. 24, 1841. He was born March 6, 1775; was in Sussex County but a short time.

H. STILES WOODRUFF was born in 1791. He practiced at Lafayette, Sussex Co., and died in 1844. He had four sons, one of whom bore his name, was a physician, and apparently succeeded him at Lafayette, according to the following newspaper announcement:

"Dr. H. S. Woodruff would offer his services to the people of Lafayette and its vicinity in cases of sickness, and all other ills which flesh may inherit in this mortal life. His prescriptions will be either (fashionably) teach medicine, or physiologically (without them), as the faith of the patient may be. He would prefer the latter, and promises quite as good success, if his directions are attended to (in all cases). Apply to yours truly,

"H. S. W.

"LAFAYETTE, AUG. 7, 1857."

He soon after located at Marksboro,' but died, quite suddenly, March 29, 1858.

JESSE R. BURGESS was a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania. He was examined and licensed June 13, 1843, and commenced practice at Greenville, Sussex Co. He removed to Lafayette in January, 1846, and labored there over ten years. He had sales of land, etc., in December, 1856, and a final sale Feb. 20, 1857. He was succeeded at Greenville by Dr. Cooley, who came from New York, and was "physician, surgeon, and dentist." In 1848, Dr. Burgess married Huldah L. Dodder, of Frelinghuysen, Warren Co.

JAMES HALL was located and practicing at Deckertown in 1819,—possibly earlier.

JOSEPH B. DUNLAP located in Newton, April, 1845, and during the same month became a member of the County Medical Society. He also practiced in Stillwater, and had previously (1842) married Lydia J., the only daughter of John Strader, Esq., of Stillwater. In 1847 he had his office at his father-in-law's residence. He removed from the county.

JOHN H. ARMSTRONG, born Oct. 31, 1828, at Papakating, N. J., was the son of Capt. Thomas M. and Anna (Sausman) Armstrong, both natives of Sussex County. He entered the University of New York in 1854, graduating therefrom, and receiving two certificates, the second being for special honors; attended lectures in 1859; studied medicine with Dr. Smith, of Williamsburg, L. I., and practiced two years in Stanhope, N. J., where he died, Sept. 17, 1862.

JOHN WESTBROOK WILSON, a native of Dingman's Ferry, Pa. (1829), studied with Dr. Lines, graduating from College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1851. He commenced practicing at Hawley, Wayne Co., Pa., then at Flatbrookville, Sussex Co., N. J., but afterwards returned to Dingman's Ferry, where he died, at his father's house, June 29, 1859, of consumption. He was buried in the old Westbrook burial-ground, about two miles below Dingman's.

THEODORE A. LINN, son of Robert A. and Elizabeth Linn, was born at Hamburg, Oct. 29, 1830. He began the study of medicine with Dr. Joseph S. Beemer, of Hamburg, in 1847, and further pursued the same under Dr. Alexander Linn. He was graduated at Jefferson Medical College in 1850, but soon after was attacked by rheumatism, from which he never recovered, and which caused his death, Sept. 5, 1852. He was buried in the family grounds at his native place.

HORATIO N. CRANE was a native of this county, born in Wantage, June 3, 1848. Quite early he developed a strong inclination for the study of medicine; in 1867 commenced study with Dr. M. Lampson, of Beemerville; in 1868 entered the Michigan State University, Ann Arbor. Graduating in 1870, he became a student in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, and was graduated there in 1871. He then formed a partnership with Dr. Hedges at Branchville, but after a year opened an office for himself. He practiced for another year, but was then compelled to desist by his malady, consumption; and, although he sought health by change of climate, he returned from a trip to the West only to die at his parents' home, in March, 1875. A most promising and useful career was thus prematurely cut short.

OTHER PHYSICIANS.

DR. FETHERMAN was located at Flatbrookville in 1844, and at Stanhope in 1845.

C. V. MOORE was at Stillwater in 1848, in which year he joined his fortune with those of Louisa, daughter of Isaac Coursen, of that place, where he is now residing and practicing.

JOSEPH HEDGES, son of Stephen Hedges, was located at Sparta, where he was a partner of Dr. Sayre; in 1850 he removed to Western New York. He subsequently returned to Coleville, but soon after migrated to Branchville, where he is now in practice. He married Angeline Shiner, of Newton.

J. W. RAFFERTY advertised himself as "a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Edinburgh, Scotland, and a member of the medical societies of New York State and Orange County." He was located for some time in the last-named county, and in 1838 was in Courseville. He was the originator of several patent nostrums, out of which he made some money, but did not enjoy a very high reputation with the regular practitioners here. He subsequently removed to Carbondale, Pa., where he died.

JOHN LINN ALLEN, a grandson of Judge John Linn, on his mother's side, was licensed in April, 1845; became a member of the District Medical Society in 1846. Beemerville was his first professional location, from whence he removed to Branchville in the spring of 1846. His office was at Roberts' hotel. At the same time he formed a copartnership with Dr. Beach. Dr. Allen married Charlotte, daughter of Judge John Bell, of Branchville, June 27, 1850. He is now practicing at the village of Lafayette, this county.

J. H. THOMPSON located at Vernon, July 12, 1844. His office at that time was at Vandergriff's hotel.

THOMAS A. DROWN was practicing at Lafayette, Dec. 2, 1852; he located at Deckertown, but subsequently left the county. He was a member of the District Medical Society of Sussex County from June 5, 1854, to June 3, 1863.

RICHARD S. FARRAND was at Lafayette in April, 1844. Four years previously he "took for better, for worse," Harriet, eldest daughter of Maj. William Stevens, of Newark, N. J.

ANTHONY D. MORFORD, son of Samuel D. Morford, had an office in Newton, Aug. 14, 1845, and practiced there until he removed to Nyack, N. Y.; he is not now practicing. His consort was Margaret A., daughter of David Ryerson, Esq.; they were joined in wedlock in 1846.

J. WATSON YOUNG was born Jan. 1, 1840; graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, Medical Department, March 9, 1862; died Feb. 14, 1864. He was a son of Nelson V. Young, of West Amwell, Hunterdon Co.; read with Dr. Wetherill, of Lambertville, and practiced medicine at Montague, in this county. He died there, but was buried at Mount Airy, Hunterdon Co., N. J. He left a widow and one son, who bears his name. He was a member of the District Medical Society of Sussex County, joining in 1863.

MANNING F. CROSS commenced practice at Swartswood, in Stillwater, in 1855. He located at Lafayette, this county, April 22, 1859, and died of consumption, Jan. 29, 1860, aged thirty-two. He had only fairly entered upon his professional career, but was greatly esteemed by all for his amiable disposition and his uprightness in his intercourse with his fellow-citizens.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SUSSEX COUNTY PRESS.

I.—THE SUSSEX REGISTER.

PRECEDING the Sussex Register there had been one newspaper venture in Sussex County. The Farmers' Journal and Newton Advertiser had begun and closed its brief existence before the beginning of the present century. Its first number was issued on the 8th of January, 1796, by Elliott Hopkins and William Huston, and its publication was continued about three years.

The Sussex Register was first published by Judge Hall on Tuesday, July 6, 1813, in a building in the rear of the court house. The size was eighteen by twenty-two inches, and printed on coarse paper, without column-rules, the type used being small pica and English, three and six sizes larger than that with which the paper is now printed. The proprietor and one journeyman were able to set the paper up in a day, and while the judge distributed the paper the journeyman loafed around. In addition to his editorial duties Judge Hall advertised that he would receive subscriptions for books and had for sale legal blanks and writing-paper. The price of the paper was two dollars per annum, half yearly in advance, the first dollar being payable at the end of the first quarter, at which time the editor informed those who had not already paid him that one dollar was due and "VERY MUCH WANTED."

Editorials were rare in those days, and in fact there was not much room, as half the paper was filled with advertisements set in large type, like the reading-matter, which was made up very largely of accounts of the movements of our troops and those of England, with whom we were then at war. Most of the advertisements were legal, though a column and a half were used by business men. Henry Johnson, of New York, advertised dry-goods, Henry N. Miller, of Newton, a country store, while the others were James Spence, of Newton, watch- and clock-maker; Belvidere saw-mill, by Kinney, Ware & Waterfield; cloth-mill at Hackettstown, by Christopher Little; fulling and drying at Moden, by Moses Northrup, and in Frankford, by John Canfield.

The paper was first published on Tuesday, but on the 20th of September the day was changed to Monday, "better to suit the arrangement of the mails," and for this and other reasons from time to time the publication-day has been set back one day, until every one of the six working-days has been in use.

The paper has been enlarged several times since its first publication, and changes have been made in its typographical appearance. July 13, 1818, column-rules were introduced, and the paper was practically enlarged in 1821 and again in 1822 by the use of smaller type. The file from 1828 to 1830 is missing, but during that time the paper was enlarged to twenty-two by thirty-eight inches. In 1843 the size was increased to twenty-three by thirty-eight inches, June 29, 1846, to twenty by forty, and in April, 1868, to twenty-nine by forty-three inches, its present size.

The country was not rich with farmers during the first years of the Register's existence, nor was the paper crowded with paying advertisements. At the close of the eighth volume, in 1821, the judge said he had done business with upwards of twelve hundred people of every kind, but, on the whole, was thankful that he had been able to keep his head above water so long.

In May, 1827, "in order to keep his head above water," he entered into a copartnership with William H. Johnson, and opened a store at Lewisburg, near Deckertown, and continued there until May, 1830, when they moved to Newton, into the old academy building, opposite the Episcopal church, on Main Street, where the Register was also printed until 1836. By strict attention to business the paper then began to prosper, until the judge, before he severed his connection with it, in 1865, saw it reach its highest point of success.

The place of publication has been moved several times. It was first published in the rear of the courthouse until 1818, when it was moved into a building on the site of the Methodist Episcopal church. From 1830 to 1836 it was printed in the old academy building, opposite the Episcopal church, on Main Street, and then found more permanent quarters in a building on the corner of Main and Division Streets, where it remained for an unbroken period of thirty-one years. It was then removed into the old McCarter store-house, opposite Park Place, on High Street, where it remained until April, 1869, since which time it has been located on Spring Street.

The Register was wholly independent in politics during the first twenty-two years of its existence, the only political articles published being in the form of communications, for which the columns of the paper were open to both political parties, and during the campaign the tickets of both parties were advertised. Very soon after the entrance of Mr. Edsall into the office anti-Democratic short paragraphs began to appear, becoming more frequent, strong, and lengthy, until, in 1836, the name of William Henry Harrison for President was placed at the head of the editorial page, since which time the principles of the paper have remained unchanged.

Very few local items found their way into the paper during its earlier days, but on Feb. 5, 1864,—the second issue by B. B. Edsall & Co.,—a "local column" was introduced, and since March 10, 1870, local matters have been given a page by themselves.

The proprietorship of the paper has changed but seldom, considering the length of time that it has been published. John H. Hall, who began its publication, was editor and sole proprietor for nearly twenty years. From April 7, 1834, to March 26, 1836 John H. Hall and Henry P. Moore were the publishers, under the name and firm of Hall & Moore, and this copartnership expired by limitation at the end of two years.

A new era began in August, 1833, when Benjamin B. Edsall—the man who made a reputation for the paper and himself—came into the office, he having been introduced to Judge Hall by C. S. Hendric, a brother-printer, who, hearing that the judge needed a good workman, took the trouble to drive over from his home in Goshen, bringing Mr. Edsall with him. New life was infused into the paper, and its typographical appearance improved at once. But Mr. Hall soon learned to leave the editorial labor to Mr. Edsall, devoting himself to the outside business, canvassing for subscribers, and making collections, while Mr. Edsall devoted himself to the in-door work, writing sharply, clipping adroitly, working at the case, press, or at whatever his hands could find to do.

July 5, 1856, Mr. Hall admitted Mr. Edsall into partnership, and the paper was published in the name of Hall & Edsall until Jan. 22, 1864, when Mr. Hall announced that he had disposed of his interest to his son-in-law, Richard B. Westbrook; but the old veteran, though seventy-four years of age, was unwilling to acknowledge that he had thrown off the harness entirely, and announced, "I shall still continue to exercise such oversight as my health will permit and the proprietors may desire." Smaller type was introduced by the new firm, and a power-press purchased.* It was during the existence of this copartnership that the Register reached its highest success, it being the only country paper in the State that paid the United States government a tax on its advertising, and it was during this time,—Dec. 4, 1865,—that Judge Hall died.

Mr. Edsall remained as editor until his death, and though, Nov. 10, 1866, Joseph Coult purchased Mr. Westbrook's interest, the firm-name remained unchanged.

Mr. Edsall died March 27, 1868, from which time until the paper came into its present hands Mr. Coult was the editor, maintaining its former reputation, and, if possible, keeping up a still more vigorous and pointed onslaught upon the Democracy.

July 10, 1868, Mrs. Edsall sold her interest to A. E. Goodman, of New York City, the name of the firm becoming then Coult & Goodman. Mr. Goodman, however, visited Newton but once, and then when he came to examine the office before purchasing. He bought an interest in the paper as an investment, and retained it until Oct. 1, 1869, when its control was placed in the hands of his nephew, Richard F. Goodman, who is now editor and publisher.

* This press remained in use until the fall of 1880, when a still more modern one, with steam-power, was introduced.

JUDGE JOHN H. HALL.

The Hall family, of which Judge John H. Hall was a representative, is of English extraction. Theodore Hall, his grandfather, was born in England, and emigrated at an early age, with his brother Jacob, to the United States, but whether with or without his parents is unknown. The brothers settled in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, where Theodore became acquainted with Gertrude Gordon, born in the year 1710, near the Raritan River, Middlesex Co., N. J., whom he married in 1729. At this date he was conducting a milling business where he first located. Subsequently himself and wife settled in Kingwood township, Hunterdon Co., N. J., near the east bank of the Delaware River, where Mt. Hall still pursued the business of milling. He was finally drowned by the upsetting of his canoe, caused by the swollen waters of a freshet when crossing the river.

The children of Theodore and Gertrude Hall were Joseph, born in 1730, who removed at an early age to Western Virginia; Isaac, who died without issue when a young man; Samuel, who married Rhuhamah Everitt and settled in Kingwood township, Hunterdon Co., where he reared a large family and lived to an advanced age; Jacob, who married Elizabeth Davis, settled in the same township, and also raised a large family; Jesse, father of Judge Hall; Susan, who married Ambrose Fox and removed with him to Western Virginia; Rebecca, who married Quill Richards and located near Reading, Pa.; Mary, who married John Lake, for many years a resident of Kingwood township; and Gertrude, who married Luther Opdyke, also of Kingwood township. Mrs. Theodore Hall died in the year 1805, aged about ninety-five years.

Jesse Hall, fifth and youngest son of Theodore and Gertrude (Gordon) Hall, grew to manhood in Kingwood township, Hunterdon Co., where his parents settled about 1757. At this time Jesse was seven years of age. He passed his life in that township, engaged in agricultural pursuits, and at his death was buried in a private burial-ground owned by Jacob McLean, near the banks of the Delaware River, where many of his relatives are interred. His wife, whom he married in December, 1779, was Elizabeth, second daughter of William Heath, an early resident of Amwell township, Hunterdon Co., who died while serving as a soldier in the Revolutionary war. Of this union were born Gordon G. Hall, Aug. 12, 1780, who married Elizabeth Temple, of Kingwood township, and who died in New York City, April 27, 1848, leaving several children; Andrew Hall, Dec. 29, 1781, who married Amelia Palmer, of Vermont, was a prominent hatter in New York City for many years, and died May 10, 1832; Jesse Hall, Oct. 20, 1783, noted for his pre-eminent personal beauty, and who removed to the South at an early age; Sarah Hall, March 20, 1785, who married Edward Lane, and who resided until her death at Burlington, N. J.; Heath Hall, Nov. 17, 1788, who married Mrs. Catharine (Nicholas) Tuicks, of Easton, Pa., raised a family, and died in 1854, in New York City; John H. Hall, the subject of this memoir; Susan Hall, Aug. 28, 1793, who married Hannen Jones in 1818; and Asa Hall, June 30, 1795, who married, in 1818, Catharine Sausman, of Newton, N. J., was a leading hat-manufacturer in New York City for many years, and who died on May 23, 1849.

Judge John H. Hall was born in Kingwood township, Hunterdon Co., N. J., April 25, 1791. At the age of seventeen he left home to learn the art of printing, and was apprenticed to Asher Miner, the founder of the Bucks County Intelligencer, Doylestown, Pa. From the examples and counsels of that excellent man he derived those lessons of integrity, economy, and good order to which he adhered throughout a long and useful life. At the age of twenty-two he removed to Newton, N. J., and with the aid of a small capital, acquired by his own labor, he established the Sussex Register, the first number of which was issued on July 6, 1813. He continued its publication uninterrupted until Jan. 22, 1864, when he disposed of his interest. A portion of this period he had associated with him as a partner the talented and popular writer Benjamin B. Edsall, who by his ability and skill did much to give the paper a wide reputation. Perhaps no clearer knowledge of Judge Hall's personal characteristics and public life can be obtained than by the perusal of a few extracts from the obituary notice of him from the facile pen of Mr. Edsall, published in the Sussex Register at the time of his death. He says,—

“During this long period it is safe to say Judge Hall continually gained a wider and deeper hold upon the affections and esteem of the people with whom his lot had been cast. Though never agreeing in political sentiment with the majority of the voters of this county, his sterling honesty and indisputable capacity for the correct and intelligent discharge of public business early led to his employment in official position. He was deputy sheriff for nine years, a part of the time doing nearly all the duties of his principal. For thirteen years he was clerk of the board of freeholders, being annually re-elected, although the members of the board almost unanimously differed from him in political sentiment. For fifteen years he was a judge of the Court of Common Pleas; in 1836 he was chosen one of the Presidential electors for New Jersey, and voted for Gen. William H. Harrison; and in 1841 he was appointed clerk of the county, servicing in that capacity until 1846. In all these positions he acquitted himself with the greatest credit. He was painstaking, systematic, and scrupulously honest. As a judge no man could be more conscientious. He was cautious, considerate, and impartial, and when once his judgment was formed he was immovably firm; nor fear nor favor nor hope of reward could swerve him a hair's breadth from what he believed to be right and just. The correctness with which Judge Hall discharged his public duties is proverbial in this county, and the one distinguishing trait of his character which those best acquainted with him most frequently spoke of with admiration was that, no matter what business he transacted, whether small or great, it was thoroughly and completely done. In all the relations of life—as a husband, a father, a neighbor, and a citizen—he approached as near perfection as it is permitted for a human being to attain.

"To those who know but little of the man whose venerable form is now clad in the habiliments of the grave this language may seem somewhat extravagant. But the writer of these lines—who is himself no longer young, and who has seen enough of the gloss and tinsel which in this world passes too often for pure gold to make him somewhat cynical—is the last one to indulge at such a time in insincere compliments or in unmerited eulogiums. For over thirty years the closest personal and business intimacy subsisted between the deceased and the writer, and when we say that beyond all men that we ever knew he was a model of manly probity, we are unconscious of uttering aught but the simple truth. There have existed many men of more capacious intellect,—many of a higher fancy and better calculated to dazzle the multitude with sparkling rhetoric and radiant wit; but for the solid courtesy of a true gentleman, the jocund good humor of an every-day companion, the ever-ready sympathy and kindness of a warm friend, and the sound common sense, the sterling worth, and the invincible integrity that may be relied upon either for wise counsel or safe example, there are few persons that ever lived who furnished a better model than Judge Hall. Ripe in years, in usefulness, in the love of kindred and friends, and in the esteem of the public, he sinks at last to his final rest. He leaves to his family a fair amount of wealth honestly earned, as well as the richer legacy of a good name won by the consistent practice of those moral and social virtues which all admire and few emulate. . . . Sincere, unaffected, and humane; upright and exact in all his dealings; forbearing to the erring; kind to all; exhibiting the same courtesy and consideration towards the poor and dependent that he did to the rich and influential,—he was a man: 'take him for all in all, we never shall look upon his like again.'"

Besides his editorial and official labors, Judge Hall was closely identified throughout his life with the general growth and development of the section of country in which he lived, and took an active interest in all objects tending to improve the moral, religious, and educational tone of society. He was a regular attendant at town-meetings, and his portly form could be seen slowly ascending and descending the courthouse hill, according as he voted "Yea" or "Nay" on questions submitted to the meeting, as was the custom in earlier days. He felt a friendly interest in the cause of religion and education, and donated the land, in the rear of his homestead in Newton, on which were erected the "old academy" and the first Methodist Episcopal church edifice. For a number of years he was engaged in the mercantile business in Wantage township and at Newton, in partnership with the late William Johnson, under the firm-name of Hall & Johnson. He passed away on Dec. 4, 1865, and lies interred in the village cemetery at Newton, where a modest tombstone marks his last resting-place, bearing upon its face the truthful legend, "The memory of the just is blessed." It is believed that he never made an enemy in the world. Though not devoid of strong traits of character, and at times of great positiveness of conviction, his manner was uniformly courteous and kind, conciliating rather than antagonizing persons of opposite views and opinions.

Judge Hall married Elizabeth, daughter of William Sausman, of Newton, N. J., who died May 1, 1862, in her sixty-seventh year. Of the union were born ten children,—namely, Susan, who married Henry B. Stoll, of Sussex County, and who now resides at Terre Haute, Ind.; Amelia, who married William L. Ames, of St. Paul, Minn., and who is dead; William, who died unmarried in early manhood; Sarah, who married Richard B. Westbrook, of Philadelphia, and who resides in Newton; Anna, who married Matthew Armstrong, of Greenville, N. J., and who is also deceased; Catharine, who became the wife of Gen. John B. Sausborn, of St. Paul, Minn., and who is dead; Caroline, deceased, wife of John Armstrong, of Greenville, N. J.; John, who died young; Bathsheba, who married John F. Conger, of Newton, also deceased; and Frederick W., who died in his youth.

BENJAMIN BAILEY EDSALL.

Benjamin B. Edsall, son of Benjamin and Nancy (Denton) Edsall, was born at Maspeth, L. I., on the 25th of January, 1811. His father was a sea-captain, and died when Benjamin B. was about ten years of age. His mother was a woman of great moral worth and Christian excellence, a member of the Middle-village Methodist Episcopal Church, on Long Island, and in his early life educated her son in the principles of morality and integrity. She died in Newton, N. J., at the age of seventy-five.

At the age of seven young Edsall, as if by intuition, showed the bent of his mind by ingeniously constructing a miniature printing-press, and thus early began to lay the foundation for a life business, in the faithful prosecution of which he afterwards became so noted in Northern New Jersey, and especially in Sussex County.

His parents were poor and unable to afford him even a common-school education. Upon the death of his father he commenced an apprenticeship with Joseph Harper, now the well-known Harper & Brothers, printers of New York City, who was an own cousin of his mother. Here he remained until he was twenty years of age, and became thoroughly educated as a printer by profession. For some time thereafter he was employed on the Orange County Patriot, at Goshen, but in 1833 was introduced by the editor of that paper—Mr. Hendrie—to Judge John H. Hall, then editor and proprietor of the Sussex Register, at Newton, N. J. Here a new field of usefulness was opened to him; he embraced it with all the fervor of an ardent nature, and subsequent events showed he was eminently qualified to fill it. Nothing could have been more fortunate than his association with Judge Hall in the control and management of the Register, which from a struggling, obscure newspaper was ultimately, through their joint management, made a prosperous and thriving journal.

The judge's sober age, his mild and gentle manner, and his experience in life were well calculated to moderate Mr. Edsall's naturally sanguine temperament, and as years passed on this early acquaintance ripened into firm and earnest friendship; and, in 1855, Mr. Edsall was offered an equal copartnership in the Register office, which continued until the death of Judge Hall, and to the last each maintained the greatest respect for the other. We relate these events in Mr. Edsall's earlier career as an incentive to other young men who, without friends to aid them, are about to assume responsibility, and to show that patient industry and economy, in the long run, form the surest road to competency and fame.

So thoroughly was Mr. Edsall identified with the paper that his name became a household word wherever it circulated. He continued in charge of the Register, after Judge Hall's decease, until his own death, which occurred March 27, 1868. Mr. Edsall was exceedingly industrious; he prepared all, or nearly all, the editorial matters for his paper, and selected with great care the miscellaneous reading which rendered its columns so attractive. Yet he still found time to do a large share of the severe physical labor of the office, and many of his readers remember him toiling at the large hand-press upon which the paper was printed during nearly the whole time of his connection with it. Without any of the aids now within the reach of the humblest, he stored his mind with a vast fund of information, from which a wonderful memory enabled him to draw at will as from an inexhaustible fountain. His style of writing was terse and forcible, and so peculiar to himself that the habitual reader could easily detect the occasional articles from other pens which appeared in editorial garb.

In politics Mr. Edsall was a Whig of the Henry Clay school, and followed the fortunes and earnestly advocated the measures of that organization until it sank beneath the heavy load which its pro-slavery adherents sought to place upon it. When the Republican party rose out of its ruins, he was among the first in New Jersey to join in this new movement, and by his pen and voice contributed in no inconsiderable degree to its success. Firm in his adherence to principle, bold in his advocacy of measures which met his approval, fearless in his denunciation of corrupt and venal men, he was nevertheless fair and honorable with political opponents, giving praise wherever due; so that among his warmest personal friends were numbered many with whom he combated strenuously. Among the members of his own party he had the love and respect of all. He was so far above the tricks of the mere politician that no one ever accused him of duplicity or unfairness.

Up to 1846 the discussion of public questions was frequently marked with the grossest personalities. Political lampooning was the fashion of the age, but as Mr. Edsall grew older and ripened in experience he changed his manner and style to strictly polemic discussion. Here he displayed the greatest strength and vigor of his masculine mind. Naturally analytic and vituperative, he seldom resorted to these weapons unless hardly pressed by his opponent, and then no one knew better than he how to use them. He might wound, but it was not in his nature to trample upon a fallen enemy. Upon the contrary, his strong arm and generous heart were invariably extended to lift one up.

Starting out in life a Democrat, contrary to the generally-received opinion he gave his first vote, in 1832, in favor of Gen. Andrew Jackson for President. He also was opposed to the re-charter of Biddle's Bank, was opposed to high protective tariffs, favored the repeal of the law imprisoning men for debt, and advocated the adoption of the present New Jersey State constitution. In fact, in habits, manners, and associations he was the antipodes of an aristocrat, and enjoyed himself best in the company of plain, straightforward men.

He was a patriot and well-wisher of his country, and no man held more exalted views of personal rights than he. In the exigencies of the war he believed it to be conscientiously his duty to go with the anti-slavery party, without reference to its ulterior effect upon a Union of the States. In the fall of 1860, Mr. Edsall was placed in nomination for member of Congress in his district (Fourth) by the Republicans, but, the party being largely in the minority, he failed of election, although he ran far ahead of his party vote.

In dealing with public questions his method was always straightforward and manly. Possessing retentive memory, great power of language, and always "well read," he usually had the advantage of an opponent from the outset in dealing with figures and facts. To this he united the severe analytical knowledge of the printing-office, which can nowhere be learned so well in any other school; so that in encountering his opponent, if opportunity presented, he overwhelmed him with a regular broadside of Paixhan guns. This was the secret of his sarcastic power, and those who had to confront him in the political arena preferred to draw his fire rather than rush up in the face of a masked battery.

This was Benjamin B. Edsall in the editorial sanctum; out of it, he was the kindest and most genial of men. A friend or a stranger was ever welcome to partake of the hospitality of his home, which he had surrounded with many comforts. Political differences were never allowed to sever his personal friendships. His opinions of men and things were seldom changed in the light of either prosperity or adversity.

So strong a hold had this man upon public opinion, even in a county where he was never an acknowledged political leader, that he may be said to have moulded public sentiment upon many subjects in a manner quite unconscious to those who supposed they entertained different sentiments from his. This was the result of an integrity of character never questioned.

Although not a member of any church, he had for a long time prior to his decease been a generous supporter of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the secular affairs of which he took a deep and active interest.

His wife was Eliza A., a daughter of Smith F. and Phebe (Walling) Williams, whom he married Jan. 24, 1852. She was born in Morris County, April 20, 1822, and survives in 1880, residing in Newton, N. J.

Mrs. Edsall is a woman of keen foresight, possessed of more than ordinary business ability for her sex, and to her frugality and constancy her husband was largely indebted for his accumulations. They had no children, but an adopted daughter was an inmate of their home.

RICHARD F. GOODMAN.

This gentleman is descended from Samuel Goodman, who, with his brother Richard, came from Hertford, England, in 1633, and with a party of colonists from Salem, Mass., traveled across the country to the Connecticut River, and, settling there, named the place Hartford, adopting as a coat-of-arms and motto those of Hertford, England, after which it was named. Some members of the Goodman family have ever since resided in Hartford. Edward Goodman, the father of Richard, is still a practicing attorney, and his uncle, Aaron C., president of the Phenix Mutual Insurance Company.

Richard F. Goodman, born April 12, 1841, at Hartford, Conn., was graduated from Harris Military Academy in 1858, and the following year entered Trinity College, from which he was graduated with honor in 1863. After a short vacation, early in February following, he was appointed an acting assistant paymaster in the United States navy and stationed at the Brooklyn Navy-yard. He was then ordered to the United States Steamer "Nightingale," which lay in the Gulf of Mexico, but after a short cruise of two months returned North. The department complimented Paymaster Goodman upon the fact that in this his first report his accounts were found to be complete and without errors. In August he was ordered to join the "Miami" at Hampton Roads, Va., in a more responsible position.

The "Miami" was the first vessel of the navy to ascend the James River, and Paymaster Goodman was sent there to take charge of the store-ships of the large fleet which followed, performing that important duty until they returned North in May, 1865. The cruise being ended, he declined a place among the regular assistants, with the promise of speedy promotion, and resigned at the end of leave granted for making up his accounts, and a further leave of two months was accorded, at the end of which he was excused from active duty and given leave without date, and in 1868 he was honorably discharged.

Entering the Albany Law University, he received the degree of Bachelor of Laws, was afterwards admitted to the bar in Connecticut, and went into partnership with his father, Edward Goodman, remaining until he purchased the Sussex Register and moved to Newton, Oct. 1, 1869.

II.—THE NEW JERSEY HERALD.

This newspaper was established by Col. Grant Fitch in the fall of 1829, it being the third enterprise of the kind within the present limits of the county of Sussex. A brief sketch of its founder seems necessary as an introduction to a history of the paper itself.

Col. Fitch was born in Norwalk, Conn., in 1782. He was a son of Haines Fitch, and a grandson of Thomas Fitch, who was for ten years Governor of the colony of Connecticut. The education of Grant Fitch, which included the higher branches of learning, was completed at Norwalk, but, instead of studying any of the learned professions, he chose a mercantile life, in which pursuit he spent a short time in Burlington, Vt., but very soon removed to Westtown, Orange Co., N. Y., where he married a daughter of Judge Benjamin Halsey, who was subsequently a well-known citizen of Sussex County.

When quite a young man Col. Fitch removed to Newton and engaged in mercantile pursuits, in which he was successful. His place of business was in the small brick building, now used as a meat-shop, on the corner opposite the library building, which he erected. About the year 1820, acting upon the advice of true but unwise friends, he removed to Markshoro', Warren Co., and established a cotton-factory just below the village, on the Paulinskill. With this enterprise there are no pleasant reminiscences connected, so far as he was concerned, or any of those who succeeded him.

In the spring of 1829 he returned to Newton, a wiser if not a richer man, but with no special intention of founding a newspaper. It was not until after the death of his wife, which occurred in September of that year, that he conceived the idea of embarking in this, to him, new and experimental business. It may have been an expedient suggested by preceding misfortunes, and accepted as an available resource. The field of operations was broad enough, for at that time there was but one newspaper published in the county,—the Sussex Register, established by John H. Hall sixteen years before, which was Whig in politics, whereas Democracy of the old Jefferson and Jackson school was largely in the ascendant in the county. This advantage, however, was confronted by a formidable array of drawbacks. It was the time of slow coaches, when matters great and small were alike subject to the most mature deliberation; when, if a man subscribed for a newspaper, it was because he was convinced that he could not get on without it. A tri-weekly stage brought the mails from New York City, and there were two or three weekly side mail-routes in the county, which furnished the postal facilities and means of travel for several years thereafter. What still further added to the difficulties in the way of success was the strong hold which the Register had gained upon the people of the county. Judge Hall was one of the most genial and popular of men, and much of his time was spent in canvassing the different townships and becoming personally acquainted with and making friends of the people. Hundreds of Democrats continued to patronize the Register from force of habit and pure regard for its publisher. It required time, patience, and hard labor for Col. Fitch to establish his paper, but he lived to see it successfully accomplished.

The Herald was first printed in an old building on Main Street, opposite the Cochran House, where William W. Woodward's hardware-store now stands. The size of the paper was twenty by twenty-eight inches, the reading-matter being set in clean bourgeois and the advertisements in bourgeois and brier type. The subscription price was two dollars per year. The first press was an old-fashioned Washington lever press, which was worked by hand. This answered the purpose until 1840, when it became necessary to enlarge the paper. To avoid the expense of a new press the experiment of enlarging the old one was tried, and it was successfully accomplished by the skillful workmen in the Lafayette foundry, then owned and operated by that irrepressible Democrat Alexander Boyles. Twice during the first ten years of the Herald's existence its proprietor was awarded the contract for printing the Legislative Journal. The gross proceeds of each contract amounted to about six hundred dollars, and it required about six months, with such mechanical facilities as were available, to complete the work.

In 1842, after thirteen years of arduous labor, Col. Fitch retired from the editor- and proprietorship of the Herald, which he had founded. He was succeeded by his son, Charles W. Fitch, now of Washington, D. C., who published it just one year.

During the period the paper was owned by the Fitches the location of the office was several times changed. For a little while it was in a building on Spring Street, where Jacob Kimble now resides, and later, for several years, it occupied the site of the O'Leary building, opposite the court-house. From there it was removed to the Beach building, on Bazaar Corner, where Samuel Johnson's store now stands. Here Charles W. Fitch left it, in the fall of 1843.

The next editor and proprietor was Gilbert Jndson Beebe, a son of Elder Gilbert Beebe, of Orange Co., N. Y. He assumed control in November, 1843, and continued until November, 1845. Mr. Beebe was a young man of splendid natural abilities and fine education. In addition to being an accomplished writer he was a brilliant stump-speaker, and in the Polk and Dallas campaign of 1844, in connection with Judge Martin Ryerson, he addressed the people of every township in the county, and aroused their enthusiasm for the Democratic nominees.

After two years of editorial life in Sussex, Mr. Beebe retired, in 1845, and in November of that year he was succeeded by Victor M. Drake, of Goshen, N. Y. Mr. Drake, the oldest son of Rufus J. Drake, was born at Milford, Pike Co., Pa., in 1813. In 1824 he entered the office of the Independent Republican, at Goshen, to learn the printer's art under Henry H. Van Dyck, who was then the publisher of that paper. After learning the trade he became the copartner with Mr. Van Dyck as the owner and editor, and subsequently became the sole owner. In 1840 he sold the Independent Republican and removed to New York, where he became connected with Hunt's "Merchants' Magazine," and where he remained until November, 1845, when he came to Newton and became editor and proprietor of the Herald.

Under Mr. Drake's management the circulation of the paper was largely increased. In addition to his labors in the office, he managed to spend much time among the people both in Sussex and Warren Counties, distributing his papers, collecting subscriptions, and soliciting new subscribers. His genial manner and sympathetic nature made him very popular with the people. It is believed that he was better acquainted with and could call more persons by name than any man living in the county. The paper, which had been slightly enlarged under Mr. Beebe, was expanded to twenty-eight columns by Mr. Drake, and the general appearance of the paper greatly improved.

In December, 1853, Mr. Drake was succeeded by Thomas Anderson,—now Judge Anderson,—who was the editor and proprietor until Aug. 4, 1855, when he was succeeded by Col. Morris R. Hamilton, a native of Oxford, Warren Co., and a son of Samuel Hamilton, Esq. Col. Hamilton was a graduate of Princeton College, and had been admitted to the bar as a member of the legal profession. He came to Newton and took charge of the Herald at the solicitation of Col. Samuel Fowler when the wave of political Know-Nothingism was at its highest. In the first issue of the paper under his editorship Col. Hamilton assailed that proscriptive organization, and kept in the fight with great ability and earnestness until he had the satisfaction of witnessing the demise of that political cabal.

Col. Hamilton remained in charge of the Herald until August, 1858, when he was succeeded by James J. McNally, of Orange Co., N. Y., who, assisted by Victor M. Drake, conducted the Herald until August, 1861. In the mean time, the Sussex Democrat, under the editorship of George R. McCarter, had been started, had gained a large subscription among the Anti-Lecompton Democrats of the county, and had materially interfered with the prosperity of the Herald.

Another change in the management of the Herald became necessary, and Henry C. Kelsey, now the Secretary of State of New Jersey, became Mr. McNally's successor. In March, 1862, Mr. Kelsey purchased the Democrat and merged it with the Herald, John W. Gillam, who had been foreman and assistant editor of the Democrat, becoming Mr. Kelsey's partner as editor and proprietor. In February, 1866, Mr. Kelsey became the editor, and Mr. Gillam the publisher. The form was then changed from a four-page to an eight-page paper.

The office had been removed by Thomas Anderson to the old chair-factory building, above the park, by Col. Hamilton to the Park Hall building, on Main Street, and from there to the Snook building, on Spring Street, and by Mr. McNally to the Nelden & Bodine foundry-building, on Spring Street. From there Mr. Kelsey removed it to the old Sussex foundry-building, where ex-Sheriff Smith's building now stands, where, on Friday morning, July 7, 1865, the office, with presses, type, books, files, and furniture, was destroyed by fire. The Sussex True Democrat, which was started after the sale of the Sussex Democrat to Mr. Kelsey, had also been purchased by Mr. Kelsey after being published one year by George D. Wallace. The press and materials of this office still remained in the Nelden & Bodine building, and were brought into use on the morning after the fire. With this press and material, and with the generous aid of the Sussex Register, the Herald was enabled to continue its publication without missing a single issue.

On the 28th of June, 1866, Mr. Kelsey sold his half-interest in the Herald to William H. Bell, of Branchville, and Bell & Gillam became editors and proprietors. Mr. Bell was editor only in name. The paper was edited by Mr. Gillam, assisted by George R. McCarter, until March 4, 1867, when Thomas G. Bunnell succeeded Mr. McCarter as local editor, in which capacity he served until August of the same year, when a company of leading Democrats purchased the establishment of Bell & Gillam and took possession of the office. Thomas G. Bunnell, being one of the largest stockholders, was chosen to be the editor and publisher.

Edwin Owen was the foreman of the office. He was succeeded by Henry C. Bonnell in August, 1868, at which time Victor M. Drake returned from Orange Co., N. Y., to become local editor.

Oct. 15, 1868, the form of the paper was changed back from an eight-page to a four-page, and the size of the paper increased to its present dimensions,—twenty-nine by forty-three inches.

Mr. Drake remained until January, 1871, when he was succeeded by John S. Gibson, who remained until June, 1873. After the retirement of Mr. Gibson, Henry C. Bonnell, in addition to his duties as foreman, became local editor of the paper, in which double capacity he is still serving faithfully and well.

In 1868 the office was removed to the new brick building on Spring Street, now occupied by Roe & Co.'s drug-store, where it remained for five years. In the spring of 1873 it was removed to the library-building, on Main Street, where it is still located. Thomas G. Bunnell is still the editor and publisher of the Herald, the circulation of which is now larger than at any previous period of its existence. In the fall of 1879 a new Cottrell & Babcock, with all the latest improvements, was added.

HENRY COOPER KELSEY.

Henry C. Kelsey, Secretary of State of New Jersey, was born in Sparta, Sussex Co., N. J., Dec. 4, 1837. His great-grandfather, John Kelsey, was one of the early residents of Newton, where he died; he was a tanner and carrier by trade. His grandfather, Henry Cooper Kelsey, was also a tanner and carrier, and carried on his business at Sparta. His father, John Kelsey, was born in Sparta, Feb. 15, 1809. For several years he kept a public-house in his native place, but for twenty years during the latter part of his life he was a farmer and merchant in Green township, where he died April 5, 1867. His mother is Ellen M., daughter of Peter and Elizabeth (Mills) Vankirk, and granddaughter of the late Judge Thomas Vankirk, of Sparta. She was born Oct. 30, 1815, and now resides in Newton.

Young Kelsey received a sound elementary education at the public schools, and at an early age became a clerk in a general store at Sparta. Here he gained an experience that enabled him to subsequently succeed his father as proprietor of a store at Huntsville, where he prosecuted business until 1858. In that year he removed to Newton and there engaged in mercantile pursuits, at the same time taking an active part in public affairs. His political tendencies drew him into close affiliation with the Democratic party, and to promote its success his most earnest labors were always devoted.

In 1859, President Buchanan appointed him to the postmastership of Newton, the duties of which position he fulfilled with his characteristic strict integrity and uniform courtesy until the summer of 1861, when custom required that he should give way to the successful political party. In August of the same year he purchased the New Jersey Herald, the Democratic organ of Sussex County, and devoted his energies exclusively to journalism. In March, 1862, he purchased the Sussex Democrat, the organ of the Douglas Democracy, which was founded in 1858. These two journals he merged into one, under the name of the former, and continued in the editorial harness until June, 1866. During these five years he conducted the Herald with conspicuous ability and success, increasing its value and widening its circulation and influence, which, as the paper had always been one of the ablest Democratic sheets in the State, had been extensive.

In 1868 he was appointed a judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Sussex County, to fill a vacancy on the bench occasioned by the resignation of Judge Townsend, and in 1869 he received the appointment for a full term. The following year, in July, 1870, Judge Kelsey resigned the judgeship to accept from Governor Randolph the appointment of Secretary of State, to fill the unexpired term of H. N. Conger, who had resigned. So well were his duties in this new and responsible position performed that on the assembling of the Legislature in 1871 he was nominated by the Governor for a full term, and confirmed by the Senate, notwithstanding that body was Republican. On the expiration of his term, in 1876, he was reappointed by Governor Bedle, and was again confirmed by a Republican Senate.

The duties, at once arduous and delicate, have been discharged by him in a manner satisfactory to fair-minded men of all shades of political opinion, and he enjoys the high esteem of all whose good opinions are worth having. Notwithstanding his official cares and responsibilities, he finds time for indulging a strongly-developed taste for agriculture as the owner and successful manager of an extensive farm near Newton.

In 1872, his health suffering from close and continuous application to public duties and his individual affairs, his physicians recommended the relaxation afforded by foreign travel; and in accordance with their advice he visited Europe, spending several months in Italy, and being greatly benefited thereby.

Henry C. Holsey

Wm G Bunnell

Mr. Kelsey is ex officio commissioner of insurance, and in this capacity has rendered the public valuable service in ferreting out and bringing to account a number of worthless concerns that had by false showings been covering their corrupt condition and preying on the public. In the latter part of the year 1876, Mr. Kelsey had reason to suspect that the Hope Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York—which was officially composed of a gang of swindlers known as “insurance-wreckers,” and in 1872 had selected as one of their victims the New Jersey Mutual, of Newark—was not in a sound condition, and he therefore instituted an examination into its affairs. Desiring to get possession of the valuable assets of the New Jersey Mutual,—over one million of dollars,—and believing that they could carry on their questionable speculations with more security in New Jersey than in New York, and that they could use the New Jersey Mutual as a machine with which to swallow up other insurance companies under the guise of reinsurance, they approached the directors of that company and proposed to give them one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for its one hundred thousand dollars capital stock and the control of the company. This arrangement was consummated by the Hope Company of New York reinsuring the risks of the New Jersey Mutual. This arrangement continued for about three months, the business being conducted in the office of the Mutual at Newark, where the Hope managers brought into active existence the old New Jersey Mutual, and it, in turn, reinsured the risks of the Hope. From that period until the summer of 1876 matters ran on smoothly; during this time they had by reinsurance or otherwise swallowed up several other companies, and are reported as having made enormous sums of money.

After Mr. Kelsey began the examination, it was soon found not only that this company was insolvent, but that gross frauds had been practiced. Some of the officers attempted, under the guise of reinsurance, to transfer all—and, in fact, did transfer most—of its assets to the National Capital Life Insurance Company, of the District of Columbia, an irresponsible concern. At this juncture Mr. Kelsey instituted the necessary proceedings in chancery to prevent said fraudulent transfer and removal. The law was too slow for the rapid operation of the dishonest officials, and before the court could get the strong hand of the law on them most of the valuable assets had been removed beyond its jurisdiction. Immediately upon this development Mr. Kelsey laid the facts before the Essex County grand jury, and it found bills of indictment against several of the principal conspirators. Some of them fled the country. One was then in New York; a requisition was sent from the Governor of New Jersey to the Governor of that State for his rendition as a fugitive from justice, but it was not honored.

At this particular time was formed a conspiracy against the Secretary of State which was intended to crush and overthrow him,—aiming to destroy his official honor, drive him from office, and make matters so uncomfortable for him that his successor would not dare further to resist them in their operations. An important part of the conspiracy was to subsidize as many of the New Jersey newspapers as possible. Two Newark papers were selected as the principal instruments in New Jersey, and were to lead off in the attack. Mr. Kelsey was to be assailed in the foulest manner and driven out in disgrace. The New York fugitive, from his secure retreat, furnished the libelous matter, and the organs in Newark gave it its first publication in New Jersey. The amount thus expended in spreading broadcast over the State, among prominent men, by means of these and other papers hired for the purpose, information libeling Mr. Kelsey, was stated by one of the principal conspirators to exceed thirty thousand dollars. The Sussex grand jury, at the December term, 1877, found bills of indictment against the two Newark editors for libels published in their respective papers against Mr. Kelsey, charging him with criminal conduct in office. One of them was tried, convicted, and imprisoned, but the other made a suitable retraction in his paper, and was not brought to trial. Another of the conspirators was subsequently captured, brought to Newark, tried before Judge Depue in the Essex County Court, convicted, and sentenced to a term in the State prison. Thus, although sorely tried, Mr. Kelsey was fully vindicated in his honest and fearless attempt to bring to justice corrupt and desperate men holding high and influential positions.

Mr. Kelsey, as commissioner of insurance, has performed much arduous and useful labor, and has reduced that department of the State government to a regular and complete system, as his annual reports to the State Legislature show. By this system and the thorough modification of the statutes the citizens of New Jersey are now protected from the former impositions of “wild-cat” and insolvent insurance companies, both in and out of the State, and by which our own sound and reliable companies are protected.

For many years Mr. Kelsey has taken an active and prominent part in the politics of the State, and in many a hard-fought contest has proved his skill as a leader and organizer of the Democratic party.

In 1861 he married Miss Prudence, a daughter of the late Judge John Townsend, of Newton.

In addition to his other positions of trust and responsibility, Mr. Kelsey is a director of the old Sussex National Bank, of Newton, a director in the Newton Library Association, and a director of the Citizens' Gaslight Company of Newark. In March, 1881, Governor Ludlow nominated him for a third full term as Secretary of State.

THOMAS G. BUNNELL.

William Bunnell, the progenitor of the family in America, so far as is known, was a native of Cheshire,

England, and came to New Haven, Conn., in 1638. He was a farmer and tanner in West Haven, and married Anna Wilmot, daughter of Benjamin Wilmot, of New Haven, in 1640; she bore him five children.

Benjamin, eldest child of William Bunnell, was born in 1642, and married Rebecca, daughter of Peter Mallory, of New Haven, in 1664, by whom he had ten children. He died in New Haven. His sixth child, Benjamin, was born in 1686. Whom he married is unknown, but the names of his children are found on the New Haven records, among whom was Solomon, born in New Haven in 1705, and married Mary Holdren, a native of Holland, who bore him children as follows: Isaac, Benjamin, and Solomon. He removed and settled at Kingwood, Hunterdon Co., N. J., about the time of his marriage. During the French and Indian war he started with his family to remove to the valley of the Susquehanna, but, on his way meeting the people fleeing from Wyoming to escape from the Indians, he turned his course and came to what is called "The Hollow," in Middle Smithfield township, Monroe Co., Pa., where he purchased land and settled. Remnants of the orchard planted by him in "The Hollow" are still in existence.

Isaac, eldest son of Solomon, was born in Kingwood, N. J., July 13, 1738, and married Lanah Barkalow, by whom he had eight children,—viz., James, Mary, Gershom, John, Henry, William, David, and Barnett. Isaac lived and died where he settled, in Monroe Co., Pa.

Henry, fifth child of Isaac, was born in Monroe Co., Pa., July 3, 1778. He married Mary Nihart, of the same county, who bore him twelve children,—viz., George, Julia, Gershom, David, Robert, Isaac, James, Barnett, John, Mary, Henry, and Eleanor. The first five were born in Middle Smithfield, Pa., and the remaining seven in the township of Walpack, Sussex Co., N. J., on the farm now occupied by David Bunnell. This farm was purchased and occupied by their father, Henry Bunnell, in 1809, and, in addition to farming, he carried on blacksmithing. He died Aug. 4, 1826, and his wife April 27, 1858. Both were buried in the old Walpack churchyard.

David, fourth child of Henry, and father of Thomas G. Bunnell, was born March 1, 1806, and married, Sept. 16, 1828, Catharine, daughter of William Smith, of Walpack. He still occupies the old homestead in Walpack where his father settled, and his golden wedding was celebrated by his relations and friends Sept. 16, 1878. Seven of his children are living in 1881,—viz., Thomas G.; Sarah, wife of George Rubert, of Sandyston; Mary, wife of George C. Stoll, of the same township; Martha, wife of John Youngs, of Dingman's Ferry, Pike Co., Pa.; Henry, a farmer in Tioga Co., N. Y.; Joseph W., keeps a public-house in Sandyston; and Frank P., a merchant in Blairstown, N. J.

Thomas G. Bunnell, son of David and Catharine

(Smith) Bunnell, was born in the township of Walpack, March 14, 1834. His early education was received in the schools of his native place and at the Blairstown Presbyterian Academy, under the principalship of the well-known teacher J. Henry Johnson, and for three terms he was a teacher. He married, Sept. 19, 1857, Mary A., daughter of Jonas and Sarah A. (Decker) Smith, of Walpack. Their children are Carrie, Alice A., Willard, John S., and Edith.

For several years after his marriage, Mr. Bunnell was engaged in farming in Walpack and Sandyston townships, and in 1865 he purchased the Benjamin Hull farm, in Walpack, upon which he remained for two years, then removed to Newton, where he has since resided. For several years prior to his removal he had acted as local correspondent of the New Jersey Herald, published at Newton, then owned by John W. Gillam. In August, 1867, Mr. Gillam sold out this paper to an association. Mr. Bunnell, one of its members, was chosen as editor and publisher, and has conducted it with marked ability since.

In early manhood Mr. Bunnell began to take an active part in local politics, and in 1859 served as town clerk of Walpack, and in 1863 and 1864 in the same capacity in Sandyston. In 1865 he was elected a justice of the peace of Walpack, officiating until he settled in Newton. In 1874 he was chosen to the same office in Newton, to fill the unexpired term of William E. Ross, who was elected sheriff. In 1876 he was selected to head the citizens' ticket as one of the town committee favoring the payment of the railroad bonds, was elected, has continuously held the office for five years, and for two years served as chairman of the town committee. During the same time he was also street commissioner of Newton. In January, 1877, he was elected engrossing clerk of the State Senate, and the following year he was re-elected without opposition in his own party. In all these public positions his sole aim has been to discharge the duties incumbent upon him fearlessly, with a view to justice to all, and for the good and general prosperity of the people whom he has represented.

For many years Mr. Bunnell, in connection with his other business, has been collecting historical data, ancient manuscripts, and rare books relating to the history of Northern New Jersey, which he has kindly placed in the hands of the publishers of the history of Sussex County. For his untiring research and indefatigable perseverance in collecting this very valuable material he is entitled to much credit for honest labor, not for money, but from a love for historical truth.

III.—OTHER SUSSEX NEWSPAPERS.

Other newspapers have been published in Newton, as follows:

The Sussex County Home Journal was started in 1850 by Rev. Joseph L. Barlow, but was discontinued in a few years.

The Sussex Democrat was first issued by George R.

McCarter in 1858. It continued to be published till 1861, when it was consolidated with the New Jersey Herald.

The Sussex True Democrat was published about one year by George D. Wallace. Its first issue appeared in 1863.

The Sussex Record, edited by Col. Morris R. Hamilton, made its first appearance in the fall of 1867, and continued to be published little more than a year.

CHAPTER X.

SUSSEX COUNTY SOCIETIES AND ORGANIZATIONS.

I.—AUXILIARY BIBLE SOCIETY OF THE COUNTY OF SUSSEX.

This society was formed in 1817, two years after the State society, and three years subsequent to the British and Foreign Bible Society of England. The names prominently identified with its origin are those of John Linn, Thomas Stewart, Rev. Dr. Joseph L. Shafer, and Peter D. Vroom, Jr. A meeting of a number of inhabitants of the county of Sussex was held at Newton on the 19th of February, 1817, when Mr. Linn was chosen chairman, and Mr. Vroom secretary. It was Resolved, That it is expedient to form a Bible society in the county of Sussex, to be auxiliary to the New Jersey Bible Society."

A constitution was adopted, drawn up by Messrs. Shafer, Stewart, and Vroom. The name chosen was "The Sussex Auxiliary Bible Society." Twenty-three managers were intrusted with the selection of a president, four vice-presidents, and a corresponding secretary from among themselves. The second Tuesday of June was chosen for the time of the annual meeting, but the managers were directed to meet twice in each year. The following are the names of the first officers: John Linn, President; Henry Bidleman, Rev. Joseph Campbell, Rev. Joseph L. Shafer, Evi A. Sayre, Vice-Presidents; Peter D. Vroom, Corresponding Secretary; Samuel Johnson (of Newton), Treasurer.

The young society soon met with the discouragements which menace all such organizations. The managers, at the meeting March 27, 1817, resolved to reduce the quorum number from seven to five, evidently finding public interest insufficient to fill their meetings. But collections began to be made, and the work advanced. The treasurer's report made June 8, 1818, shows the subscriptions from the organization of the society to that date to have been thirty-six dollars and sixty-four cents. The money was directed to be used in buying Bibles. The board in 1819 recommended that an auxiliary society be formed in each township in the county. The treasurer's report for 1820 showed a gratifying advance, the receipts for the year having accumulated to ninety dollars, exclusive of twelve Bibles on hand.

The society was reorganized at its ninth annual meeting to bring it into immediate connection with the American Bible Society. On May 26, 1825, at Newton, the constitution was framed, under the style of "The Auxiliary Bible Society of the County of Sussex," as it remains at the present. The officers chosen at the reorganization were Robert Ogden, President; Jacob Ayers, Benjamin Halsey, Vice-Presidents; Rev. J. L. Shafer, Corresponding Secretary; Job J. Halsted, Recording Secretary; David Ryerson, Treasurer.

Up to the third annual meeting of the new society (May 23, 1827) it was the custom to have a sermon preached at each session, but this order was changed for short practical addresses from several persons appointed for the purpose. At the meeting held at Newton in 1828 addresses were delivered by R. W. Halsted, J. C. Ayers, and Rev. James G. Force. But the meeting, doubting the advantage of discontinuing the usual sermon, or from some other cause, made provision in 1829 to restore the old order, and the custom of having a sermon at the annual meeting has ever since been kept up. At the annual meeting in 1829 the sum of one thousand dollars was fixed upon to be raised as soon as practicable, mainly by subscriptions of ten dollars each; and the following preamble and resolution were adopted:

"Whereas, The American Bible Society have resolved that they will, in reliance upon Divine aid, endeavor to supply with the sacred Scriptures all the destitute families in the United States that may be willing to purchase or receive them within the space of two years, provided means be furnished by auxiliaries and benevolent individuals in season; and therefore, Resolved, That we will endeavor as soon as practicable to pay off the debt of this auxiliary to the parent institution, and afterwards give them all the aid within our power to enable them in the specified time to carry their noble resolution into complete success."

The effort was so successful that at the annual meeting in 1830 the debt to the American society was reported paid, and a balance in hand, exclusive of receipts that day, of eighteen dollars sixty-nine and a half cents. In 1835 a report was made of a canvass of the county by towns, and it was the first occasion of a general distribution of Bibles by the society, the undertaking being in connection with a general work inaugurated throughout the State.

A hiatus occurs in the records, and, indeed, in the actual life of the society from 1835 to 1840. In the latter year another general distribution of Bibles was made throughout the county. Assessments were also proposed at the annual meeting of fifty, thirty-five, and thirty dollars respectively, on the various churches of this county, to raise the sum of three hundred dollars for the work of local and general distribution. This was accomplished in but a limited degree.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the society was held at Newton, Jan. 27, 1842, in accordance with a resolution passed the previous year to hold the annual meeting during the January term of court. On that occasion a numerous audience was present in the evening, and addresses were delivered, after the reading of the managers' report, by Rev. Messrs. Campbell and Davy.

At the fall meeting held Nov. 10, 1842, at North Hardyston, a letter from the Somerset County Bible Society was presented by Rev. J. Campbell concerning the supply of the destitute in the State with the Scriptures. A committee was appointed to correspond with that society, and a report presented by them, which was adopted; but its contents are not noticed in the minutes of this society.

In 1847 the society again distributed Bibles throughout the county, ordering that every child old enough to read should receive a copy, where destitute of the sacred book. At the February meeting, 1848, held at Newton, it was Resolved, That we will attempt to raise the sum of five hundred dollars within the ensuing year as a donation to the parent society."

Part of the sum was raised and paid over to the treasurer.

About this time the first attempt was made to forward the work of Bible distribution in Sussex through the services of a general agent. In 1851, Rev. William Porter, a colporteur in this county of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, was requested to add inquiries regarding Bibles to his more special duties, and at the Sparta meeting, in 1852, it was resolved, upon a report of a committee appointed for that purpose, to furnish to the Rev. N. Conkling, then colporteur of the American Tract Society in Sussex, a horse and wagon, the tract society paying his salary. A committee composed of Rev. J. Campbell and Dr. Thomas Ryerson recommended the following list of instructions to him in the Bible cause, which were adopted:

- "1. To avail himself as far as possible of the aid of the evangelical ministers of the several congregations.
- "2. To procure their assistance in obtaining donations for the society.
- "3. That he shall dispose of the Scriptures as far as practicable by sale, but leave no destitute family un supplied.
- "4. To visit especially the poor and destitute families in the mountains and around our furnaces and mines.
- "5. To urge upon families and individuals, as far as possible, a prayerful attention to the Word of God.
- "6. To report personally at the quarterly meetings of the society."

This arrangement was carried out, and Mr. Conkling labored in the cause for one year. When he ceased the society found itself burdened with the horse it had loaned him, and the animal was finally sold for fifteen dollars, about one-third of its cost.

At the meeting held in Newton, May 12, 1853, the following was adopted:

Resolved, That this board will appropriate twenty-five dollars in co-operation with neighboring Bible societies in supplying the bottom in the Morris Canal with the Word of God, and that the sum be transmitted to the American Bible Society, subject to the order of the Rev. Mr. Beeves and Dr. W. P. Clarke, a committee of the Warren County society, at whose suggestion this action has been undertaken."

During this meeting Mr. Charles M. Halsted, a member of the board of managers, died, and, as upon many other occasions of the death of members, appropriate resolutions were adopted. In 1853 a colporteur of the American Tract Society was again employed by the society for Bible work in Sussex. The minutes for Jan. 11, 1854, are largely occupied with mention of Rev. Dr. Joseph L. Shafer, then recently deceased. In May, 1854, Rev. Mr. Wheeler, colporteur of the American Tract Society, appears to have been actively engaged in this society, and received forty dollars per annum from it.

The following minutes of the meeting held at Stillwater, May 25, 1855, show the relation of the Methodist churches to the Bible society of this county:

"The attention of the meeting having been called to an act of the late Conference of our Methodist brethren recommending co-operation with local organizations in the work of supplying the destitute with the word of life, it was Resolved, That we express our unfeigned pleasure at the prospect of greater unity in this blessed work on the field covered by this society."

In 1856 the attention of the friends of the society was called to the advisability of forming life-memberships. In 1857 much enthusiasm in the work prevailed, and renewed efforts were made to supply with Bibles all the destitute families in the county. Jan. 6, 1858, at Newton, the society so altered its constitution as to have the president and other officers elected by the meeting instead of by the board of managers.

At the annual meeting held at Newton in 1859, Rev. Sylvester Cooke resigned the secretaryship, after a valuable service of twelve years; he was succeeded by Hon. Martin Ryerson. At the same time a new plan was adopted for holding the annual meetings. It was resolved to dispense with the semi-annual meetings, and to hold the anniversary thereafter in June. The first meeting of the new mode was appointed to be held at Branchville on the last Thursday of June following, at 10 A.M., and the committee of arrangements was given discretionary power in regard to having sermons and addresses or addresses only. The committee consisted of Rev. Messrs. Barrett and Campbell and Martin Ryerson, with Rev. G. W. Lloyd, Presbyterian pastor at Branchville.

The meeting in 1859 was one of the most successful ever witnessed by the society. The anniversary in 1860 was held at Andover; at Deckertown in 1861; at Sparta in 1862; at Newton in 1863 and 1864; at Lafayette in 1865; at Branchville again in 1866; and at Newton—the semi-centennial—in 1867.

In 1860 a standing committee on depository was ordered to be elected each year. It was recommended also to the Sunday-schools in the county that they take annual collections to aid in circulating Bibles throughout the world.

The following resolutions were adopted in 1863:

Resolved, That pastors be requested to preach a special sermon in aid of the American Bible Society in December of each year.

Resolved, That we will endeavor to increase the interest of our annual meetings by bringing the subject before our congregations and urging the personal attendance of the members of the churches.

Resolved, That we fully sympathize with the American Bible Society in its great efforts to supply the Word of God to our national army and navy, for men suffering, and for those who fall into our hands as prisoners of war.

"Resolved, That this society will pay its proportion of the expense of supplying the State prison and the State Lunatic Asylum with Bibles and Testaments.

"Resolved, That we unreservedly pledge ourselves to meet the expenses incurred in furnishing pocket New Testaments to the men going from our county to serve in our armies.

"Resolved, That we hail with gratitude the advance being made by the American Bible Society in its foreign work, the society having recently appropriated fifty-five thousand dollars for this department, an amount nearly double its last appropriation."

The following were adopted in 1864 :

"Resolved, That this society assumes one hundred and eighty-six dollars and fifty-eight cents as its proportion of the expense incurred in supplying the New Jersey troops up to Aug. 7, 1863, with Testaments, and the society pledges itself to pay in future its proportion of similar expenses from that time till the close of the war.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this society the establishment of a high degree of civilization throughout our country is essential to its permanent peace and union and the perpetuity of our republican institutions; that to accomplish this work in the South and Southwest, among the poor whites as well as the blacks, will greatly tax the energy and liberality of the whole people; and that, therefore, every patriot, as well as every Christian, is called upon by the highest obligations of patriotism and Christian duty to aid the efforts of the American society and of the other benevolent Christian organizations of our country engaged in this work."

The last resolution was reaffirmed the following year. A resolution by H. C. Clark was adopted at the Lafayette meeting in 1865, expressive of gratitude for the national victory, and calling upon the friends of the society to practically express their gratitude by increased exertions and liberality in behalf of the Bible society and other kindred associations.

SEMI-CENTENNIAL OF THE SOCIETY.

The semi-centennial of the society was held at Newton, June 12, 1867. Original hymns were sung and addresses delivered as follows :

By Hon. Daniel Haines, on "God's Providence fully displayed in the Production and Preservation of the Bible."

Hon. Martin Ryerson read a historical paper on Bible societies, which it is much to be regretted is not now to be found.

Hon. Peter D. Vroom delivered an address on "The Bible in reference to Man in three States,—Innocence, Fall, and Redemption."

Bishop E. S. Jances, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, spoke on the claims of the Bible.

Rev. Dr. Sheldon gave a history of the Sussex society.

Brief addresses were made by Hon. John Hill, John Y. Foster, of Newark, Theodore Little, of Morris, and Rev. G. S. Mott, of Newton.

Hon. Daniel Haines became president of the society in 1868. In that year the county was thoroughly visited again, and all the destitute houses supplied with Bibles. At the annual meeting in 1869 reports of the various committees and workers formed an interesting feature. Mr. Chandler Starr, the oldest manager of the American Bible Society, was present, and delivered an address; also Hon. William E.

Dodge, Sr., of New York. The meeting was a notable one in respect to subscriptions reported for the closing year by the treasurer,—one thousand and three dollars and four cents, including a balance of sixty-four dollars and three cents from 1867-68.

The growth of interest in Bible work in the county is well shown by the minutes of the annual meeting held at Lafayette in 1871. Rev. N. Vansant, from the committee on resolutions, reported the following, which was adopted :

"WHEREAS, The increasing attendance at these our annual meetings shows an increasing interest in the Bible cause, and is a reason for gratitude to every lover of the Bible, we cannot longer close our eyes to the fact that providing for the entertainment of so large an assemblage in our rural villages entails a vast amount of labor on the ladies and thereby prevents their attendance and enjoyment of these meetings; therefore,

"Resolved, That hereafter we recommend to the people of our own county to provide for their own entertainment at these annual meetings, either on the plan of picnics or by family groups, as in their judgment shall seem desirable."

Cotemporaneous with the passing of this resolution an effort was made to procure a tent for the accommodation of the meetings; subscriptions amounting to one hundred and ten dollars were pledged, but the matter subsequently fell through. An address was delivered at the same meeting by Rev. S. Irenaeus Prime, D.D., editor of the New York Observer.

Thus it appears from the records of this society that the work of Bible distribution has been heartily remembered and sustained by the people of Sussex County from a very early period, dating almost coetaneously with the first movement for the organization of Bible societies in Europe and America. It speaks well for the moral and Christian tone of the people of these healthy rural settlements, and for their zeal in promoting the moral and religious welfare of the community.

The sixtieth anniversary of the society was held in the Methodist Episcopal church at Andover, June 13, 1877; sermon by Rev. J. F. Smith, D.D., of Newark. The annual meeting for 1878 was held in the Presbyterian church at Branchville on Wednesday, June 12th. In 1879 the annual meeting was held in the Baptist church at Hamburg, when the occasional sermon was preached by Dr. Moffit, of the Princeton Theological Seminary.

The present officers of the society, elected at the annual meeting June 9, 1880, are the following: President, Hon. Samuel T. Smith; Vice-Presidents, David R. Hull, Smith M. Fisher; Treasurer, Samuel Johnson; Depository, referred to board of managers; Secretary, William P. Nicholas; also a board of managers for each township: Stillwater, T. B. Coudit; Green, W. H. Hart; Byram, Rev. J. J. Crane; Andover, Albert Puder; Sparta, H. B. Strait; Hardyston, Charles Linn; Lafayette, William M. Pollison; Frankford, L. H. S. Martin; Hampton, Isaiah Wallen; Vernon, William Toland; Wantage, James H. Dunning; Montague, Jesse Lundy; Sandyston, John Kyte; Walpack, John S. Smith; Newton, Charles D. Thompson.

II.—SUSSEX COUNTY MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

The Sussex County Mutual Insurance Company was incorporated by act of the Legislature approved Feb. 22, 1840. The following-named persons were the original incorporators: James Stoll, Isaac Bonnell, John Bell, John Strader, John H. Hall, Andrew A. Smalley, Robert F. Shafer, George H. McCarter, Pierson Hurd, Walter L. Shee, Joseph Linn, Alexander Boyles, James Evans, and Joseph Northrup, Jr.

The first board of directors named in the charter, and who held office till their successors were duly elected and qualified, were Isaac Bonnell, John Bell, Pierson Hurd, John H. Hall, John Strader, Robert F. Shafer, Walter L. Shee, James Evans, Andrew A. Smalley, Zachariah H. Price, Joseph Northrup, Jr., George H. McCarter, Whitfield S. Johnson, Nathan Smith, Nathaniel Drake, Reuben F. Randolph, Isaac V. Courseen, Richard R. Morris, and Elias L'Homme-dieu.

A set of by-laws for the government of the company was adopted June, 1840, and amended February, 1859. The charter was first obtained for thirty years, and in 1870 was renewed for thirty years more.

The following is a list of the presidents, secretaries and treasurers, and members of the executive committees of the company from its organization to 1880, inclusive:

PRESIDENTS.

John H. Hall was the first president, elected in 1840, and continued till 1847, when he declined a re-election, and Robert H. McCarter was chosen in his place. Mr. McCarter served one year, and in 1848 Mr. Hall was again elected, and held the presidency of the company till 1859. He was then succeeded by Jonathan Whitaker, who remained president till 1874, when the present incumbent, Dr. Franklin Smith, was elected. Hence the company has had four presidents during the forty years of its existence.

SECRETARIES AND TREASURERS.

Whitfield S. Johnson was secretary and treasurer of the company from its organization till 1861,—a period of twenty-one years. He was succeeded by Dr. Franklin Smith, who officiated two years, until the election of Daniel S. McCarter, who held the offices from 1863 to 1868, and was succeeded by Oakley B. Pellet, who was secretary and treasurer from 1868 to 1871. John T. Stewart was then elected, and held the offices till 1880, at which date the present secretary and treasurer, Charles P. Rorbach, was elected.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEES.*

The following have served as executive committees of the company for the years named:

* The presidents of the company are ex-officio members of the executive committees.

1840-43.—George H. McCarter, Joseph Northrup, Jr.
 1843-45.—Robert H. McCarter, Samuel Rorbach.
 1845-47.—Robert H. McCarter, Lewis Howell.
 1847-48.—John H. Hall, Samuel Rorbach.
 1848-55.—Samuel Rorbach, William Beach.
 1855-56.—William Beach, James R. Hull.
 1856-61.—Franklin Smith, James R. Hull.
 1861-64.—James R. Hull, William P. Nicholas.
 1864-70.—David Thompson, John McCarter.
 1870-71.—David Thompson, John W. Lane.
 1871-72.—Franklin Smith, William P. Nicholas.
 1872-74.—Franklin Smith, Peter S. Decker.
 1874-79.—Peter S. Decker, Jacob E. Hornbeck.
 1879-81.—John W. Lane, John Loomis.

Of those who took part in the original organization of the company, only three are now living; these are Isaac Bonnell and Andrew A. Smalley, of the incorporators of 1840, and Zachariah H. Price, of the charter board of directors.

OFFICERS FOR 1881.

President, Dr. Franklin Smith; Secretary and Treasurer, Charles P. Rorbach; Executive Committee, John W. Lane, John Loomis; Directors, Jacob E. Hornbeck, Martin Cole, William McDonalds, Elias R. Goble, Amos Smith, Peter S. Decker, Christopher B. Van Syckle, David R. Hull, David Thompson, Zachariah H. Price, Thomas Lawrence, John W. Lane, Job J. Decker, Franklin Smith, John Layton, Jr., Albert Puder, John Loomis, James L. Munson, Asa Wilson.

III.—SUSSEX COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

At an adjourned meeting of citizens of Sussex County favorable to the formation of an agricultural society, held at the court-house in Newton on the 17th of December, 1856, on motion, Joseph Greer, of Newton, was chosen president, Henry K. Winans, Esq., of Vernon, vice-president, and Victor M. Drake, of Newton, secretary. On motion of Judge Davis, the committee appointed at a former meeting were requested to report the constitution and by-laws for the society, which were unanimously adopted. The committee appointed at the former meeting to select officers for the society for the ensuing year reported the following: President, Lewis Dunn, Vernon; Vice-Presidents, William Ryerson, Franklin; Thomas Lawrence, Hardyston; George C. Shaw, Stillwater; Secretary, Victor M. Drake, Newton; Treasurer, Daniel S. Anderson, Newton; Executive Committee, Peter Smith, Byram; Samuel H. Hunt, Green; Azariah Davis, Newton; Elias R. Goble, Stillwater; Nathaniel Van Auken, Walpack; Abram Predmore, Sandyston; Jacob Hornbeck, Jr., Montague; Nathan S. Roe, Frankford; Jansen H. Beemer, Wantage; Charles Mackerly, Lafayette; John B. Monnell, Hardyston; James L. Munson, Sparta; John Rutherford, Vernon.

On motion, the following was adopted:

"Resolved, That the executive committee of the Sussex County Agricultural Society are hereby instructed to report to the next meeting of the society on the expediency of establishing an agricultural school, or an agricultural department in a school, in this county."

Mr. J. H. Frazee, secretary of the State Agricultural Society, being present at the meeting, delivered, by request, an able and interesting address.

The executive committee met at Newton on the 9th of January, 1857, and adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That an agricultural exhibition and fair, including the mechanic arts, household and domestic manufactures, animals, grains, fruits, farming utensils, agricultural implements, minerals, etc., etc., be held at some place in Sussex County to be hereinafter designated, commencing on Tuesday, the 6th day of October next, and continuing three days, at the close of which an address will be delivered, premiums awarded, and the names of exhibitors read.

"Resolved, That the next meeting of the executive committee be held at Park Hall, in Newton, on Wednesday, the 11th of February next, to hear the report of the committee appointed to draft a list of articles for which competition will be invited and premiums awarded, and that the said committee consist of the following persons,—viz, Azariah Davis, George C. Shaw, James L. Munson, Charles Mackerly, Samuel H. Hunt.

"Resolved, That the following gentlemen constitute a committee to resolve propositions and fix upon a place for holding the county agricultural fair,—viz, Newton, Azariah Davis; Lafayette, Charles Mackerly, Sparta, James L. Munson; Branchville, Nathan S. Roe; Deckertown, James H. Beemer; Hamburg, Thomas Lawrence,—and that they make their report to the next meeting of the executive committee.

"Resolved, That Lewis Dunn, George C. Shaw, Zachariah H. Price, Azariah Davis, James H. Beemer, Daniel D. Gould, and George M. Ryerson be appointed delegates to represent Sussex County at the meeting of the State Agricultural Society to be held at Trenton on the 21st of January next for the purpose of advancing agriculture in the State."

There was in connection with this organization an agricultural club, which held regular meetings for hearing addresses, reading papers, and participating in discussions on various topics relating to theoretical and practical husbandry. This club met on the 11th of February, 1857, in Park Hall at 10 A.M., and in the evening addresses were delivered by several invited speakers.

Meetings of the Sussex Agricultural Society and of the executive committee were of frequent occurrence during the spring and summer of 1857, at several of which addresses were delivered by Prof. G. H. Cook, State geologist, and by others, the attendance at most of these meetings being large and manifesting much interest in the improvement of agriculture in the county.

At a meeting of the executive committee held in Park Hall on Feb. 25, 1857, propositions were received from Deckertown and from Newton as competing places for the establishment of the fair-grounds of the society. The former made proposals to give five hundred dollars and the use of the ground free of expense, the funds to be paid in advance to help defray the expense of fitting up the grounds. The latter place over-bid Deckertown, and became the happy recipient of the Sussex County fair-grounds. A list of articles and premiums was then made out and submitted to the committee at their next meeting, held at Park Hall on the 8th of April following. This list will be found published in full in the New Jersey Herald of May 23, 1857, occupying nearly two full columns.

Competition was thrown open to exhibitors from all parts of the State and contiguous portions of other States. Upwards of thirteen hundred dollars in cash premiums were offered by the society; the grounds were fitted up with suitable buildings and offices, and stabling provided for two hundred head of cattle and horses. The time originally appointed for holding the fair was changed to one week later in the season, and the first fair and exhibition of the Sussex County Agricultural Society was held at Newton on the 13th, 14th, and 15th of October, 1857.

The opening of the fair-grounds was inaugurated by the presence of the executive committee and officers of the society, two beautifully-uniformed military companies, bands of martial music, together with a cavalcade of the citizens of Newton, officers of the State Agricultural Society, fire company, county societies, and local committees. The fair was a decided success in every respect. The gross receipts were about three thousand five hundred dollars, of which thirteen hundred dollars were received at the gates. During the three days of the exhibition it was estimated that the grounds were visited by not less than twenty-five thousand persons.

The fairs were held on the old fair-grounds, south of the Newton depot, which were laid out in 1857. They consisted of about thirty acres adjoining the cemetery, well adapted naturally for the purposes of a fair-ground and race-course, and provided with half-mile track, suitable offices, stalls, and other buildings. These grounds were used for fairs until the outbreak of the Rebellion, and the society was dissolved in 1864. Part of the ground is now occupied by the Newton shoe-factory.

BENEFITS OF THE EXPERIMENT.

The old Sussex fairs, which were held annually for several years before the late war and with much success, were a great advantage to the inhabitants of the county. Competition developed the energies and abilities of the people, aroused an interest in the improvement of cattle and stock, and advertised the excellence of home products all over the State and beyond her borders. In those days the dairy interests of the county were second to none in the State, and Sussex butter brought the highest price in the New York markets. Every farmer competed with his neighbor in the manufacture of butter and the cultivation of the products of the soil. In those days Sussex County raised the finest cattle and best horses that could be found anywhere, and the demand always exceeded the supply. Sussex County was noted for her good horses and stock. The fairs were the glory of the county, and in their agricultural displays in those days excelled any exhibitions of the kind held in New Jersey. The direct advantages of the fairs to the farmers were felt and seen in the reputation which they gave to the county for its productions and the higher prices which that reputation enabled them to demand for the fruits of intelligent labor and cultivation.

REORGANIZATION OF THE SOCIETY.

The county since the late war was gradually falling below the reputation of previous years, and it was felt that something must be done to bring it up to the high standard which it once held. The home interest must be aroused and promoted and the energy and zeal of the people stimulated to regain what they had lost. Good Sussex butter, excellent grain, fine cattle, stock, and horses, were wanted, and it was felt that the productions of the county should be improved and increased. Nothing arouses public interest and promotes the material prosperity of the people so well as a good, old-fashioned agricultural fair.

The movement was talked over by a few, and it was resolved to call a meeting of the farmers of the county, and one was accordingly held at the Hoppough House, in Newton, in the month of June, 1880. Subsequent meetings were frequently held, and the public interest was gradually awakened, and the movement began to assume tangible shape.

At a meeting held in the court-house, in Newton on Monday, Aug. 2, 1880, the subscription of stock was completed, and at one in the same place on the 9th of August, 1880, a constitution and by-laws were adopted and the following officers were elected for the year 1880: President, Thomas Lawrence; Vice-Presidents, Lewis J. Martin, Albert Puder; Secretary and Treasurer, Henry Huston; Assistant Secretaries, Charles M. Woodruff, Charles L. Insee; Directors, Albert Puder, Peter D. Smith, Gilbert I. Grover, David R. Warbasse, Peter Smith, Thomas Lawrence, Gilbert Ingersoll, Charles L. Insee, Joseph Warbasse, Henry M. Ward, John Huston, Garret S. Van Blarcom, Jacob J. Smith, Jacob E. Hornbeck, Jacob Swartwout; Executive Committee, Luther Hill, William S. Hardin, William H. Hart, Seeley Howel, Henry M. Ward, Joseph Warbasse, Lewis J. Martin, Zachariah H. Price, John P. Wilson. Luther Hill afterwards resigned, and Godfrey F. Hawk was appointed in his place.

The society leased the grounds, and the executive committee at once went to work. They constructed a splendid half-mile track, graded the grounds, built a fence inclosing them, erected sheep-, horse-, pig-, and cattle-stalls, a judges' stand and secretary's office. A list of premiums was made out, and on the day appointed the fair was opened.

The fair began on the 12th of October, 1880, and closed on the 15th, and was a success in every particular. The prospect now is that the future fairs to be held by this society will excel anything of the kind ever attempted in the county, and equal any county fair in the State.

At a meeting held in Newton, Dec. 7, 1880, the same officers were elected for the ensuing year.

IV.—SUSSEX COUNTY SUNDAY-SCHOOL INSTITUTE.

This institution, organized by Sunday-school workers in 1870, flourished for a few years, being held in different parts of the county. During the first week in February, 1872, the quarterly meeting of the institute was held in Sparta, the attendance being large and the exercises interesting. The sessions lasted two days. They opened on Tuesday evening with an address by Rev. A. A. Haines,—subject, "Our Lads," which was treated in a very interesting and instructive manner. The Wednesday morning session was opened with a devotional exercise; then followed discussions on the various topics of interest, participated in by the members present, and closed by a paper on "Sunday-school Teachers," read by Rev. W. B. Wigg.

The children of the village, by special invitation, attended the afternoon session, when blackboard exercises were presented by William D. Casterline, Esq. Mr. Casterline also made a report of the exercises of the Sunday-school Normal Institute held at Plainfield, which he had recently attended as a delegate, speaking in the highest terms of commendation of the advantages of the institute in respect to Sunday-school instruction.

At the evening session the Methodist Episcopal church was well filled. The subject of the "Sunday-school Library" was ably considered by Rev. Mr. McKee, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Sparta, followed by the reading and answering of questions from the "Question-Box," a very interesting exercise to all present.

The above report of a quarterly meeting—which we condense from the New Jersey Herald of that date—gives a fair idea of the objects and work of the institute. It is not our purpose to report all its meetings in detail, but simply to put on record in this history of the county the credit due many of her earnest and devoted Christian citizens for their zeal and labor in this department of the moral and religious culture of the young.

CHAPTER XI.

SUSSEX CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

I.—THE PRELIMINARY ARRANGEMENTS.

At a public meeting held pursuant to notice in Newton on Monday evening, June 27, 1853, to take measures in relation to the Sussex County centennial celebration, a large number of citizens being present, David Robeson, Esq., was called to the chair, and Rev. Nathaniel Pettit appointed secretary.

On motion, a committee of five was formed to report resolutions suggesting a line of action upon the subject. During their retirement there was a general interchange of sentiment among the citizens favorable to the celebration. When the committee reappeared they reported the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"WHEREAS, This is the one hundredth year since the separation of Sussex County from the county of Morris and its organization during the reign of George II., in the year of our Lord 1753, we, the Inhabitants, bearing in remembrance the deeds of our ancestors and the various trials, vicissitudes, and labors which they underwent in the gradual progress of the county to its present state of advancement; in order to cherish those sentiments of patriotism which every man—and especially every freeman—should have for the place of his birth; and in order moreover, to in an interchange of fraternal feelings among our inhabitants, to unite us in still stronger bonds of harmony by the recollections of the past, to enable us more duly to appreciate our privileges and the present condition of our institutions, and, besides, to afford a precedent to future generations that shall testify that we are not unmindful of the high privileges of our birthright; therefore,

"Resolved, That we cherish the profoundest feelings of public regard for the county of our nativity, whose historical reminiscences are so rich with interest, and whose advantages and institutions are so worthy of our proudest admiration.

"Resolved, That on the fifth day of October next, at Newton, we commemorate the organization of the county.

"Resolved, That a corresponding committee of three be appointed to confer, by letter or otherwise, with such persons as are able and disposed to furnish any historical facts connected with the county, and to gather such traditional or statistical information as may give interest to the proceedings and be worthy of preservation.

"Resolved, That an executive committee of thirteen be appointed to make suitable arrangements for the celebration, and to act as assistant marshals upon the occasion.

"Resolved, That a supervisory committee of three from each township be appointed to procure a marshal and an orator, to exert their influence in securing a co-operation in their various localities, and to take such general oversight of the affairs connected with the celebration as may tend to its successful accomplishment.

"Resolved, That the natives of Sussex County, both at home and abroad, our adopted citizens and the citizens of Warren County, once part of Sussex, be cordially invited to join with us in the festivities."

After the adoption of the resolutions, the following-named gentlemen were selected to act upon the committees:

Corresponding Committee.—B. B. Edsall, W. S. Johnson, D. S. Anderson.

Supervisory Committee.—Vernon, Lewis Dunn, Price Vanostrand, Thomas T. Simonson; Harlyston, Thomas Lawrence, Dr. Franklin Smith, Richard E. Edsall; Wantage, Rev. Peter Kanouse, Edward A. Stiles, Dr. Alexander Linn; Frankford, Alpheus Gustin, Charles Roe, Robert V. Armstrong; Montague, John H. Nelden, Isaac Bonnell, Jacob Hornbeck, Jr.; Sandyston, John D. Everitt, David Dejeu, Timothy E. Shay; Walpack, Peter Bewitt, Elfish Boenemann, Benjamin Hull; Stillwater, Dr. C. V. Moore, James Merkel, John W. Oplyko; Green, Isaac Shiner, Samuel H. Hunt, Nathaniel Drake; Byram, Cyrus S. Lepout, Andrew A. Smalley, Peter Smith; Sparta, Richard R. Morris, Aaron H. Kelsey, Moses Woodruff; Lafayette, James B. Huston, John M. Kalls, John S. Broderick; Newton, Rev. Nathaniel Pettit, Dr. Anthony D. Morford, Edward C. Moore.

On motion of John Linn, Esq., the following resolution relative to the committee composed of gentlemen from all parts of the county was passed,—viz.:

"Resolved, That it is desirable that the supervisory committee should act as soon as practicable, and that they be requested to meet on Monday, the 11th of July, at the hotel of D. Cox, in Newton, at 12 o'clock a. m., to organize and enter upon their duties.

"On motion of Col. Robert Hamilton, it was unanimously resolved that the proceedings of the meeting be published in all the newspapers in Sussex and Warren Counties.

" DAVID RYERSON, President.

" N. PETTIT, Secretary."

II.—THE CELEBRATION.

The committees immediately entered upon the duties assigned them, using the most laudable exertions to make such preparations as would be suitable to an occasion of so much interest to the inhabitants of Sussex County. Gen. Lyman Edwards was appointed marshal of the day, and Col. Simon Kilpatrick, Col. John W. Nyce, and Maj. Peter B. Shafer assistants. B. B. Edsall, Esq., and the Rev. J. F. Tuttle were selected as orators. Previous to the celebration, in all parts of the county great expectations had been raised, and it is to be recorded with pleasure that the most sanguine anticipations were not disappointed. Both the county newspapers contained a full description of the proceedings of the day, from which we shall make some extracts.

Says the New Jersey Herald, "The best and biggest day old Sussex ever saw was last Wednesday. The centennial celebration, for which such ample preparations had long been making, was duly ushered in on the morning of the ever-memorable 5th of October by the ringing of bells from daylight to sunrise, the firing of artillery from the heights above the town, and a display of the American banner from the flagstaff upon the court-house, as well as from the balconies of numerous public and private buildings. The day dawned serene, clear, and tranquil, and ere its close thousands of citizens and strangers poured in as it were from the four quarters of the earth to renew their allegiance, like pilgrims, to the land of their paternal home, some to the land of their birth, and hundreds of others rejoicing in the place of their adoption."

Says the Sussex Register, "When the design of calling together so many veterans of the county as might be possible was suggested, the importance of the occasion assumed its most interesting aspect. There were scores of venerable men scattered here and there throughout the county whose individual lives and memories spanned three-fourths and more of the century which it was proposed to commemorate. The list of such has been extended far beyond what the best informed of our local antiquarians anticipated it could be. The catalogue is enumerated by hundreds instead of scores. And, moreover, when, after invitations had been very generally issued, intelligence was received from time to time of the death of some of those whose greater ages would have made their presence additionally dear, a saddening interest was given to the proceedings of the committee in this respect. Several of those who had received invitation circulars to attend the celebration have in the interim settled their accounts with earth and passed away to be known no more forever. Nevertheless, the veteran array which was actually enlisted was by far the most imposing and fitting feature of the occasion.

"The celebration proper commenced with the arrival of the Newark delegation on Tuesday afternoon. In the early part of the day the streets had been generally cleared of rubbish, and we question if Newton ever manifested more pride than she did in view of this occasion. At noontime flags were very generally unfurled from our hotels, public buildings, and everywhere,—an augury of the joyous event which was to follow. At 4 P.M. the Columbian Riflemen and Newark delegation were announced, and the streets were quickly thronged by those who were eager to bid them welcome. They were received amid the cheers of the assembled mass and a booming salute of cannon. Having paraded the principal streets, they were dispersed to their several quarters, and in renewed communings and festive joy the sun went down on Tuesday.

“Bell-chimes and cannon-peals hailed the dawn of Wednesday. At a very early hour commenced the flow of a human tide which long before noon had swelled to the largest concourse ever assembled in our county. We estimate that there were not less than eight thousand persons in attendance, and the license which is usually indulged in such estimates would easily raise it to ten thousand or twelve thousand. As soon after 11 A.M. as possible the procession commenced forming. It was headed by the Newark Brass Band and Columbian Riflemen, after whom followed the several committees, clergy, orators, and veterans. In the procession we counted thirty distinguished by the badge of the Newark delegation, and many others we know were at the time participating in pleasant greetings with their friends and relations throughout the village and vicinity. A banner bearing a fac-simile of the county seal next appeared in the procession, followed by the Delaware Cornet Band of Port Jervis. The five lodges of Odd-Fellows of the county were next represented in order by sixty of their numbers. The Sons of Temperance next appeared, numbering two hundred, equipped with the regalia, banner, staves, etc., peculiar to the order. We only do justice when we give Wantage Division—one of the most distant of those in attendance—the credit of appearing with the largest number of the eight divisions represented. The Temple of Honor of this village—an order as yet in its incipient stages among us—appeared with nearly twenty of its members. A band of martial music next interspersed the moving mass, which was followed by the citizens of Sussex and Warren under their several township banners. The procession reached the speaking-ground soon after 12 M. Judge William P. Robeson, of Warren, was appointed president, and Hon. George Vail, of Morris, and Joseph Green, Esq., of Sussex, vice-presidents of the day.”

On taking the chair Judge Robeson thus addressed the assembly:

“FELLOW-CITIZENS OF SUSSEX AND WARREN,—LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—The unexpected honor of presiding over this vast concourse of people is received with feelings of profoundest gratitude. Although Warren County, in which I reside, was set off from Sussex nearly thirty years ago, my earliest recollections, as well as the history of my forefathers, are connected with Old Sussex. Every place upon which my eye now rests, from the fertile valley to the towering mountain, is familiar and dear to me as the place of my nativity. Your county is a spot upon which God has showered the richest blessings of nature,—such blessings as stir within our breasts the emotions of affection and gratefulness. We may be impressed with wonder and awe at the power of the Almighty as we behold the leaping cataract, but when we cast our glance over this favored land, its mountains rising sublimely and rich with mineral wealth, its spreading plains and undulating hills beautiful and fertile and crowned with plenty, we recognize not only His power, but His benevolence. This land, I am proud to say, is the land of my birth. Yet, in appearing again among you, I miss many of the citizens with whom I associated in early life. They are gone, but their sons are around me. The fact that you are assembled here to-day, imbued with patriotism and devotion to your native country, is a proof that you are worthy of your honored fathers. The duty you have placed upon me I will endeavor to perform to the best of my ability, and I beg you to accept my thanks for the honor you have conferred.”

A prayer was then offered by the Rev. Dr. Shafer. Solemn silence reigned throughout the great multitude while the venerable man lifted up his voice to God in thanksgiving for the mercies of the past and supplication for blessings in the future. The act of worship having been concluded, a choir of young ladies and gentlemen sang the following

“ODE FOR THE SUSSEX CENTENARY.

“BY REV. NATHANIEL PETTIT.

“Dark was the day when our forefathers settled

On the wild banks of the bright Delaware;

The terrors and toils of the forest were found them,

But ne'er did their noble hearts yield to despair.

Hail to the beautiful land they have left us!

Hail to the mountain, the valley, the plain!

Blessed be the homes which protected our childhood,

Where freedom and comfort and happiness reign.

Then, brothers, hand in hand,

Think of the gallant band

Who won us our birthright in danger and toil;

Deep in our inmost heart

Their deeds shall have a part

Long as their ashes shall hallow the soil.

“Scarce had the war-whoop been hushed into silence,

The musket hung up on the rude cabin-wall,

And peace and prosperity crowning their labors,

When war again sounded its terrible call;

Shoulder to shoulder they marched to the conflict

Till British invaders were driven afar;

Brave were the men of Old Sussex before us,

True to their country in peace or in war.

Then, brothers, hand in hand,

Think of the gallant band

Defending our homes from the grasp of the foe,

Deep in our inmost heart

Their deeds shall have a part

While the mountains shall stand or the rivers shall flow.

“Look now around at the myriads of blessings

Heaven has poured on us with bountiful hand:

Labor, protected, has yielded its harvest,

Plenty is crowning our beauteous land.

Treasures of wealth are enclosed in the mountains;
 Health is pervading the bright balmy air;
 Peace and contentment are smiling around us:
 Blessings rest on thee, my country so fair!
 Thou, brothers, hand in hand,
 Hail to our native land!
 Dear is Old Sussex, wherever we roam;
 God shelter thee from harm
 With His almighty arm;
 Hail to Old Sussex,—Old Sussex, our home!"

Part of the centenary was wisely devoted to an eloquent summary of the early history of Sussex by that most competent citizen, the late Benjamin B. Edsall, Esq. It was published in pamphlet form, together with the able address of Rev. J. F. Tuttle, with notes and an appendix, constituting a valuable contribution to the history of Sussex County. The report says,—

"The attention of the audience was riveted upon the speaker for two hours, when he announced an intermission of fifteen minutes before delivering the remainder of his address. During the interval the patriotic song 'Our Flag is There' was sung by Mr. Ritter, of the Columbian Rifles. A stirring air from the Delaware Cornet Band succeeded, when the president proposed three cheers for 'Old Sussex.' Those who heard the loud huzzas which then rose from thousands of voices will never forget them. They were the outbursting of those pent-up feelings of enthusiasm which longed for an utterance; and the hills gave back the shout and prolonged the echoes as if reluctant to let them die. When the acclamations had ceased the speaker gave the latter part of his oration, which occupied in its delivery about an hour. At its conclusion three cheers were again given by the multitude with the same heartiness as before. Previous to the retiring of the people the Columbian Rifle Company marched before the stage, and through Gen. Edwards received the thanks of the citizens for their attendance and the assistance they had rendered upon this memorable occasion. A reply, brief but chaste and beautiful, expressing the great satisfaction and gratification of the company, was made by Lieut. Craven. After a benediction pronounced by the Rev. N. Pettit, the procession reformed and returned to the village.

"Although Newton never held so great a number of persons before, strict order prevailed, and not an accident occurred to mar the pleasure of the day. The sun went down amid the booming of cannon and the general congratulations of our citizens. Towards evening many of the inhabitants of the surrounding villages, who had participated in the festivities, returned to their homes, yet the town was full; they seemed unwilling to lose what yet remained of the celebration.

"The exercises of the evening were commenced with a torchlight procession in much the same order as during the day. After proceeding through the principal streets of the village the procession halted in front of the residence of W. S. Johnson, Esq., who, in behalf of the ladies of Newton, presented a floral wreath to the Columbian Riflemen. He trusted, he said, that the riflemen would ever display the spirit and skill which they had done in their target strife and evolutions of to-day, and with virtue and honor as their aim they could not fail to achieve a merited and honorable distinction. The wreath was received by J. J. Craven, who, in behalf of the company, assured those present that it would be cherished as a pleasant memento of the ladies of Sussex. He remarked in concluding that the tasteful and beautiful wreath of which he was the recipient was only emblematic of the character and loveliness of the donors. A bouquet was presented to the captain of the riflemen, as also one to the Delaware Cornet Band, which was received by one of the company with a neat speech of thanks for the gift. The procession then moved to the Presbyterian church, where the concluding exercises were held. Rev. Thomas Davis offered an appropriate prayer, after which the choir sang the following

"ODE.

"BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, ESQ.

"A rock in the wilderness welcomed our sires
 From bondage far over the dark rolling sea;
 On that holy altar they kindled the fires,
 Jehovah, which glow in our bosoms for thee.

"Thy blessings descended in sunshine and shower,
 Or rose from the soil that was sown by Thy hand;
 The mountain and valley rejoiced in Thy power,
 And Heaven enriched and smiled on the land.

"In church and cathedral we kneel in our prayer,
 Their temple and chapel were valley and hill;
 But God is the same in the aisle of the air,
 And He is the Rock that we lean upon still."

"After a piece of instrumental music by the Delaware Cornet Band, Rev. J. F. Tuttle,* then of Rockaway, N. J., delivered the oration of the evening, above referred to, on the subject of 'Popular Rights in New Jersey previous to the Revolution.' It occupied an hour and a half in its delivery, and was listened to throughout with the strictest attention. His address was succeeded by 'Hail, Columbia!' from the band, when a Doxology was sung to the tune of 'Old Hundred.'

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow;
 Praise Him, all creatures here below;
 Praise Him above, ye heavenly host;
 Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

"The audience then retired with the benediction of the speaker.

"It was not till after midnight that the festivities may be said to have concluded. The roar of cannon was heard, bonfires and torches illumined the darkness, and strains of vocal and instrumental music filled the air. Every house in town, both public and private, was gladdened by social enjoyment. Friends from a distance interchanged their greetings. The patriarch of threescore and ten gazed proudly on his descendants as they again surrounded his fireside and heard him recount the labors and privations of early life. Thus the evening wore away, and many a bosom glowed with generous emotions, and many a brother's hand felt the warm grasp of friendship and affection, as the celebration closed."

We quote two passages from the centennial orations,—one from near the beginning of Mr. Edsall's, and another from the closing remarks of Rev. Mr. Tuttle. Mr. Edsall said,—

"The early annals of Sussex County occupy but a brief space on the historic page. This, however, is to be accounted for without detracting in any degree from the character or merit of your ancestors. Blood and rapine, civil and ecclesiastical feuds, intrigue and usurpation, kingly duplicity and aggression, are the prominent topics of history; while the deprivations and hardships endured in the subjugation of the wilderness, the frequent encounters with beasts of prey, the daily exposure to the vengeance of the treacherous savage, and the numerous other dangers which beset the path of the pioneer, are matters which receive only a passing notice. Nevertheless, these latter transactions have formed the basis of all national superstructures ever since the first couple were sent forth from Eden to people the whole earth with their seed. The men who from time immemorial have gone out to subdue the forests and reclaim waste places have displayed greater courage than any of the titled warriors who, at the head of panoplied hosts, have desolated the nations of the earth and been deified in marble. If the deeds of the first settlers of Sussex have not been preserved in the pages of the annalist, they are engraved in more enduring characters upon the hills and vales and plains and promontories of our county. The 'continuous woods' which originally shadowed the fat soil yielded acre by acre to their sturdy blows; the cabin of hewn logs replaced the first rude hut; orchards were planted, and the virgin soil displayed its strength in rich products of waving grain. The streams which had flowed for centuries in the gloom of the o'erarching trees were opened at intervals to the light of day; the click of the busy mill in due time was heard upon their banks, and the verdure which skirted their margins was cropped by lowing herds. The unerring rifle drove the beasts of prey from the clearings, and in their places flocks of sheep, whose fleeces were wrought by fair hands into garments, disported upon the hillside. And, finally, to complete the picture,

"Where prowled the wolf and where the hunter roved, Faith raised her altars to the God she loved."

Rev. J. F. Tuttle closed his very able and eloquent address in the words following:

"In behalf of New Jersey, fellow-citizens of Sussex, I thank you for this celebration,—the first of the kind in the State. I trust all our counties will follow your example, and gather together to pay a worthy tribute to the men of the past. You have begun to gather scattered materials of your own history: never desist until you have, at least in manuscript, the history of every township, church, and society. Write out the lives of such men as Ogden,—father and son,—Hooper, Sharp, Rosenkrans, Symmes, Harker, Hankinson, Schaffer, and other men equally distinguished. I do not conceive that you have a right to let their names perish. Let the New Jersey Historical Society have the fruits of these labors of love, and then, should some other generation desire to make such a celebration as this, the orators of the occasion shall not be driven to such straits as my colleague and myself have suffered. Had your ancestors done this, I might have been able to confine myself to their history alone, but you must excuse me for doing what I could.

"Whilst not permitted to deal with your local history, yet I have led you over a very pleasant field. We have traced the growth of popular rights in the commonwealth, and we have seen that our fathers were true to the instincts of liberty and acted nobly for the 'remotest posterity.' Like the oak, monarch of the forest, this tree has grown slowly, but constantly. Tyranny has sent many whirlwinds to uproot it, but these only caused it to wind its roots, toughened by resistance, more firmly around the rocks of brave and loyal hearts. The storm of 1776 bent it, but neither broke nor tore it up. Some of its leaves and twigs may have been torn off, but its roots were twisted and twined about the moveless rocks too tightly, and its brawny trunk and limbs had become too stoutly gnarled and hardened into compactness of knot, to be cast down. It still stands with its giant arms lifted heavenward,—not defiantly, but in the meek trust which freedom confides in God."

CHAPTER XII.

PHYSICAL FEATURES OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

I.—GENERAL TOPOGRAPHY AND SCENERY.

THE topographical features of Sussex County present a bold and picturesque outline, its uplands being crowned by the crests of the Kittatinny, or Blue Mountains, which pass through the county from northeast to southwest. This range extends from New England to Virginia, and is a continuous chain save where the Hudson breaks through it at the Highlands, and the Delaware at the Water Gap. Its gradual approach to the Delaware River, preparatory to taking its final leave of New Jersey and entering the neighboring State of Pennsylvania, gives to the water-courses on the west of it a short range compared with those on the east, which form tributaries of the Hudson. But, as if in defiance of this restriction of nature, the Flatbrook has cut for itself a long and nearly parallel channel with that of the Delaware in its passage from the northern to the southern extremity of the county, where it apparently loses its determination to run farther in competition with the principal stream, and falls gracefully into its bosom. The Paulinskil, Walkkill, and Papakating are the principal streams east of the Blue Mountains, the first running southward and entering the Delaware below the Water Gap, and the others coursing to the northeast and falling into the Hudson in Orange Co., N. Y.

The country to the east of the Blue Mountains, although presenting in some places considerable elevations, may be regarded as a large valley, nearly one hundred miles in length and varying in width from ten to twenty miles. This valley embraces four counties,—Warren and Sussex, in New Jersey, and Orange and Ulster, in New York. It was called by the Indians the Kittatinny Valley,—the name which they gave to the Blue Mountain range, which bounds it on the west, in the shadows of which the ancient Leni Lenapè had their chief town, for such is the meaning of the word “Kittatinny.” On the east is the Hamburg or Schooley’s Mountain, called by the Indians Wawayanda. Connected with this valley, to the northward of Sussex, is the Mamakating Valley, down which flows the beautiful Rosendall and its tributaries, emptying into the Walkkill. “Mamakating” is said to mean “the valley of the dividing of waters.” It is in this valley that the Neversink, emptying into the Delaware, and the Lackawanna, which discharges itself into the Rosendall, both rise in the same fountain. And so likewise the Sandkill and Basha’s Kill originate in the same spring in this valley. If it would serve to recover this significant Indian name and preserve a knowledge of its meaning, we might mention also the fact that a branch of Paulinskil and the Papakating rise in the same fountain and part in different directions. The Rev. Mr. Murphy is authority for saying that the Indian word “kating” meant “dividing of waters,” which is countenanced by the above facts, the termination in each name being the same, and in each valley one fountain originates twin streams, descending in opposite directions,—on the one side to the Delaware, and on the other to the Hudson.

Scarcely in the Union, or in the world perhaps, is there to be seen a richer or more picturesque landscape, than presents itself to the eye as you ascend the Wawayanda or the noble Kittatinny, where the immense valley opens the distant prospective bestudded with cottages, hamlets, and villages embossed in outstretching lawns and fields waving with the rising harvest.

Says a recent writer, “Within fifty miles of New York City lies a hillside country leading up to the Blue Mountain range that offers health, rest, and recreation for the tired city merchant or the weary society belle unsurpassed by any spot in the land. This inviting retreat is the county of Sussex, in the State of New Jersey, lying in the triangle formed by Orange County, in New York, and Pike County, in Pennsylvania. From lofty hills overlooking rich valleys through which run creeks and brooks filled with trout and other choice fish can be seen here and there beautiful lakes surrounded by cool woods, while green orchards and waving fields of grass and grain meet the eye on every hand. The farms of Sussex are generally from one hundred to one hundred and fifty acres in extent, and are well supplied with substantial buildings, giving an air of comfort and thrift refreshing to behold. The atmosphere is pure at all times. The high altitude, with its cool breezes, imparts health-giving vigor. The soil is either limestone or slate, both of which furnish good hard roads, affording fine drives in all directions, with an ever-varying landscape, in marked contrast with the monotonous lowland of the southern portion of the State.

“The principal lakes of Sussex are Wawayanda, Swartswood, Decker’s, Culver’s, Morris’, Sand Pond, Struble’s, Hiff’s, Stickle’s, Reservoir, Panther, Smith’s, Turtle, French’s, and many of lesser note. The largest creeks are the Walkkill, the Pequest, the Clove, Paulinskil, and Flatbrook. The lakes have been generally stocked with black bass; Swartswood, Struble’s, and Morris’ with salmon. Swartswood Lake is now said to be the best fishing-ground in the State. It is reached by a romantic four-mile drive from Newton, the county-seat of Sussex. It is indeed a beautiful body of water. It is three miles long and one mile wide, with a pretty green island near the centre, on which has lately been erected a convenient building for camping-parties. An enterprising farmer, Mr. James Emmons, has also built a substantial cottage in his grove on the east side of the lake, which he lets to parties by the week. Greenwood Point, at the southern side of the lake, is one of the most beautiful spots to be found anywhere. A small steamer was built last year, and is available at all times during the summer. Scores of row-boats are to be found along the shores of the lake, which has become the central spot of attraction for the people of Newton, as well as of many visitors from New York City; so that from June to October every pleasant day brings loads of pleasure-seekers to enjoy its attractions. Struble’s Lake, near Andover, about five miles from Newton, over one of the smoothest and hardest of roads, is, if possible, more beautiful than Swartswood, but it has not so many boats available for picnic-parties. A family party can find plenty of enjoyment and the best of fishing at this lake. Stickle’s Pond, three miles from Newton, by way of the Springdale road,—the finest natural drive in New Jersey,—is a pretty little round lake, as clear as crystal, as smooth as glass, and full of choice black bass and pickerel.

“The famous Red Gate Farm, owned by the Hon. Henry Kelsey, is situated upon the Springdale road, about one mile south of Newton. Mr. Kelsey has expended many thousands of dollars in making his farm a vast garden-spot in thoroughness of cultivation. Among the other noted places are the country seat of Martin R. Dennis; the farm formerly the property of George C. Shaw; the White Farm, now owned by Silas Youngs; the estate of the Hon. Thomas Lawrence, at Hamburg; the country residence of Mrs. John Rutherford; the costly Babbitt and Horton properties; the Lewis Dunn place; and last, but not least, the fine homestead of Gen. Kilpatrick."

II.—LAKE HOPATCONG.

Lake Hopatcong is situated partly in Sussex County, with its eastern shore lying upon the border of Morris, and with the Morris and Essex Railroad just passing its southern extremity, the outlet being the head of the Musconetcong River. Tourists on the Morris and Essex Railroad can obtain a prospect of the "sheet of blue among the hills" and continue on their journey west. The lake is amply provided with means of access, which, supplemented by the fact that a half-dozen first-class boarding-houses are ready to receive a large number of guests, gives sufficient corroboration of its admirable location as a place of summer resort. The lake is peculiar in its outline, and around on every side, from the lock of the Morris Canal branch at its southern extreme—of which it is now the principal supply, the reservoir about a half-mile below being fed from its waters—to the town of Woodport, nine miles north, is one continuous display of large receding bays, slightly recessed coves, and open lagoons, behind which are the guarding reef rocks of the shores.

The lake contains about eighteen square miles surface of water. On the eastern boundary the Brookland hills slope from a heavily-wooded shore-line, and thirty degrees to the horizon far up to the height of two hundred and fifty feet is one of those many parallel ranges, spurs of the Kittatinny Mountains, that give to Northern New Jersey her fame for the scenic picturesque. The western pebbled bank lies modestly hidden beneath the luxuriant foliage of ancient chestnut, oak, and maple forests that tradition says were once the favorite hunting-grounds of the local Indian tribes, and it is from this side that the far-reaching Byram's Cove, opposite the two pretty emerald islands in the northern part of the lake, and the river Styx, farther south, branch out, forming smaller separated lakes that bear in beauty and location all the semblance of the romantic ideal haven. Of the latter it is said the name was taken from the mythological stream of the Greeks across whose waters the gracious ferryman Charon was wont to carry the unfortunate dead into purgatory, but one matter-of-fact piscatorial hunter claimed the orthography was an imposition on the public, and maintained that it referred only to the decayed stumps and half-sunken trees at which he had so often vented his anger in unrefined epithets when his fish-lines would become entangled beneath their roots and branches. About a mile from the outlet is Bertrand's Island, a fine piece of scenery formerly owned by a wealthy German, Mr. Ernest Bertrand, a New York sugar-refiner, whose intention was to erect an extensive branch establishment on the lake; but his death prohibited the fulfillment of this plan, and also that of transforming the island into a German manor, with castle, stone embattlement around the whole mile circumference, and causeway and drawbridge. The causeway had been already built and is now in existence, connecting by a huge timber bridge the estate with the eastern mainland.

Lake Hopatcong was not naturally over half its present extent, and until about fifty years ago its outlet only gave power to a few small blast-furnaces at a little village called Brooklyn, then located there, but which at the purchase of the water-privileges by the Morris Canal Company suspended operations.

A small pleasure-steamer has usually plied upon the lake, and also a steam-tug for the purpose of conveying canal-boats to and from the lock, loaded with iron ore, which finds its way through this channel to the furnaces.

III.—DELAWARE RIVER AND WATER GAP.

The Delaware River, which washes the western border of this county, forming the boundary between New Jersey and Pennsylvania, rises on the western slope of the Catskill Mountains. Mount Prospect, a mile or two southeast of its source, rises about fifteen hundred feet higher, and from its summit Albany, some seventy miles distant, may be plainly seen on a clear day. This mountain-range is the oldest of the earth's upheavals. Long before the snow-clad Alps or the Rocky Mountains emerged from their ocean-beds, and before the Carboniferous period, the crests of the Kittatinny pierced the clouds, while their sides were laved by the vast expanse of waters whence they had risen "when the mountains were brought forth."

The grand scenery of the Delaware for the first two hundred miles as it hugs the northwestern slopes of this Titanic range, seeking an outlet, will well repay a visit along its entire distance. It is evident that for ages a barrier existed at the Water Gap which dammed back the river perhaps one hundred miles. Whether the gap was made by the slow action of the waters over a fall like Niagara or by some earthquake convulsion it is difficult to determine. In the latter case we may conceive of them as waiting, as it were, in calmness and patience for ages for the mighty shock which should set them at liberty and send them, leaping and exultant, to the bosom of old ocean; and when the giant sides of the old mountain began to tremble and the colossal barrier was heaved from their path, with what alacrity they rushed in and sped on their way rejoicing to the sea, the pent-up forces of a hundred miles of mountain-stream and the action of gravity impelling them onward with resistless movement! The draining of the waters left the valley of the Minisink as it now exists,—a rich garden,—and opened below its ancient prison-bounds mighty possibilities for commerce.

"The east and west branches of the Delaware—the Popacton and the Mohawk—flow a distance of about one hundred miles to their point of junction, near the northeast corner of Pennsylvania. The place of the union of these streams to form the Delaware proper is called, in the beautiful and significant language of the Indians, Shehawkan, meaning 'the wedding of the waters.' At this point the stream diverges in a southeasterly direction, and, moving on rapidly, receives the waters of the Lackawaxen (Lackanweksink), whose wild ravines echo the songs of the 'merry raftmen.' Approaching the Blue Ridge at right angles, it reaches it again at the junction of the three States near Port Jervis, having journeyed in its rambles one hundred and fifty miles, yet being only half that distance from its source. Along the western base of the mountain it flows in a majestic current, lighting up field and forest, adding a charm to a hundred landscapes. Diverging from the Blue Hills at times to give New Jersey a portion of the rich valley, and again washing their rocky base and receiving the waters of Bushkill, Brodhead's and Marshall's Creeks, the unwearied stream at length reaches the Water Gap, to add the climax of its beautiful creations. The forty miles of the course of this stream along the base of the mountain from Port Jervis to this place is unsurpassed in the variety and beauty of the pictures it presents, and, taken in connection with the numerous adjacent waterfalls, is one of the most interesting portions of the country to the traveler.*"

IV.—GEOLOGY OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

GNEISS.

The gneiss rock of the Azoic formation is the oldest stratum of the geological structure of this county. It is the rock in which the iron and zinc ores are found, and, in a mineral if not in an agricultural point of view, is of great interest and importance. Professor Cook divides the gneiss formation into four belts or parallel strips of territory extending across the State in a northeast and southwest direction, from the New York State line to the Delaware River. In the third of these belts is included the gneiss in Sussex County, consisting of the Hamburg range of mountains, Stirling Hill, and the formation about Andover. "The eastern boundary line of this belt," says Professor Cook, "coincides with that of the crystalline limestone from the New York line to the end of Stirling Hill, near Hamburg. . . . Northeast of Franklin Furnace to the southern limit of the blue limestone of the Vernon valley this belt joins the second belt, the white limestone of the valley bounding the gneiss of the Hamburg Mountain. Passing west of Sparta and the Wallkill, the line passes near Columbia and the Roseville valley, and runs by Andover to Waterloo." We need follow the description no farther.

The gneiss formation of this county, like the same formation elsewhere, is a crystalline and stratified rock, composed of feldspar and quartz, with small quantities of mica, hornblend, magnetite, or other similar minerals. "The quartz is generally in grains, which are flattened in the direction of the stratification, and which, in size, range from an eighth to half an inch in the plane of the stratum, and from one-sixteenth to an eighth of an inch in thickness."

CRYSTALLINE OR METAMORPHIC LIMESTONE.

This part of the Azoic formation appears in this county in a series of outcrops along the Vernon valley, extending into the Wallkill valley east of Hamburg and Hardystonville, by Franklin Furnace to Stirling Hill. From Mounts Adam and Eve, and Round Hill in New York, this range is about twenty miles in length. "Although there is not a continuous exposure of the rock, the frequent outcrops and the absence of Paleozoic rocks indicate an uninterrupted extent of this limestone." From Pochuck Mountain to Franklin Furnace the magnesian limestone bounds it on the west. South of Franklin Furnace, or from Mine Hill to its southern limit, the gneiss of Pimple Hill range joins it on the west. On the east, from Stirling Hill to Franklin Furnace and Snufftown road, blue limestone lies in the valley. The surface of this range of crystalline limestone is very jagged and uneven.

"Generally this rock is coarsely crystalline, being made up of large rhombohedral crystals. Sometimes it is finely granular, and even amorphous, in appearance. The color is sometimes of a grayish or pinkish tinge, but most generally it is of a pure white, its lustrous cleavage surfaces giving it a bright and resplendent aspect. Nearly everywhere the rock contains graphite in brilliant scales disseminated through the mass." Mica and other minerals are quite common in it, and sometimes it appears interstratified with sienitic gneiss, seen in alternation, as at Mine Hill and southeast of Hardystonville.

POTSDAM SANDSTONE.

Passing to the Paleozoic rocks, the first subdivision is the Potsdam sandstone. This rock has a limited area in Sussex County. At Franklin Furnace is one of the best exposures in the State, where the sandstone can be seen lying unconformably upon the gneiss, and the magnesian limestone directly over it. "The meeting of the gneiss and sandstone is best seen just at the west of the road, while the meeting with the limestone is best seen in the road on the east of the wagon-track." The small area of Potsdam sandstone observable in the county is very thin: at Franklin Furnace it is not more than from four to twenty feet thick. In German valley, in the Pequest valley, and in other places it is a fine-grained, light-colored freestone, working readily under the hammer, and is in some demand for building purposes.

MAGNESIAN LIMESTONE.

This name is applied to the common blue limestone of the Kittatinny valley and of the valleys of the Highlands. In the New York reports it is called calcareous sandstone,—evidently a misnomer, as it contains no sand or other material to entitle it to such a designation. In the West, as in New Jersey, it is called, very properly, magnesian limestone, and Professor Cook remarks that "its usefulness will be increased by giving it a proper name."

This formation lies beneath the Trenton limestone and above the Potsdam sandstone. In New Jersey no fossils have been found in it. It is a fine-grained rock, varying in color from a drab to a deep blue and almost a black, and is so soft that it can be easily scratched with a knife. In some cases it is a pure magnesian limestone or dolomite, in others it contains a moderate percentage of impurities, and cavities containing quartz crystals are sometimes found in it. "Near its meeting with the Potsdam sandstone there is an alternation of sandy and calcareous layers, as if the change from one to the other had been a very gradual one. This rock lies in a series of long and narrow parallel belts, which extend from the northeast to the southwest. They are not in horizontal strata, however, but are folded or doubled about certain lines or axes, which lie in their highest direction and very near their middle. In some cases the strata are folded upwards on these lines, when the axis is said to be synclinal; in other cases they are folded downwards, when the axis is said to be anticlinal."

In Sussex County this rock outcrops in the valley of the Walkkill between Franklin Furnace and the head of the hill southwest of Sparta. The rock forms little knolls and irregular ridges of considerable height, separated by the smooth meadows or flats of the valley. It is therefore a series of outcrops rather than a continuous exposure, occupying an area, bounded by the Walkkill and Hamburg Mountains on the east, and Briar Ridge and the Pimple Hills range on the west. On the latter border the white or crystalline limestone constitutes the bounding rock.

The eastern portion of Vernon valley, beginning near West Vernon, is underlaid by the blue limestone, which extends north to the State line, and beyond it into the Warwick valley. The Hamburg and Wayanda Mountains limit it towards the east; on the west it joins the crystalline limestone. The boundary along the mountains on the east runs nearly in the same direction as the road from West Vernon to Vernon and New Milford. South of Vernon it is at most points a short distance above the road, the limestone showing itself at intervals above it. It is over an eighth of a mile east of Vernon on the side hill, and continues about that distance from the Warwick road for two miles. Gradually approaching, it crosses this road near a large spring, and then for half a mile northeastward keeps on that side of it. Again crossing to the east side, it runs to the State line a short distance southeast of New Milford. Throughout most of the area embraced within these bounds the surface consists of meadow and drift hills and ridges. The actual limestone surface is considerably less than that of a more recent age.

The southeastern portion of the Kittatinny valley is occupied by a belt of limestone bounded on the southeast by the Azoic formation, and on the west by the slate. The latter rock is also found within this belt, forming a narrow ridge east of Lafayette and Newton, and a shorter range of outcrop in Green township, terminating near Johnsonsburg. This limestone belt crosses the State line and terminates near Mapes Corners, south of the New York and Erie Railroad, in Orange County. In New Jersey its length from the New York line to the southwest end of Jenny Jump Mountain is thirty-eight miles. Its breadth varies from a scant half-mile to nearly five miles, including the slate ridge. The outcrops of the rock are very frequent, excepting in those portions occupied by wet meadows and the alluvial district known as German Flats; these comprise a large proportion of the whole area. The remainder of the surface shows many ledges and upturned edges of the limestone; so that the determination of its boundaries is comparatively easy. The marked contrast between the rough and uneven limestone surface and the smooth, rounded slate hills assists very materially in tracing the lines of their separation.

The valley of the Paulinskill is a long anticlinal limestone valley, extending from near Branchville to the Delaware River at Columbia,—a distance of twenty-five miles. Its breadth varies from one to two and a half miles, and it is bounded on all sides by the slate formation. The limestone of this valley dips from a central axis each way towards the slate, the latter forming the higher grounds which border the valley.

FOSSILIFEROUS LIMESTONE.

This is known in the New York system as the Trenton limestone. It lies between the magnesian limestone and the Hudson River slate. It is found only in one particular belt in New Jersey, which stretches across the counties of Warren and Sussex from near Belvidere to the New York State line. There is no one place known where its meeting with the limestone below or the slate above it can be plainly shown, and it probably shades into them gradually. The rock is thin and rough-bedded, and readily breaks into small pieces; so that it is difficult to obtain it in large masses. The stone is dark-colored, crystalline in fracture, and full of indistinct fossils.

West of Stillwater, near the slate, there is a hill of this fossiliferous limestone. The outcrop is crossed by the road from Stillwater to Millbrook. The stone here is grayish blue in color and thin-bedded in its upper portion. About a mile north-northeast of this locality occurs another area of this rock, very similar in character and position; and it is also seen on the farm of Col. William Babbitt, southwest of Newton, and on that of Jesse G. Roe, half a mile northeast of Branchville.

HUDSON RIVER SLATE.

This rock occupies the northwestern half of the Kittatinny valley, and also the middle part of some of the limestone valleys farther southeast. It is seen very close to the magnesian limestone and overlying it at Columbia, on the Delaware, at Newton, and at many other places, though no locality has been observed where they were in actual contact. The most perfect of the slate rock is soft and free from grit, and possesses in a wonderful degree the property of cleavage, or of splitting up into slates. When in a moist state, as first taken from the quarry, the rock can be split into sheets so thin as scarcely to bear handling, but this capability disappears with the evaporation of the moisture. It is remarkable that this cleavage does not follow the lines of stratification as they appear in the bed or quarry, but passes directly across them. There are some beds in this slate formation which show no lines of stratification. Such is the one at the quarries of Asa Carr, north of Deckertown, where the formation is remarkably even and has yielded flags of enormous size. The area of the great slate belt of the Kittatinny valley is thus described:

The slate constitutes the rock of all that portion of this valley bordering the Blue or Kittatinny Mountain, and, excepting the Paulinskil limestone, all of the central portion also, in addition to the ranges which lie in the southeastern portions of this great valley. The belt now to be described embraces all that part of the valley lying west of a line drawn from Belvidere through Sarepta, Hope, Johnsonsburg, Newton, Lower Lafayette, and east of Deckertown to the State line, near the Walkill. The western boundary of this great slate belt follows the general trend of the Kittatinny Mountain, running on its southeast slope from the Delaware River its whole length in this State. Through Warren County and in Sussex to Culver's Gap this limit of the slate and overlying conglomerate is at a moderate elevation above the valley, while north of this gap the boundary is near the top of the mountain. At the State line and in Orange County to Otisville the slate forms the main ridge or crest of the mountain, and the conglomerate occupies its western slope. The southeastern slope of the mountain is characterized throughout much of its length across New Jersey by a bold escarpment of conglomerate, with its talus or fallen debris below resting on the more gradual declivity of the lower portion of the mountain. The line of demarcation between the conglomerate and the slate is very distinct and decided.

ONEIDA CONGLOMERATE.

This rock, incidentally referred to above, has its position directly on the Hudson River slate. It is a conglomerate or sand-stone, the lower part being made up of quartz pebbles from a fourth to three-fourths of an inch in diameter, cemented by a light-colored quartzose paste. The well-known Esopus millstones are made of this variety of the rock; but near the top of the formation the pebbly composition disappears, and it becomes a firm, compact quartzose, easily distinguished from the Green Pond Mountain rock by its lighter color.

This rock has furnished no fossils, but portions of it are pyritous and have been worked for gold, yielding about eleven dollars to the ton, though some sanguine miners have estimated it much higher. The occurrence of iron pyrites is so common in it that localities need not be specified. Galena or lead ore was found in it at an early day, and the Ellenville and other mines in New York were at one time extensively worked, but are now abandoned. The thickness of the conglomerate, by measurement at Otisville and northwest of Newton, on the Walpack road, was found to be between eight hundred and nine hundred feet.

MEDINA SANDSTONE.

This rock is named from Medina, in New York, where it first attracted the attention of geologists and practical quarrymen. In this county it lies upon the western slope of the Kittatinny and its subordinate ridges, apparently not extending west of the Delaware or of Flatbrook, Little Flatbrook, or Millbrook. These streams follow the valley, which lies between the outcrop of the sandstone and the ridges of water-lime and Lower Helderberg rocks west of it. The thickness of this sandstone can be only approximately measured, being estimated at eighteen hundred feet at Walpack Bend.

The more shaly members of this formation are traversed by cleavage planes, which give the rock in some places the appearance of red slate. These planes of cleavage dip generally at a steep angle to the southeast. They can be seen along the road at the bank of the Delaware between the Pahaquarry copper-mine and Brotzmanville; also west of Millbrook, near Flatbrookville, and wherever the rock is argillaceous. At the Pahaquarry copper-mine the rock is of a grayish shade. The texture varies greatly near the bottom; the rock is generally an arenaceous sandstone, made up of quartz grains, with some beds containing small pebbles of white quartz, the upper members being nearly all a reddish shale very much split up by the cleavage. The rock is not properly a freestone, and has never been much used for building. Copper and iron pyrites have been found in it at different places.

WATER-LIME.

The rocks of this formation are well exposed a mile north of Walpack Centre; on the Peters' Valley road; at Walpack Centre; on the road towards the Delaware; at Stoll's limestone-quarry, half a mile south of Walpack Centre; and along the brook below Flatbrookville. Its thickness is estimated at from forty to sixty feet. Fossils are rarely found in this formation, although in this State it has not been very thoroughly examined. Professor Cook says, in his work of 1868,—

"It would be of much scientific interest to have the place of the water-lime examined in our State, and there are locations where the examination could be made at moderate expense."

LOWER HELDERBERG LIMESTONE.

This limestone is well developed in Sussex County. It forms the middle and upper part of the eastern face of the entire range of hills along the Delaware from Carpenter's Point to Walpack Bend. In this group is included the fire-stone, a thick-bedded and solid limestone full of indistinct fossils of a crystalline substance, which is seen three-fourths of a mile south of Peters' Valley, half a mile north of Walpack Centre, at Walpack Centre, at Flatbrookville, and in many other places. This rock, on account of its capability for standing a high degree of heat, is used for building lime-kilns. Its color is a dark blue, sometimes streaked with red. When burned it makes a dark-colored but very strong lime.

ORISKANY SANDSTONE.

This group lies between the Lower Helderberg and the cauda-galli, and is quite extensive in the Delaware valley. It can be seen almost everywhere from the State line to Walpack Bend.

"A fine locality for examining rocks and included fossils is along Chambers' mill-brook, northwest of Isaac Bunnell's residence. Here the rock forms a perpendicular wall along the brook for some distance. At an old quarry on the south or left bank a large number of casts were found. Half a mile west of Centreville, on the Dingman's Ferry road, at the corner, calcareous and shaly beds are seen. Some layers close under the grit rock are crowded with casts of Spirifers, Platystoma, etc. West of Walpack Centre the same shaly beds are seen. . . . West of Flatbrookville it forms the face of the ridge, looking towards the village."

CAUDA-GALLI GRIT.

The rocks of this epoch are quite largely developed in Sussex County between the State line and Walpack Bend. They occupy the top and part of the western slope of the hills west of Millbrook and Flatbrook, being bounded by the Oriskany sandstone on the east and by the Onondaga limestone on the west.

"It is the most persistent member of the series of rocks which compose this range of hills or ridges. The outcrops are very numerous, and the intervals where it does not appear are not of great length. This frequency of exposure and its superior hardness make the dividing line between it and the shales of the Oriskany period very distinct; the latter rapidly crumble to a soil and are mostly tilled, while the surface of the former is broken by projecting knobs and ridges of hard rock."

This rock is remarkably uniform in character throughout its outcrop. It is a compact, hard, gritty slate, fine grained and dark gray, verging to black. It is split up nearly everywhere by cleavage planes, its dip being towards the southeast,—in some places nearly vertical.

ONONDAGA AND CORNIFEROUS LIMESTONE.

These limestones belong to the Upper Helderberg series. In this county they are exposed along the Delaware River, occupying a breadth of about two hundred yards west of the grit formation, and between that and the Delaware, with the exception of one point near Shabacong Island. At Milford and at Dingman's Ferry the breadth is not more than one hundred yards.

"The dip is uniformly towards the northwest. The rock may be seen with this dip in Laurel-Grove Cemetery, near Carpenter's Point; at Montague (ferry to Milford), and intermediate points along the river; at Dingman's Ferry; and so on to Walpack Bend. . . . This limestone is of a light bluish color, very fine grained, and in beds remarkably uniform in thickness. The chert occurs in certain beds, sometimes composing half of the rock.

"The Onondaga limestone is barely recognized by an encrinite and a cyatho-phylloid coral, and two other fossil specimens found in a road about one and a half miles northwest of Dingman's, and about four hundred yards south of Dusenbury's distillery."

This rock has been used for lime, and to some extent for building purposes.

MARCELLUS SHALE.

The only place where this rock occurs in New Jersey is in this county, and that in a very small area opposite the south end of Shabacong Island, on lands of Abram Van Noy. It is seen for about three hundred yards along a bank about twenty feet above the water, and forms the bottom of the river for some distance out from the shore. It contains iron pyrites, the fossils in it are quite abundant, it is colored by hydrous oxide of iron, and it is very dark,—almost a jet black.

SURFACE GEOLOGY.

Drift.—According to Professor Cook, the drift in the Kittatinny valley belongs more to the Champlain than to the glacial epoch. The glacial drift, however, is found undisturbed on the higher grounds. On the slate ridges it is thin, and in many places there are but few widely-scattered, small boulders. This is particularly the case in many of the high slate hills of Sussex County. On the western side of the valley, near the Kittatinny Mountain, the drift increases in thickness, and this, together with the circumstance of the not infrequent appearance of fossiliferous rocks from the Delaware valley, makes it evident that the movement of the materials was towards the southeast. At the northeast, along the Walkkill, the drift and other formations are covered by the Drowned Lands.

On the summits of the Kittatinny Mountain the glacier for the most part simply ground down and polished the more prominent ledges, without leaving much deposit of materials. Indeed, much of the materials carried to the lower portions of the country consist of the débris of these summits, ground down and carried along by the ice. At Culver's Gap the elevation of the drift is about one thousand feet, and at the Water Gap it is from seven hundred to nine hundred feet, above tide-level.

Many of the smaller lakes and ponds of Sussex County were formed by the glacial débris choking the outlets and making basins, which were not subsequently filled in the distribution of materials by the waters of the Champlain epoch. The old glacial dams were not disturbed beyond a leveling of their surface and a sorting of the materials at the top.

In the valley of the Delaware and those of Flatbrook and Millbrook the drift is so thick that there are no outcrops within a breadth of one-seventh of a mile from the New York line to Walpack Bend.

"In the Kittatinny and Walkkill valleys deposits of marl are numerous. They are found, several feet in thickness, at the bottom of the lakes and ponds, marshes and meadow-lands, so abundant in these districts. A very common name for these collections of water is 'White Pond,' of which several are so called in the district. This name is given to them on account of the deposit of shells distinctly visible at their bottom."

MINES AND ORES.

Zinc Ores.—The only zinc ores which have been found in workable quantities in the State are in Sussex County. One of the mines is at Stirling Hill, near Ogdensburg, in the township of Sparta; the other is on Mine Hill, at Franklin Furnace, Hardyston township. The Stirling Hill ore has its outcrop at a height of one hundred feet above the valley of the Walkkill. The largest proportion of mineral matter in the vein is a variety of calcite, in which the carbonate of lime is replaced by the carbonate of manganese. Disseminated through this rock are the minerals which contain the zinc. The most important of these are franklinite, red oxide of zinc, and willemite.

"Franklinite is a mineral of iron-black color, metallic lustre, and about as hard as feldspar. It is slightly magnetic, and might easily be mistaken for magnetic iron ore. . . . Its crystals are regular octahedrons." The following analysis of this mineral is from Professor Cook's "Geology of New Jersey:"

Sesquioxide of iron.....	88.3
Oxide of zinc.....	21.8
Red oxide of manganese.....	10.3
	100.0

Red Oxide of Zinc.—"This mineral is of a deep red color, varying in some specimens to orange-yellow." Its lustre is not metallic. Occasionally specimens are found which are partially transparent, but generally the substance is quite opaque."

Willemite, troostite, or anhydrous silicate of zinc is a name given to a mineral found in abundance at both Stirling Hill and Mine Hill. "It is of various colors, from an apple-green to flesh-red and to grayish white, and when weathered it is of a manganese-brown color. It is not quite as hard as feldspar, but very nearly so."

IRON MINES.*

The iron mines in Sussex County are:

1. The Franklin Mines, in Hardyston township, near Franklin Furnace.
2. Andover Mine, in Andover township, three and a half miles from the Roseville mines.
3. Wawayanda Mine, in Vernon township.
4. Green Mine, in Vernon township.
5. Ogden Mine, in the township of Sparta.
6. Roseville Mine, at Roseville, in Byram township.
7. Glendon or Chapin Mine, in Green township.

V.—DROWNED LANDS OF THE WALKKILL.

"The valley of the Walkkill from Hamburg, Sussex Co., N. J., to Denton, Orange Co., N. Y., is unlike that of any other stream in the State. The Walkkill River rises in Sussex County and has a somewhat rapid flow until it reaches Hamburg. Then for twenty miles the bed of the stream is a succession of limestone reefs from five to ten feet high.

"The Walkkill is one of the crookedest streams in the State, and its fall from Hamburg to Denton is only eleven feet. For twelve miles west of Denton the valley of the Walkkill is four miles wide and on a level with the river. The northern extremity of the Pochunk Mountain protrudes into the valley there, and divides the low-lying country into two strips. The portion on the eastern base of the mountain is six miles long and about a mile wide. It is drained by the Pochunk and Wawayanda Creeks. The western strip is eight miles long and nearly two wide, and coursed by the Walkkill. Pochunk Creek enters the Walkkill from the southwest, Rutgers Creek flows into it from the northwest, and Quaker Creek enters the river from the east, between Denton and Hamburg. The beds of these tributaries are of the same jagged character as that of the main stream, but their fall is heavier and their currents rapid. They enter the Walkkill at abrupt angles, and their waters are forced both up and down the river, the current of the latter being insufficient to carry them off. Besides the obstruction to the flow of the Walkkill caused by its irregular bed and almost imperceptible fall, a high wall of granite boulders and drift stretches across the valley at Denton and forms an impregnable dam. This deposit must have been carried here on glaciers from the Shawangunk Mountains, twenty-five miles distant, in the ages of which only geology furnishes any record. Of insufficient force to cut a passage through this rocky impediment,—as the Delaware River did through the opposing wall of the Kittatinny Mountain at the Water Gap,—the accumulated waters of the Wallkill were forced back over the low country bordering its course and that of its tributaries, the surplus water pouring over the crest of the wall and continuing then in uninterrupted flow to the Hudson at Kingston. Thirty thousand acres of land in Orange County and ten thousand in Sussex were thus converted into an impenetrable marsh covered with rank vegetation. In time of freshets the entire valley from Denton to Hamburg became a lake from eight to twenty feet deep. The following outline of the immediate country will explain, it being understood that the shaded lines indicate the condition of the 'Drowned Lands' prior to the construction of the canal:

"The country surrounding this great swamp was settled at a very early day. The settlers called the submerged tract 'The Drowned Lands of the Wallkill.' The tract was all taken up in the course of a few years. During the dry season the islands were reached without great difficulty, and the wild grass that grew on the marshy meadows afforded excellent pasturage for cattle. Owners of drowned land derived considerable revenue by letting out pasturage to the cows of neighboring farmers. Through the summer season thousands of cows were turned upon the waste acres. Sudden freshets frequently came, and the water rose so rapidly that many cattle were annually lost before the herdsmen, in boats, could drive them to the uplands. The cows that reached the islands were kept there until the water had subsided. The main duty of the farmers' boys in the early days was to watch the cattle feeding among the treacherous meadows of the Drowned Lands.

"As early as 1804 the Drowned Lands proprietors in Orange County, believing that by altering the course of the Wallkill River, and removing certain of the obstructions in its bed, the lands could be drained to a great extent and large portions of them made tillable, began the laying of plaus to accomplish the work. In 1807 they secured the passage of an act of the Legislature authorizing the raising of money 'to drain the Drowned Lands of the Wallkill.' The expenses of the work were to be defrayed by assessing the owners of the lands. A board of commissioners was named in the act to apportion assessments. From that year up to 1826 forty thousand dollars had been expended by the proprietors in efforts to drain the lands, but with little success. Ditches were dug along the bed of the stream. About the only result of the work was the starting of eels down the stream in unusual quantities. The fall of 1807 was remarkable for the numbers of eels that came down the ditches. Eel-weirs were plenty, but there was hardly a night that season in which every one was not filled to overflowing with eels, some of which weighed eight pounds apiece. One weir in Hampton milldam captured over two thousand in one night. George Phillips salted down twenty barrels. He bought the first four-wheeled wagon ever seen in this region for the express purpose of peddling eels in the surrounding country. The wagon was the wonder of western Orange County, and made a sale for thousands of eels. The Wallkill yielded abundantly of eels until 1826, when a law prohibited the placing of weirs in the stream.

"In April, 1826, the Legislature again came to the aid of the Drowned Lands owners by authorizing the construction of a canal to be dug from the river at Horse Island around the great obstruction at Denton, and to enter the river again below New Hampton,—a distance of three miles. The water of the Wallkill that found its way over the rocky dam at Denton had a fall of twenty-four feet in about two miles. This afforded a valuable water-power, the right to which was vested in Gabriel N. Phillips. Several mills and factories had been called into existence near New Hampton by the water-power which had been utilized by the construction of a dam at the above place. This dam was a great obstruction to the drainage by ditches in 1807. The farmers agreed with Phillips to pay him a certain sum if he would lower the dam. He lowered it as desired. The farmers failed to fulfill their part of the contract. Phillips raised his dam to its original height. This was one of the main causes of the failure of the plan of river-bed ditching.

"The canal project of 1826 alarmed Phillips. He claimed that a canal would necessarily divert the water from its natural channel, and greatly injure the water-power, if not destroy it. Two hostile parties therefore arose. Those interested in the factories fought the canal scheme, and the Drowned Lands proprietors were determined that it should succeed.

"According to the act of 1807, a board of five drowned-land commissioners was to be elected every year at the court-house in Goshen. The ownership of ten acres of drowned land entitled the owner to one vote. On every twenty acres, up to four hundred, a proprietor could deposit one vote, and one vote for every fifty acres above four hundred. At the election of 1829 the issue was 'canal or no canal.' Two tickets were in the field. Gen. George D. Wickham was a prominent candidate on the canal ticket; John I. McGregor led the forces of the anti-canallers. On the 15th of June, 1829, the election was held. A beaver hat was used for a ballot-box. John I. McGregor claimed the right to cast twenty-six votes on proxies he held from other proprietors. He also demanded that the inspector receive from him eighty-two votes on a tract of three thousand five hundred acres, which belonged to an uncle of his in England who had just died. He claimed, besides, the right to vote on two thousand acres of this tract, under an alleged agreement with the dead uncle to work the two thousand acres for twenty years. These votes were all challenged by the supporters of the canal ticket. The inspectors of election refused to receive them. A stormy scene followed. John I. McGregor seized the hat containing the votes that had been cast, and declared that no vote should be counted unless those he offered were counted too. Every one entitled to vote had voted, with the exception of two persons. They demanded their right to a voice in the election. The assessors announced that they would hold a new election. McGregor's adherents attempted to prevent this, but failed. Another hat was borrowed, and the voting was commenced over again among the voters who remained in the room. When the polls closed McGregor returned the hat he had captured, and demanded that it be accepted as the legal ballot-box. The assessors refused to accept it. The tickets in the stolen hat were counted unofficially. The canal men had a majority. The new election also gave them the victory, but the anti-canal men claimed it. The certificate of election was given to the commissioners. They at once gave out a portion of the canal work on contract. They assessed the Drowned Lands owners to the amount of twenty-six thousand dollars to meet expenses. Some of the proprietors who were opposed to the canal refused to pay. Suits were about to be begun, but John I. McGregor, G. N. Phillips, and others filed a bill to restrain the commissioners from proceeding with the work. The complainants alleged that the commissioners had not been legally elected, and were wrongfully attempting to drain the Drowned Lands by a canal, when the work could be best done in the bed of the Walkill. The matter came before Chancellor Walworth. He decided in favor of the commissioners. The canal was commenced. Gen. Wickham owned all the land through which it was to pass. He was also a large owner of drowned lands. The canal was dug under his superintendence; it was completed in 1835. Gen. Wickham asked no pay for the land taken by the canal; he relied on its success so to increase the value of his drowned lands that he would be more than repaid for the damage done to his meadows by its construction.

"To protect the water-power at New Hampton, the act of 1826 provided for the construction of a flood-gate-dam in the canal, which was to be closed whenever it was necessary to flood Phillips' Pond, at New Hampton. The canal gradually undermined its banks and washed them away until from a ditch twelve feet wide and eight deep it became a river in places seven hundred feet wide. Hundreds of acres of the best land in Orange County were thus carried away by succeeding freshets. The canal, increased in size, depth, and fall, took all the water from the river between the inlet and outlet of the ditch. More than ten thousand acres of swamp were converted into the most productive land in the county. As the canal deepened and widened the drainage of the swamp enlarged in extent. Where, a few years before, the farmers could get about only in boats, solid roads were made possible. Fragrant meadows took the place of almost unfathomable mire. The increase in the value of the property thus drained is to-day put down at over two millions of dollars. The draining cost the landowners sixty thousand dollars.

"What brought wealth to the Drowned Lands farmers, however, sent disease and ruin to the mill-people. To turn back the water to its original channel, George Phillips, who succeeded his father, G. N. Phillips, as owner of the water-right, constructed a dam across the canal. This had the desired effect, but it soon began to flood the reclaimed lands. Then the farmers mustered in force and destroyed the dam. It was rebuilt, and again destroyed. The dam-builders were called the 'beavers'; the dam-destroyers were known as 'muskrats.' The muskrat and beaver war was carried on for years. Finally,

Squire J. M. Talmage and Amos M. Ryerson purchased the Phillips property. In 1857 the drowned-land commissioners paid them five thousand dollars for the water-right. The canal thus became master of the situation. The Walkill, from the head of the canal to New Hampton, was changed from a rapid stretch of stream, three miles in length, to a series of stagnant pools and beds of decaying vegetable matter. Denton and New Hampton, situated in the very midst of Orange County's fragrant meadows and mountain-air, became seats of malaria. The mills and factories were closed.

"In 1869, G. D. Wickham, George C. Wheeler, and O. D. Wickham purchased the Phillips property of Ryerson and Talmage. They then purchased a strip of land on both sides of the canal, a short distance above its entrance into the Walkill. There they constructed a high and substantial dam across the canal for the purpose of throwing the water back into the old channel of the river. Then the muskrat and beaver war was renewed. A hundred farmers, on the 20th of August, 1869, marched upon the dam to destroy it. A large force of armed men guarded the dam. The farmers routed them and began the work of destruction. The 'beavers' then had recourse to the law; warrants were issued for the arrest of the farmers. A number of their leaders were arrested, but not before the offending dam had been demolished. The owner of the dam began to rebuild it; the farmers applied for an injunction. Judge Barnard granted it, and cited the owner of the dam to appear and show cause why the injunction should not be made perpetual. Pending a final hearing, high water came and carried away all vestige of the dam. In February, 1871, Judge Barnard decided that the dam could not be legally constructed. Since then no water has flowed in the Walkill between Denton and New Hampton, and the canal has greatly increased in size. A prominent resident of Denton assures the writer that there have been at one time as high as one hundred cases of malarial fever in Denton and New Hampton and along the old bed of the Walkill this season. Three cases in one house, he says, is a common occurrence, and he pointed out one house in Hampton where there had been seven persons prostrated with fever at the same time. 'This festering bed of the Walkill causes it all,' our informant declares, 'and property hereabout can hardly be sold at any price.'

"The continued increase in malarious diseases and the depreciation of property along the Walkill's old channel have alarmed those directly affected. Last year they had a survey made of the former bed of the stream. The engineer assured them that the obstructions could be so removed from the channel that the drainage of the Drowned Lands would be perfect, as it is by the canal. The cost of the work was estimated at twenty-five thousand dollars; this was more money than the people could raise. They applied for an appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars from the State. A legislative committee was appointed to look into the matter. Nothing was done beyond recommending that State Engineer Seymour be authorized to make a survey of the Walkill to ascertain if the proposed improvement was practical. Engineer Seymour was authorized to make the survey; he began the work two weeks ago. The matter of an appropriation will be pressed again the coming winter, and the question will be a leading one in the politics of this Assembly district this fall. The drowned-land farmers will oppose the work until they are assured beyond all question that it will be fully as valuable to them as the canal. Even then they are not expected to give the measure any tangible support, as they have the canal, and the new work will confer no increased benefit upon them.

"The Drowned Lands of the Walkill abound in curious things. Rising from the morass are numerous elevations of land resting on the limestone that underlies this whole marsh; they have been given the name of islands. Before any draining was done these islands were accessible only in boats during freshets. Pine Island, near the site of a flourishing village, and the terminus of the Pine Island branch of the Erie Railway, Big Island, Merritt's Island, and Walnut Island are the principal ones. These elevated tracts contain from forty to two hundred acres. Some of them are fertile and in a high state of cultivation; others are covered with forests of cedar and other evergreen trees. On the southwestern border of the swamp, in the town of Warwick, two lofty and isolated mountains rear their summits. They are called Adam and Eve. Formerly they swarmed with rattlesnakes, but these the inhabitants have exterminated. Mount Eve abounds in caverns of great extent, one having been explored for nearly a mile. High up the side of this mountain there are boulders weighing hundreds of tons apparently so lightly lodged that a push might send them thundering down into the swamp beneath. A singular characteristic of the marsh is the existence in it of large and remarkably cold springs. One of these, in the vicinity of the early home of the late Secretary Seward, near Florida, is seventy-five feet in diameter. The water is ice-cold and unfathomable. The muck in the swamp is very deep in places. Cedar logs of immense size, and as sound as if fallen but yesterday, have been found near Warwick, thirty feet below the surface."

COURT HOUSE AT NEWTON, SUSSEX CO. N. J.

TOWNSHIPS AND VILLAGES OF SUSSEX COUNTY.

NEWTON.*

I.—SITUATION, AREA, Etc.

WHEN "Newtown" was first formed, in 1753, as one of the four precincts of Sussex County, it embraced an immense territory, covering nearly all of what is the present county east of the Blue Mountains, that west being the Walpack precinct or township. Between that date and 1844 it yielded up portions of its territory to form several townships (the details of which are given hereafter, under the head of "Civil Organization"), so that at the latter date it had become reduced to a length of 13 miles and a breadth of about 9. Its boundaries at that time were: north, Frankfort; east, Hardyston; southeast, Byram; southwest, Green and Stillwater; and west, Sandyston.† From 1856 down to 1861 the township embraced only what is now the town of Newton and the townships of Hampton and Andover, and was bounded the same as before, except on the northeast and east, where lay respectively the townships of Lafayette and Sparta, which had been formed during that period. The township of Newton has had no civil existence since 1864, when the town of Newton was formed.

The town of Newton is situated a little south of the geographical centre of the county. It is an irregular pentagon in form, the north side of which is a line running east and west. It lies between the townships of Hampton and Andover, which completely surround it, the former bounding it upon the northeast, north, northwest, and west, and the latter upon the south and southwest.

The Sussex Railroad traverses its territory for about a mile, making a circuit and crossing its easternmost point.

The population of Newton, according to the late census (1880), is 2526.

II.—PHYSICAL FEATURES.

The surface of the town of Newton is undulating and hilly, although it lies in the depression or valley between the Wallkill Mountains on the east and the Kittatiny or Blue Mountains on the west. The east branch of the Paulinskill is the principal stream in the town. It rises in its eastern part, and after leaving its borders takes a northeast course to Lafayette, thence flows northwesterly to near Augusta, in Frankfort, where it joins the west branch, whose waters unite to form the Paulinskill River.‡ Newton is almost encircled by a chain of ponds of various sizes, of which the "Big Muckshaw," on the south, and "Drake's," on the east, lie close to its borders. None of them, however, are within its bounds.

Bunker Hill, College Hill, and the ridge running southwest from the latter and lying to the northwest of "Love Lane," are the highest elevations in the town.

The "Devil's Hole," on the Babbitt farm, near the south line of the town, at the point where it joins the line which separates Hampton from Andover, is a place of some local note. The opening, which in former years was of considerable size, is now so filled up that it would be difficult for a person to crawl through the aperture which leads to the subterranean cavern. Some portions of the underground passage are narrow, and where roof and floor almost meet require the explorer to stoop, and sometimes crawl, but beyond opening up into quite large chambers. A stream of water runs through the cave, keeping the floor continually wet. We have conversed with several parties who have penetrated with torches for a considerable distance into its hidden mysteries. That, as well as the Muckshaw Swamp, near by, may have been a hiding-place for Tories in the Revolution,—particularly of Lieut. James Moody and his band.

The elevation of Newton is 645 feet‡ above tide-water; the vicinity, embracing a circuit of two miles from the court-house, includes the highest ground for many miles around. In fact, this vicinage is a watershed, the waters of the Pequest and Paulinskill Rivers (which head near the town) flowing in opposite directions, to the northward and southward respectively. Its high elevation, salubrious atmosphere, and beautiful scenery render Newton in the summer season a place of attraction as a resort, many coming hither at that time from New York, Newark, and neighboring cities. It has become so popular of late years as a place of summer residence that its accommodations for entertainment are taxed to their utmost, and then found inadequate.

III.—EARLY SETTLEMENT, Etc.

Who was the first settler is not now known, although it is traditional that a log hut, which formerly stood opposite to the site of the present dwelling of John Gray, on High Street, was the first habitation of a white man in this town. Who was its builder or occupant is conjectural. This avant-courier of Anglo-Saxon emigration to and occupation of the wilderness of old "Newtown" will probably never be embalmed in the historic page. It is claimed by some, however, that a German—father of the venerable "Uncle George" Onsted—very early lived within the walls of this pioneer log cabin, but of this there is no corroborative proof.

The "Historical Collections of New Jersey" says that in 1761 the house of Henry Hairlocker was the only dwelling within the limits of what is now Newton, and adds, "The village of Newton might have been better located a quarter of a mile southwest of its present site but for a mistake on the part of the Legislature.* The act authorizing the building of the court-house of Sussex County, passed in 1761, required it to be erected within half a mile of Henry Hairlocker's house. By that proviso it became necessary to build the court-house where it now is." Half a mile in any other direction would have been still worse, owing to the unfavorable form of the ground; as it was, the 40 chains did not quite reach the present site. But, rather than locate the seat of justice at the foot of a hill or over a stream of water, a few additional chains were thrown in for "good measure," thereby locating it partly up the hillside, where in 1765 it was completed. At that time the space in front of the court-house, since known as "the green," was covered with woods.

Henry Hairlocker, who (so far as records or recollections go) may be considered the pioneer settler of Newton, was a native of Holland. He located here about the year 1750. He lived in the house late the residence of Maj. John R. Pettit, who sold to John A. Horton, whose descendants now occupy it. The land upon which the cabin stood was originally owned by Jonathan Hampton, of Essex County. It is said that Hairlocker was buried on his place, near the gate-house of the Horton mansion.

Jonathan Hampton was a heavy landowner in this section. He not only made a donation of land in 1764, upon which the court-house was erected,† but he also conveyed land to the village for an academy, and a tract to the Episcopal Church, which now forms part of the old cemetery. He was a commissioner of supplies for the troops in 1755, during the Indian troubles. In 1757 he was appointed paymaster and victualler for the company raised for service on the frontier. Mr. Hampton was a non-resident, but his own personal interests as a "proprietor" prompted him to these donations, also to the efforts he is said to have made to secure the location of the seat of justice at this instead of some other point in the vast territory of Sussex. It is hardly to be questioned but that he was a public-spirited man; yet his gifts, no doubt, directly resulted in the material enhancement of the value of his remaining acres, and yielded a handsome dividend upon his gifts when sold.‡

Very soon after the county-seat was located several buildings were put up in the Hairlocker neighborhood.

It is said that this settlement was called by the Indians Chinkeewunska, or "side-hill town." But among their white neighbors it was called, from the first, "Newtown," so appearing in all the early records. It bore this appellation for a considerable time, but when and why changed to its present name is not satisfactorily explained.

Henry Hairlocker (sometimes spelled Harelocker) received license to keep a "public-house" from the first court held in Sussex County, and was the first tavernkeeper in the village of Newton.

Another innkeeper in what was then Newton township was Thomas Woolverton, a contemporary of Hairlocker. He was licensed in 1753, along with his neighbor "Henry." His location, however, is now without the bounds of Newton, in Andover township.

Jacob McCollum, who was in the early day a prominent man in this township, lived on the farm now occupied by John W. Smith, in what has since been set off as Hampton. He was one of the County Committee of Safety in 1775, and a member of the Legislature in 1778, "serving in that body with great acceptance. He was a man of primitive habits, and is still remembered as one of the most characteristic representatives of the frontier population of old Sussex." He went on foot, staff in hand, to "Trent's Town," the capital, with a knapsack on his back, his wardrobe in a bundle, and carrying provisions to sustain him on his journey. When the session was over he returned in like fashion to his home and farm. He was also judge of the courts in 1777. A great-grandson, Charles McCollum, is now living and engaged as a night-watchman in the village of Newton.

* "Whenever the disadvantageous location of our court-house is commented upon, the fault is invariably attributed to a blunder of the Legislature. This is not true. The Legislature did not require the board and the 'owner of the land' to take any particular course in running out the half-mile from Hairlocker's dwelling, and consequently if our local authorities so managed the matter as to land in a ditch, they alone are to blame."—D. B. Ebbell's Centennial Address.

† See copy of deed in general chapter on "Civil Organization," preceding.

‡ In his honor one of the more recently formed townships of this county has been named. This will perpetuate the memory of one of Sussex's early benefactors.

The homestead farm has passed out of the family, and is now owned by strangers.

Thomas Anderson, the elder, was another pioneer of Newton. He came from Hunterdon County and located here some time prior to the Revolution. He lived in a building on the upper side of the park, now the residence of Capt. Thomas Anderson, his grandson. What are now the two wings of the modern mansion were erected by the senior Anderson, and occupied by him as dwelling and office. In the upper part of one, it is said, he stored commissary goods for the use of the American army during the war for independence. A more detailed and very interesting account of his patriotic deeds will be found in the chapter devoted to the Revolutionary period, elsewhere given. He was noticeably prominent in the civil affairs of the township and county, as was also his son, Maj. William T. Anderson.* The widow of Thomas Anderson became the third wife of Judge John Johnson. (The reader is referred to the chapter in the general history portion of this work, under the head of "The Bench and Bar of Sussex County," for a particular mention of this prominent family.)

Joseph and Hezekiah Phillips came to Newton before the year 1800, with their tools on their backs, both being carpenters. They brought their trade into requisition in building a hotel. They were the sons of Joseph Phillips. Joseph, Jr., married a Schooley, of Newton township, and Hezekiah, his brother, died a bachelor.

Jonathan Willis was one of the early settlers. He was also one of the pioneer tavernkeepers,† and as a public official his name is of frequent occurrence in the records of Sussex County. He was appointed judge in 1794.

Charles Beardslee was a member of the State Legislature from 1784 until 1800, both in the Assembly and in the Council, with the exception of one year, —1790. It is needless to say that he was a prominent man in the settlement during his day. He was an early member of the first Masonic lodge in Newton, and served as an officer therein as early as 1793. None of the family now reside in the town.

George Rorbach was a native of Germany, and came to this country when about twelve years of age.

* Mrs. Margaret G. Anderson, relict of the late Maj. William T. Anderson, died at her home in Newton, April 11, 1879, in the ninety-ninth year of her age. She was the daughter of Dr. Andrew Linn, of Harlyston township, and was born near Monroe Corner, Jan. 19, 1780. She was a sister of Robert A. Linn, Mrs. David Ryerson, and Mrs. Richard K. Morris, the latter of whom is still living. Mrs. Anderson was one of those noble and true women whose lives are a continual blessing, and by which the world is made happier and better.

† In the "Journals of the Rev. Manssah Cutler, LL.D.," who made a journey from Ipswich, Mass., to Marietta, Ohio, in 1788, is found this reference to Newton: "July 30th, set out just after the sun rose, went on to Sussex Court-house; road good, fourteen miles. Breakfasted at a tavern just above the court-house, kept by Jonathan Willis. This is a pretty village on the eastern side and near the summit of a high hill; land good, houses indifferent. Went to the court-house; was pleased with the form of it inside; the building is of stone. From this the road is tolerably good to Log Jail, ten miles," etc.

After residing in other parts for a time he settled in Newton. This was several years before the opening of the Revolutionary war. A number of his descendants by his first marriage still remain in this vicinity, among them the sisters Evaline and Hannah Rorbach, of this town. His second wife was a Miss Fisher, of Hackettstown. By this marriage he had six children,—Elizabeth, who married Pettit Britton, father of Pemberton Britton; Samuel, who was judge in 1838; Susan, John, Hannah, and Richard. Hannah married George McCarter, father of Col. Harris McCarter. The children are all deceased, the last survivor being Susan, who died in Newton, Jan. 9, 1872, at the advanced age of eighty-four years, eight months, and fifteen days, being born in the year 1787 (April 25th), and who was at her death one of the oldest living natives of Newton.‡ George Rorbach, though a cripple and an invalid, was a prominent citizen of Sussex County in its early days, and for a number of years was keeper of the old county jail. Andrew, one of his sons by his first wife, emigrated from Newton to Canada at the beginning of the present century, along with the Lundys, McElhones, and other families from this section.

Other early families, who settled here prior to the year 1800, are represented by the names of Sausman-house (now Sausman), Johnson, Holmes, Drake, Warbasse, Stewart, Basset, Rosenkrans, Ryerson, Pemberton, Kerr, etc.

Charles Pemberton, a native of England, settled here about the period of the Revolution, he being at the time less than twenty-one years of age. He engaged at first in teaching school and afterwards established a store, becoming later associated with John Holmes and Daniel Stuart. He was twice sheriff,—in 1797 and 1803. His wife was a Miss Rorbach. He left no descendants, his property falling to his wife's relatives upon his death. He was familiarly known as "Colonel,"—a title earned by militia service. He died Dec. 17, 1817.

Isaac Basset, an early settler, and an influential man in his day, was also a tavernkeeper. The first Masonic lodge in Sussex County met at his hotel. He was proprietor and host of a public-house which formerly stood on the site of the present Cochran House; in 1818 he removed to the County Hotel, on the hill. He is described as being a short, thick-set man, jovial in his manners, and a popular landlord. He married a Woolverton and raised a large family of children, one of whom became the wife of the Rev. Peter Kanouse; a granddaughter in this line now resides in Newton. Mr. Basset died about 1818. His widow subsequently married the late Judge Mackey.

William I. Basset, a cousin of Isaac, was a carpenter, and also a hotelkeeper.

‡ It is said she was never outside of Newton during her life but once, and that was when, just prior to 1812, she went with her father to Canada to visit her brother Andrew, being prevented by the breaking out of the war from returning until its close.

Thomas Armstrong was an emigrant to this county from Middlesex. "He first became acquainted with this section of the State by bringing Indian corn hither and exchanging it for wheat. He followed this business as late as 1784, at which time, to the best of his knowledge, Indian corn was not cultivated here." He located at Newton somewhere near the date above given,—likely earlier. During the Revolutionary struggle he was prominently identified with the patriot cause, having the confidence of Gen. Washington and serving as quartermaster in the Continental army. He was among the first members of the pioneer lodge of Masons in Newton, joining prior to 1794, as in that year he was elected as its Senior Warden. He purchased his farm of Robert Hoops, and, although most of it is now in the hands of strangers, the homestead is in the possession of and occupied by one of his sons, Robert, the only survivor of a large family of children,—namely, James Britton Armstrong, who married Mary Foster; William, who married Mary Pellet, daughter of Obadiah; Thomas Moore, who married Anna, daughter of William Sausman, and stepdaughter of Col. Van Cleve Moore; Robert, married Loretta Pellet, another daughter of Obadiah; Margaret, became the wife of Theophilus Hunt, and Elizabeth, of John Seward, kin of the late Hon. William H. Seward; Jane G., married Uzal Haggerty; Evaline, became the second wife of Dr. Beach; and Maria, married John S. Warbasse.

The Ryerson family, among the earliest in this vicinity, are descended from Martin Ryerson, an emigrant from Holland to Flatbush, L. I., and later resident at Wallabout. Joris, one of his five sons, married Sarah Schouten, and had four sons and four daughters, and his son Martin married Catharine Coxe and settled in Hunterdon County. Three of the latter's sons,—Martin, John, and William,—with their widowed mother, removed to Sussex County in 1770.

Martin was a member of the Assembly from 1793–95. He married Rhoda Hull, daughter of Benjamin, and had the following children who grew to maturity: Jesse, David, Anna, Emma, Thomas C., and Elizabeth. The latter became the wife of Robert A. Linn. Of these sons, Thomas C. (who died in 1838) was a judge of the Supreme Court of the State, and one of his sons, Martin, was also judge; another, Thomas, is a practicing physician in this place, while another, Henry Ogden, was an officer in the late civil war.

David Ryerson (born 1781; died 1867) was in early life a surveyor, as was his father; in fact, it is said there have been five generations of surveyors in this family. He was county collector and for thirty-four years president of the Sussex Bank; he was also prominent in State affairs, being for several years a member of the Council. Supplemental to this account of the Ryerson family will be found full memoirs of Judges Martin and Thomas C., and Henry O., in the chapter on the "Bench and Bar of Sussex County," elsewhere in this work; also a sketch of Dr. Thomas, in the medical chapter, antecedent; and of David Ryerson, in the history of the Sussex Bank, on subsequent pages.

David Sausman came from Germany very early and settled on what afterwards was known as the "Drake farm," near Newton. The name of the family in Germany (and in this country as late as 1796) was Sausmanhaus.* The wife of David Sausman was Anna Eich, a native of Holland, and the children of the union were Peter, William, Henry, Mary, Anna, Sarah, and Susan.

Peter Sausman removed to "the lake country," married a Teeter, and raised a family. Henry died unmarried; Mary married and had a family; Anna married a Hauners, of New York, and had a family; Sarah married Stephen Case, of Newton, and had children, of whom the late William Case, who has descendants in the county, was one; Susan married twice. Her first husband was Uriah Lucas, by whom she had two children, Uriah and Garret. For her second husband she married a Labar, and settled in "the lake country."

William Sausman was born on the family homestead, near Newton, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits. He was a captain of militia, and familiarly known as "Capt. Sausman." He married Bathsbeba, daughter of Uriah Lucas (father-in-law of Susan Sausman), of Hope township. Her grandmother was Irish, and her mother, Elizabeth Coutant, one of the French Huguenots. By this marriage were born Elizabeth, Anna, and Catharine Sausman. The first married Judge John H. Hall (deceased), the founder of the Sussex Register; Anna married Thomas Moore Armstrong, of Sussex County (she is living in Newton, at an advanced age); Catharine married Asa Hall (deceased), of New York, brother of Judge Hall.

For her second husband Bathsbeba Lucas married, in 1804, Col. Van Cleve Moore, of Hunterdon County, N. J. He was a man of prominence, and sheriff of Sussex County in 1821–23. Of this union was born Sarah Moore, wife of James Phillips, who died May 8, 1822, in her eighteenth year. Col. Moore died Nov. 11, 1824, in his forty-fourth year.

The third husband of Bathsbeba Lucas was Judge Richard Brodhead, of Milford, Pike Co., Pa. He was the father of United States Senator Richard Brodhead, of Pennsylvania. No children were born to this venerable couple. Bathsbeba Brodhead died at Newton, Aug. 14, 1854, aged eighty-two.

Daniel Stuart came to Newton from Hackettstown about the year 1780; he was of Irish descent. He was early and for many years engaged in mercantile pursuits in this village, associated with John Holmes,

* It is so spelled in a deed to David's sons, "William and Henry Sausmanhouse," of date of 10th of May, 1796, from John Armstrong, for a tract of 242 acres, "situate in the township of Newton," and a part of which is now known as the Drake farm, in the present township of Audover.

Col. Pemberton, and others, the firm being at one time Holmes, Pemberton & Stuart. He was president of the old Sussex Bank, and surrogate (appointed Dec. 2, 1803) for nineteen years. His wife was Margaret Ayers, a daughter of "Squire" Ezekiel Ayers, of Hackettstown. They had no children, but adopted, reared, and educated John R. Stuart, who became one of the most successful physicians of Sussex County.* Daniel Stuart died in January, 1822; his wife in 1842. James Stuart was a brother or half-brother of Daniel.

David Kerr was born in Warren County, near Belvidere, and came to Newton about 1809 or 1810. He married here, about 1815, a Miss Frances Bates, and of his eight children (all living) only two, David M. and Margaret, widow of Mr. Bryant, of Morris County, are now residents of Newton. David M. married Priscilla Kimball. The elder Kerr was a hatter, and was thus engaged in Newton as early as 1820, possibly before. He died in 1839, and is buried in the old cemetery.

The Warbasse family are descended from Peter Warbasse, a native of Jutland, Denmark, born in 1722, and a carpenter by trade. In his native country he joined the Moravians, or United Brethren, about 1740; with a company of that faith he emigrated to America in 1753, settling in the province of Pennsylvania. He resided at the Gnadenlütten mission of the Moravians at the time of the massacre, in November, 1755, being one of the five who escaped.† As a resident of Bethlehem, later, he kept the famous "Sun Inn," and also owned a grist-mill. In 1769 he removed with his wife, Ann Mary Schemelin (who was of his own age, and whom he married in 1764), and family to Knowlton township, Sussex Co., now Hope, Warren Co. He established himself at the Moravian settlement first called "Greenland," subsequently Hope. He returned to Nazareth, Pa., in 1771, and died there in 1806, aged eighty-four. His sons Peter and Joseph settled in Newton township at an early day,—prior to 1800, and probably before 1790.

Joseph Warbasse, son of Peter, carried on his trade—that of a blacksmith—in Newton. His shop is yet remembered by some of our oldest citizens; it was located where the present Baptist church now stands. He was the grandfather of Joseph, now and for many years a merchant in this village, and of Samuel, of Lafayette township; their parents' names were James R. and Anna (Tuttle) Warbasse.

Henry Johnson came from Readington, Hunterdon Co., N. J., and as a pioneer in Sussex County became the progenitor of most of the families of that name within its bounds, and whose lineal descendants have figured prominently in the history of Newton. He had six sons,—namely, Henry,‡ David and Jonathan (twins), John, Samuel, and William. His wife was Susannah —. His eldest son, Henry, was born April 20, 1763; married, April 20, 1795, Rachel, a daughter of Gershom§ and Anna Goble. She (Rachel) was born April 22, 1770, and died July 31, 1819; her husband died May 22, 1814. They had a family of five children, as follows:

1. William Henry, born Feb. 6, 1796; died July 9, 1863. He married, in 1827, Ann M. Couse (who was born May 20, 1798), and had Henry W. and John C. (twins), born Oct. 21, 1828; Catharine H., born March 28, 1831; Samuel, born April 19, 1833; and Mary A., born June 12, 1836,—all living, and all residents of Newton, except John C., a physician at Blairstown, and Henry W., at Mattawan, N. J.

2. Elizabeth Ann, born June 16, 1800; married Daniel Griggs, and died March 18, 1837.

3. John A., born Jan. 19, 1803; married Lydia L., daughter of Azariah Drake, and died Feb. 7, 1873.

4. Samuel, born Jan. 27, 1806; died Nov. 12, 1843; married Mary Trusdell, who is resident at Newton.

5. Emeline J., born June 22, 1813. She became the second wife of Daniel Griggs after the death of her sister Elizabeth, who was his first wife. Emeline is the only one of the children of Henry and Rachel Johnson now living; she resides in Deckertown.

But little is known of the other five sons of Henry and Susannah Johnson, especially of David. Jonathan, one of the twins, died Feb. 14, 1802. John, his brother, was county clerk, 1805–15, and also judge of the Court of Common Pleas; he was three times married,—to Miss Roy, Miss Shafer, and the widow of Thomas Anderson. His sons were Whitfield S. and William J.; the former married Ellen Green. The daughters were Susan, who died single; Eliza, who married a Hopkins; Margaret, who became the wife of Rev. — Crane; Harriet, the wife of Rev. James C. Edwards; and Catharine, who died single. Whitfield S. Johnson was a lawyer, prosecutor of the pleas for this county for many years and, later Secretary of State, residing at Trenton, where he died, and where his widow is now residing.

Samuel Johnson, fifth son of Henry, Sr., and brother of the Henry, Jr., David, Jonathan, and John already mentioned, came to this vicinity about the same time as did his brothers, married Rebecca Heanon, and moved to Muncy, Pa., about 1840. His oldest son, Brodhead, died unmarried in New Orleans; Henry, another son, is a lawyer in Pennsylvania, and married a Green. His daughters were named Ann, ‡ Henry Johnson was a prominent citizen of Johnsonsburg, the place being named for him. He kept a store there, with one Van Horn.

§ Gershom Goble was collector of Hardwick in 1779.

† "Our dear Brother Peter Warbasse here in Bethlehem followed the carpenter's trade for many years and also has been our public manager in our Concern. . . . He has been on our frontiers among our Indians, was in the town of Gnadenlütten when the wild savages burned it; our brother jumped out of a mill-window; saw the Indian who fired it; and saw a number of our Sisters in the flames, of which he says he had a most painful sensation. He traveled 40 miles that night, swam the helgher river, and brought the news to Bethlehem."—Translation from German MSS. of Jacob Von Fleck, minister at Bethlehem.

the wife of Heman Cummins; Laura, who married Dr. Wood; Josephine, and Sarah.

William, sixth son of Henry Johnson, married a Miss Bray, near Lebanon. His son Theodore T. resides at or near New York City, and is acting as secretary of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

John Drake emigrated with his wife and family from Hackettstown to Newton in 1804. He was a minute-man during the Revolution, and was a native of Pennington, Mercer Co. His wife, Phebe Hunt, died in 1853, and he in 1854. His children were Azariah, William, Martin, Nathan, Abigail, Rebecca, and Nancy,—all deceased.

Azariah located in 1804, with his father, John, near what is now the steam-mill, purchasing of John Holmes a tract of nine acres. He erected thereon a barn and blacksmith-shop, wherein he pursued his trade. There was already a dwelling-house built by Mr. Holmes upon this land, or before it came into Mr. Drake's possession. He resided there until his death. The property is still in the family, in possession of the heirs of his brother Nathan. Azariah had a family of twelve children,—namely, Phebe, Archibald, Alexander, John, Lydia, Margaret, Azariah, Nathan, Rebecca, William, Jacob and Euphemia (twins), who are all deceased except Azariah, Lydia, and William, only the last named residing in Newton.

Nathan, son of John, married Rebecca Morrow, of Sparta; William, his brother, married Rachel Dildine, of Warren County; and Martin married Mary Silvers.

William, son of Azariah Drake, was born Nov. 14, 1816, and was, in 1849, united in marriage to Elizabeth Gray, a native of Newton; she died Jan. 8, 1880. Has only two children living, William G. and Elsie E., who are the great-grandchildren of John Drake.

John T. Smith was a native of Maryland, and a saddler by trade. He came to Newton from Philadelphia in 1812 with his wife (Mary Dietz, a native of the last-named place, but of Hollandish descent) and his sons, John and Alexander H. Soon after his advent here he opened a saddlery-shop where now is the shoe-store of Moore & Co. He made a speciality of ladies' side-saddles, which, before he came, were of the "pot-pie" style; he manufactured a much improved article, and consequently did a thriving business. He died in December, 1820, and his wife in 1812. At the time of his demise he was living where is now the store of Stull & Dunn. His son Alexander continued the business until 1830, and after that date in partnership with his brother George. John was a blacksmith, and served his time with Azariah Drake. He married Sarah J. Coursen, and died in 1839; his wife is also deceased. Alexander married Harriet, daughter of Martin Drake; he died in 1843. George T., brother of the above, married Nancy, daughter of James and Elizabeth Huston, of Newton. He was born in Philadelphia in 1812, and came to this village in 1817. Their children, George Hamilton and Elizabeth, are both living.

The McCarter family of this section were descendants of John McCarter, who came to this country from Londonderry, Ireland, in 1773, and settled in Morris County. He espoused the cause of American independence, joined the army, and was appointed commissary of hides and leather in Col. Wind's regiment, serving until the close of the war. He then engaged in mercantile pursuits and the manufacture of iron, but was not successful in either. He married the daughter of George Harris, of New Windsor, Orange Co., N. Y., and settled in Mendham, N. J., where all his children save the youngest were born. Over the signature of "Old Man of the Mountain" he contributed many articles to the newspapers in support of Mr. Jefferson; these attracted much attention. Governor Bloomfield sent him a commission addressed to "John McCarter, Esq., the 'Old Man of the Mountain.'" He was also county clerk, surrogate, and a member of the Legislature. He died in 1807, leaving a widow, six sons, and three daughters.

The oldest of these sons was Robert Harris. At quite a youthful age he served as deputy clerk of Morris County, and later, for two terms, as clerk. He then embarked in the mercantile business at Elizabethtown, and two years after removed to Newton, where he joined his younger brother, George, in the firm of R. & G. H. McCarter, which was continued until the death of the latter. He was elected one of the county judges, and, although not a lawyer, sustained a high reputation through his equitable decisions. Soon after the new constitution was adopted he was chosen judge of the Court of Errors, which place he filled at the time of his death, in Trenton, in 1852. Soon after removing to Newton he purchased a lot of Thomas C. Ryerson; he subsequently found the title imperfect—that the person who sold to Mr. Ryerson had only a life estate in the land. Judge McCarter had meanwhile built a comfortable house upon the same, and unless he could get a release from the heir-at-law before his mother's death the property would pass out of his hands. He went to the heir-at-law and offered him the original cost of the lot, giving him until the next morning to decide, intimating that if his offer was declined he would pull down his house and remove the materials to another place. The offer was accepted, and the property saved. This is but one of the many instances we could give illustrative of Mr. McCarter's strong common sense and prompt manner of action, which gave him success in business and in all other interests with which he became connected. Robert was the father of Thomas N., a lawyer, formerly of Newton, but more recently of Newark, and of John, once a merchant here, but now of New York, and a resident of Brooklyn.

George H. McCarter, the third son of John, was apprenticed at the age of fourteen to Col. Pemberton, merchant, of Newton; before reaching his majority he became a partner. Col. Pemberton died soon after, leaving him a small legacy and making him his executor. In 1840 he was elected sheriff, and was twice re-elected. He died in 1845, greatly esteemed and lamented. He was vice-president of the old Sussex Bank. He built, in 1819, and died in, the brick house now the residence of David Thompson, Esq. He owned a farm of 130 acres west of the village, which he divided into lots and sold; some of these lots have since, by the growth of the town, become a part of the village. He married Hannah Rorbach, a sister to Mrs. Col. Pemberton and Mrs. Pettit Britton; had three sons and one daughter. Of the former, George was the editor of the Sussex Democrat, Newton, from 1858 to 1862, during its continuance. He fell from a ferry-boat in crossing the Hudson, at New York, took cold, and died from the effects. Robert died in Newton. Col. Harris McCarter, the only surviving child, is also a resident of this place. Elizabeth ("Betty") married Harvey Raymond, and is deceased; their only daughter is a non-resident. George McCarter married for his second wife a Ludlow, sister of George Ludlow, of Morris County, but had no issue. George was a partner with his brother Robert in the lumber business, and carried on that branch of trade here at an early day. Their yard was first located in High Street, opposite Church, and later at the corner of High and Division Streets. They were also interested jointly in the erection of many residences and store buildings. He built for his own use the house now occupied by Thomas Kays, Esq. Both Robert and George were for many years among the leading Democratic politicians of Sussex County.

Benjamin McCarter taught school in Newton, in the old academy, now the Nicholas dwelling. He never married.

John McCarter, brother of the above, married a Miss Kelsey, aunt of Henry C. Kelsey, Esq.; he died in Newton. One son, Ludlow, is a lawyer in Newark and law-judge of Essex County; another son, William H., is living at Middletown, N. Y.

James, the fifth son of John, Sr., was born at Mendham, N. J., Dec. 14, 1800. He went to Charleston, S. C., in 1823, engaged in the book business, made a fortune, and married a daughter of Jonathan Bryan, of that city. For his second wife he married a sister of his first; he had one daughter by each. His estate, which before 1861 yielded him ten thousand a year, he lost during the war of the Rebellion. He went to Europe in 1860, and managed to save some of his property. After the war he returned here and engaged in business with his nephew John, but subsequently removed to Columbia, S. C., where he died a few years since. During his residence South he usually spent his summers in Newton.

Of Daniel S., another son of the "Old Man of the Mountain," little is known, or of the daughters, Martha, Mary, and Ellen; the former married Luther Y.

Howell, the latter became the wife of Dr. Harvey Halleck; Mary never married. Ellen, of all the children of John McCarter, Sr., is the only survivor; she is living in Newton with her family.

Uzal C. Haggerty was the son of James and Hannah Koykendall, and grandson of Hugh, who came from Ireland and settled near Branchville, Sussex Co. After being elected sheriff, in 1831, Uzal removed to Newton and resided there until his death, in 1845;* he married Jane, daughter of Thomas Armstrong, and his children who attained to manhood and womanhood were Robert Haggerty, who married Mary, a sister of Capt. Thomas Anderson, now in the custom-house in New York City, and lives in Newark; Catharine, became the wife of George M. Ryerson and the mother of eleven children, of whom seven are living; Mary Haggerty, the chosen helpmeet of Thomas N. McCarter.

Isaac Smith and his wife, Catharine Loder, came from Hunterdon County about 1810 or 1811, and settled about two miles from Newton, on the Fredon road, on what are now the Jacob Crown and Henry Vandoren farms. He was a distiller and farmer. He had twelve children, one of whom, Samuel Smith, who married Elizabeth Mattison,† was a farmer and an extensive grain and stock speculator; he is now represented in Newton by Fanny L., wife of Maj. William R. Mattison; William M., a lawyer; Charles A., and Mary Alice. Eliza, a daughter of Isaac, married Gen. Lyman Edwards, and their children living are James A. and Harriet. Children of William L.,‡ another son of Isaac (John Wesley, William Marshall, and Emma), have property in the town, but are not residents there.

Samuel Smith died Sept. 21, 1859, and his brother, William L., the day preceding. Samuel's widow is still living, the wife of Maj. John Kraber, and by him has had one daughter,—Elizabeth H.

DURING THE REVOLUTION.

The statement has been published that the "Tory Bonnell Moody, who made his home in the rocks of the Muckshaw swamp, near our town," and who committed many desperate acts, was hunted by the Whigs of Newton, "eventually captured, and finally hung

* He was buried in Newton, but his father and grandfather were interred in the Plains Church Cemetery.

† James Mattison came from Hunterdon to Sussex County between 1780 and 1785, and settled one mile from the court-house, on the north side of the Fredon road; had children,—William, Nicholas E., John, James, Susan, Mary, and Sarah,—all deceased, but most of them left large families. William married Elizabeth Robbins, and had ten children, of whom six are deceased,—namely, Ann, wife of Hampton Hazen; John B., married Mary A. Hardisty; James, married Mary Hunt; Andrew, married Caroline Hunt; Mary, wife of Albert C. Townley; and Alice G., wife of Ephraim D. Cramer. Those living are Sarah C., widow of John Stephens; Margaret H., second wife of Albert C. Townley, deceased; Elizabeth, widow of Samuel Smith, and wife of John Kraber; and Annus S., who married Susan Oxford. There are represented in Newton children of John B. Mattison, Mary Townley, Margaret H. Townley, and Elizabeth (Smith) Kraber.

‡ The late W. L. Smith was county clerk from 1846 to 1851.

on the green, where the surrogate's office now stands, for robbing a gentleman's house and self near Belvidere." This is an error. The person hung was not Capt. Bonnell Moody, but one of the prisoners whom Lient. James Moody released from jail, and who was afterwards captured, as above related.*

But the patriotic record of Newton in the Revolution is one that does her honor. In the County "Committee of Safety," which met monthly at Newton, the old town had a large and loyal representation in the persons of Archibald Stewart, Robert Price, John Stoll, Thomas Anderson, Jacob McCollum (who served in the Legislature in 1778), Philip Doderer, and Jacob Stoll.

Newton furnished both men and means in the struggle for independence, and the records show it to have been in no ways lacking in loyalty to the patriot cause. Among the names of these patriots that of Thomas Anderson† stands prominent. He was clerk of the Committee of Safety (and also acting clerk of the county from 1770 to 1777, and surrogate from 1785 till his death, in 1805), and for a considerable portion of the war acted as assistant deputy quartermaster-general. The army supplies raised in this county—horses, flour, feed, etc.—were forwarded through him to the various military posts. It is said that Gen. Washington at one time during the Revolution stopped at Newton and was a guest of Mr. Anderson. It is traditional, also, that Washington rebuked his entertainers for their very lavish display of silver plate on that occasion, remarking that it was unseemly at a time when the soldiers in the field were suffering for both food and raiment.

James Robinson guarded prisoners from Sussex to Ringos, in Hunterdon County, in 1783.

OCTOGENARIANS AND OLD RESIDENTS.

The following list of persons of eighty years and upwards exhibits the names and ages of the oldest living residents of Newton in the year 1875, as shown by the census of that year (the age is given at last birthday): Margaret G. Anderson,‡ 85; Elizabeth Townsend, 91; Hannah Meacham, 83; Sarah Konkle,§ 81; Mary McIntire,|| 89; Rebecca Drake, 80; Susan Cornell, 89; Jane Northrup, 85.

Only two of the above named were living in June, 1880,—Rebecca Drake, at Newton, and Susan Cornell, in Hardwick township, Warren Co.,—at which date the list of octogenarians was given by the census enumerators as follows: Jane Brower, 80; Jacob Mabee, 80; Anna B. Cassidy, 80; Job J. Drake, 80; Jacob Strader, 80; James Sutton, 80; Moses Woodruff,¶ 81; Ann S. Armstrong, 82; Anna M. Johnson, 82; Benjamin Booth, 84; Rebecca Drake, 85; Nancy Pettit, 86; Charles Cinderbox, 89.

* For an account of Lient. Moody, see chapter on the Revolution.

¶ Died in December, 1880.

The oldest man in this list, Charles Cinderbox, is not a very old resident here, but was a long-time resident in Byram township, coming here about ten years since. Among other old citizens may be named Morris Simpson, 79; Merritt Pinckney, 79; Aaron H. Bonnell, 74; Elijah Rosenkrans, 74; Samuel P. Roberts, 72; Benjamin Van Campen, 79; Charles Stickers, 74; David Thompson, 71; Jacob Huyler, 72; Israel Blanchard, 73; Benjamin Hand, 70; and the oldest of the old ladies (besides the six given above) are Jane Wilson, 77; Mary Bross, 79; Effie Beemer, 78; Sarah Hart, 78; Sibilla Linn, 78.

EARLY MERCHANTS.

Holmes, Pemberton & Stuart are reported to have been the first merchants; they were in active operation long before 1800. They were not in business together when they first started, although they subsequently were associated as partners. Their store was at one time on the lot now partly occupied by the Anderson House. George H. McCarter clerked for them there. This stand was subsequently occupied by David Ryerson and Garret Rosenkrans.

It is stated that in 1820 there were but six stores in Newton, which were those of George H. McCarter, where Joseph Anderson's store now is; Pettit Britton, where yet is the Britton property, above the park; John Feeny, in a building belonging to the estate of D. W. Smith, and occupied by Huston & Van Blarcom; Bonnell Haggerty, on the Samuel Johnson corner; John Rorbach, on the late Rorbach property, above the court-house; and Ryerson & Rosenkrans, at the place above mentioned. About this time the firm of Ryerson & Dennis was engaged here in mercantile pursuits; its members were David Ryerson and Ezekiel Dennis, the latter the father of the founder of the "Dennis Library." Phillips & Rosenkrans came a little later. Hall & Johnson kept a general merchandise store in the old academy building for several years prior to 1829.

NEWTON'S PROGRESS.

The changes which have taken place in the village of Newton during the past thirty-five or forty years, and its growth during that period, may be seen in the following paragraphs, condensed from an article published in the Sussex Register a few years since, and revised to date:

At that time the town comprised hardly a quarter of its present population, and the principal business was transacted above Spring Street. The corner of Church and Main was one of the busiest portions, as the post-offices and two stores were located there.

The valuable slate-quarry, which is now a source of so much pride and profit, is located where a thick woods afforded a place for political meetings in Polk and Dallas' times.

Between Church and Division Streets the ground was a quagmire,—a calamus-swamp,—over which it was impossible to drive without miring. Now it is filled up, and is good solid ground. At the lower corner of Division and High Streets was formerly an old brick kiln over sixty years ago, but gone about 1820, and near the same place the site of a lumber-yard, belonging to George and Robert H. McCarter; and the building now owned by Robert Gray derived the name of "mulo-stable" because it was originally used by the McCarters as a shelter for their mules, of which they had a large number employed in carting. The ground between Division and Liberty streets was known as Johnson's meadow, and used as a training-ground when the militia went out for parade.

In front of the dwelling now occupied by Robert S. Wintermute, and the E. C. Moore estate, stood a large barn-like structure, which was used as a blacksmith-shop. A building some distance in its rear was occupied by John A. Bonnell as a wagon-making and paint-shop. The house occupied by John T. Stewart was built in 1840, by J. A. Bonnell, for Mr. Hunt. A stream of water (now covered) runs through the centre of this lot, and on the north side was a small building where a large number of our young people attended school under the tutelage of Miss Isabella Dennis and Miss Warner. The house of David L. Foster was occupied by the firm of Foster & Auble as a shoe-shop and dwelling.

David Thompson's house was built by G. H. McCarter in 1819, the brick for which was burned near the old Methodist Episcopal church. This is one of the first brick buildings erected. Mrs. Halleck's residence was built by the McCarters about 1823. Dr. Haven's house was built in 1821 by William Beach, and is an old but very substantial structure. The adjoining house has been used for a variety of purposes, and was originally built for a tailor-shop. Daniel S. Anderson's house was built by David Hyerson, and was afterwards occupied by Dr. A. D. Morford and Dr. Thomas Ryerson, before it came into possession of its present owner. The "Hoopangh House" was built by Jason King. Lewis Van Barrow's house was erected by Ephraim Green; the portion in front is the first one that was built in Newton, by Admos A. Harrison, before 1840. The Register building was built for a store-house by the McCarters. The Borbach dwelling-house and harness-shop have since been merged into one building, and only the rear looks natural.

The Drake house is one of the oldest buildings, and its neighbor, the Woodruff building, has been very much changed since John Trusdell sold candles and marbles to the boys in 1850. The court-house was built in 1847, on the site of the one burned. The original county clerk's and surrogate's office, built in 1842, was torn down in 1850. The old "County Hotel," fronting on High Street and Park Place, was burned in 1857.

About where the post-office is located William Van Campen first started the shoemaking business, and Mrs. Harker lived on the east side end of the same building. Charles Avie's house is built upon part of the hotel garden, and the open space before the Presbyterian church formed part of the stable-yard.

Where now is the handsome mansion of John Linn formerly stood a story-and-a-half house, in which the McCarter, Dennis, Johnson, and other families have resided. Its frame constitutes a part of the Joseph Warbasse house, in High Street; a row of five naves in front was cut down when the street was widened. The next house was built by John S. Patvine, and has been used as a dwelling and boarding-school; the "Collegiate Institute" was started there, the "Female Seminary" also finding a home in it for some time, and until it was closed in 1861.* An old tumble-down building, occupied by Barnabas Carter as a dwelling and shoe-shop, has disappeared, and in its place is the residence of Mrs. B. A. Hedges. A large duck-pond formerly occupied part of the lot on which is now the residence of George H. Nelden.

The Baptist parsonage was built by Edward Stewart, sold to Phoebe Foster, who disposed of it to the Methodists for a parsonage. They in turn sold it to other parties, and it finally became the property of the present owners. In 1840 the house then owned by the Halsted, Main and Halsted Streets, was moved to the opposite side of the street, and is now, remodelled and changed, the residence of Wickham M. Clark; on the site of its former location was erected the dwelling occupied by the late Judge Martin Ryerson. The old house of Judge Hall, now occupied by tenants and owned by Lafayette Westbrook, was built by Judge Joseph Y. Miller, but has since then been remodelled. The corner of Main and Division Streets was formerly occupied by the Register office, and at one time by Ladin Trusdell as a chair-shop. Job Halsted's law-office stood opposite, on what is now Halsted Street; the frame of that office formed part of the L. Trusdell house. On the site of Francis Greay's building stood an old house known as the Winterbottom property.

On the corner of Main and Church was Samuel Johnson's store until his death, 1843 (later Nicholas & Tibbitt, Perry & Co., etc.), which, after trade changed to Spring Street, was made into a dwelling. The tin-shop and dwelling of Gen. Lyman Edwards was torn down subsequently to make room for the Episcopal rectory. The former building had a dismal look, and with the huge boxes of old flint-lock muskets which were kept within its walls, it was looked upon by the youngsters with terror. Next to this, on lands of William T. Anderson, Esq., stood the house of Newton's first fire-engine. The machine was an ungainly thing, worked by two cranks, one on each side; the water was carried in leather buckets and poured into the engine, which, by great exertion, threw a stream of water 30 or 40 feet.

On the corner below, a small brick building, built by Col. Grant Fitch, and used as a book-store by A. H. Rogers, is still standing, and is undoubtedly the first brick building in Newton.

Squire Samuel Lane's old house, on the east side of Main Street, is one of the oldest now standing. It shows but little change during the past three decades.

The residence of William P. Nicholas is a landmark. It was originally built in 1802, and known as the Newton Academy. The Register office was in its second story for a time; the store was occupied by Hall & Johnson, Johnson & Sons, and W. P. Nicholas, and subsequently was converted into a dwelling. The entrance to the old cemetery is by the side of this place.

In front of Charles L. Inslee's (formerly Dr. Smith's) residence, and almost upon the street, was an old frame and stone building erected by Dr. Linn, and torn down about 1860 by Thomas S. McCarter, to make room for the present structure. It was at one time occupied as a tavern, and the Townsend house, on Spring Street, has part of its frame.

The adjoining house of Nathan Drake, deceased, is a very old one. It was occupied at one time by Job S. Halsted, Esq., as a law-office. The first poplar-tree ever planted in Newton found a place in its door-yard. The library building stands on the site of the late Col. James Conover's old dwelling and drug-store. All the land in the rear of these buildings, as far down as Madison Street, was owned by Mr. Conover, who cut it up into lots, which were drawn in a lottery over sixty years ago.

Next is the dwelling owned and occupied in his lifetime by "Golly" Van Sands, who kept the worst-looking drug-store and the greatest assortment of wooden clocks and brass watches in the country. Charles Van Sands was a genius, but a peculiar one. The property was afterwards purchased and remodelled by Dennis Cochran, who lived there until it was burned, in September, 1873.

The Sussex Bank was first started in 1818 in a building which stood where is now the new house of Dr. Sheppard, and in 1823 moved to its present location. The third building from this was a rickety old structure used by J. B. Mucklow as a hat-factory. This gave way to Mills & Goodale's hardware-store. "Johnson's corner looks no more like 'Beach's Bazaar' than a crow resembles a sheep."

Thirty years ago there was not a sign of a house below Spring Street on what is now occupied by Trinity and other streets. From recollection we count over one hundred houses which have been built since that time on what was then almost considered bog-meadow. The late Dr. Stuart's residence was then the extreme limit of that part of the town. From that point to Drake's Pond, over a mile, there was not a single house now there are about thirty, not including the depot-buildings and shoe-factory. From there to the pond it was one of the dreariest rides imaginable, and was very appropriately named the "Gallows Road," two murderers having been hung along it.—Peter Brakenum and Mary Cole. In the vicinity of the old depot the road was narrow, and high rocks and thick cedars seemed to make the place more dismal if possible than it really was; but the advent of the iron horse laid daylight in, and the gloom is dispelled.

The Cochran house was built in 1840. The site of Warbasse's and Oakley B. Pellet's stores was formerly occupied by an old building, in which (next the "Cochran") were a saloon and a watchmaker's shop. A long building in the rear was a bowling-alley until removed; it then made two tenant-houses on Hamilton Street. The saloon was kept by William Earl (now of Sparta), Lewis L. Kent, and others. The building was torn down, and the present one erected by James A. Goodale. The sidewalks in front of these buildings were of various grades, so that coming from the court-house was like ascending a pair of stairs. It was at one of these offsets that Horace Greely met with a severe accident while returning to his hotel after lecturing in the court-house.

David R. Hull's store was built by Edwards & Smith, on land formerly owned by William Pettit. Tuttle & Tuttle's store occupies the rest of the Pettit lot, and the old building shows some of its former plan in the basement. Haston & Van Barrow's store was built and originally occupied by Edwards & Saut as a stove-store. The Williams building was first occupied by William F. Morford with dry-goods, etc., afterwards by Hall & Rosenkrans and other firms. The old Raynor building was built and owned by Thomas Raynor, and then Harrison Cole kept a tailor-shop and Cummins & Wil-trick sold dry-goods. The Rosenkrans building, another old structure, has been much changed. It was a story and a half high when built by George Walker.

From the corner opposite the Anderson House, out as far as Charles P. Borbach's, there are eighteen or twenty buildings, of which only three or four were in existence thirty years ago. . . . In the rear of the court-house was an old building which served as store, printing-office, shoe-shop, etc.; it was bought by the county and torn down some years ago. The late Anderson (now Ward) House occupies the site of the former dwelling of Oakley Anderson, father of Daniel S. Anderson. The houses from this place down to the property of Mrs. B. B. Edsall have all been erected within the past twenty [-six] years.

The Van Campen house is one of the old landmarks, and of great age. It was originally a hewn-log house, but about forty-five years ago it was weatherboarded. It is still owned by Mr. Van Campen, but occupied by tenants. Between the residence of Mrs. J. R. Hull stood a blacksmith-shop, owned by the Drake family, but long since converted into firewood. To one who never saw the Hull mansion when it was surrounded by tanneries, bark-mill, etc., it would be impossible to describe the change. The immense tan-bank, extending into the street, together with the tannery buildings, passed away years ago. . . . East of the steam-mill was an old dwelling known as the Drake house, and in Hull's meadow, back of the mill, the centennial celebration was held.

CENTENNIAL FOURTH-OF-JULY CELEBRATION.

The one hundredth anniversary of American independence was celebrated at Newton according to the programme. The day was ushered in by the usual demonstrations,—ringing bells, firing of cannon, and the display of the national colors from public and private buildings. At half-past ten o'clock the procession of civic societies and citizens was formed under command of Capt. Samuel Dennis, grand marshal, assisted by Majs. N. K. Bray and William R. Mattison and Capts. Francisco and Northrup, which, after making the tour of the streets of the town, brought up at the park, where stands had been prepared for the reception of the speakers, music, and invited guests. Ex-Governor Haines presided. His remarks on opening the proceedings on the grand stand were received with demonstrations of applause, especially the announcement that he had been a citizen of old Sussex for upwards of fifty years. Besides him on the stand were Maj. John Boss, of Sparta, standard-bearer; David J. Colver, the veteran of Lafayette, bearer of cap of Liberty; Ex-Governor Bross, of Chicago; George Washer, of Romeo, Mich.; Rev. John T. Craig, formerly of Newton, but now of Baltimore; V. M. Drake, of Goshen, N. Y.; Rev. N. Pettit, of Bordentown; Judge Daniel S. Anderson, of Newton; Senator Samuel T. Smith; ex-Assemblyman Samuel H. Hunt; Judge Moore, of Newton; Moses Northrup, of Hampton; Dr. Sayer, Col. Robert Hamilton, Moses Woodruff, James Hamilton, and other well-known citizens of the county, among whom were also the following clergymen: Revs. Dr. Priest, J. I. Morrow, J. L. Davis, William M. Moffat, and clergymen from different localities throughout the county.

After prayer and the blessing of Almighty God had been feelingly invoked by Rev. Dr. Priest, a beautiful and appropriate ode, by Rev. Mr. Pettit, was sung by a musical choir under the direction of H. J. Rudd, accompanied by three cornets, led by J. L. Northrup, of the Newton Cornet Band. The Declaration of Independence was read by Col. Clark, of Newton, at the conclusion of which Rev. N. Pettit occupied nearly an hour in giving his address, which as an oratorical effort was one entirely worthy the occasion.

Next in order came the "Liberty Tree Song," by the veteran David J. Colver, in a loud clear voice, which was distinctly heard at a great distance. It was a wonderful performance of a man upwards of ninety years old, whose head, well covered with long white hair, rendered him the most conspicuous figure connected with the centennial celebration.

At the conclusion of the song Governor Haines announced that further proceedings at the stand would be postponed until four o'clock, when it would be occupied by former Sussex men, present by invitation of the centennial committee. Accordingly, at four o'clock the stand was again occupied, Col. Robert Hamilton as presiding officer. After some very happy and interesting remarks by the colonel, he introduced to the assemblage ex-Lieut.-Governor Bross, of Illinois, a native of Sussex. He referred briefly to his own history, and those of his ancestors, as being originally Sussex people. As for himself, he was born in old Montague, and was pleased to say that he was a Jerseyman. He had left the county early in life, and had now returned to it to aid in doing honor to the memory of his ancestors, and to recall their sacrifices in the trying scenes of the Revolution. He related during the hour he occupied the stand many interesting facts connected with Chicago and the West during the many years he had been a citizen and a resident of the State of Illinois. Governor Bross was followed by George Washer, of Michigan, formerly a resident of Sussex, in a few well-timed remarks. The next speaker was the Rev. Mr. Craig, of Baltimore, who said he had performed a journey of two hundred miles to do honor to the principles of liberty, and to show his devotion to the land of his adoption by mingling his rejoicings with the people of the town in which he had first taken out naturalization papers announcing his intention to become a citizen of the United States. The years he had spent in Sussex were the most interesting of his life, and he trusted the citizens of the county would continue in the future, as they had done in the past, to cultivate the principles of religious and political liberty and free toleration. These he considered the foundation-stones of all good government.

Col. Hamilton next introduced to the audience V. M. Drake, a former well-known citizen of the county, who responded briefly. He had spent the greater portion of his life in these valleys, and was prompted to attempt to complete the work his father had begun when he marched from the Delaware to fight the British at Plattsburg and Lundy's Lane. As for himself, he had shared in all the enterprises undertaken in Sussex for the last thirty years; and, although he had had his ups and downs in life, like most other men, he was here to mingle his congratulations with those of its citizens on the auspicious event they were engaged in commemorating, and also to add his thanks for the uniform support the citizens of the county had always extended him under the most trying and difficult circumstances. In the evening there was a handsome display of fireworks, got up under the special direction of Mr. Charles Crook and S. S. Cook, and a midnight torchlight procession, composed of some 200 citizens, headed by a drum corps, which passed through all the prominent streets amid the loud plaudits of bystanders and the deafening noise occasioned by the explosion of large quantities of giant-powder upon the adjoining hills.

IV.—ORGANIZATION AND CIVIL HISTORY.

In 1753, when the county was set off from Morris, commissioners were chosen to divide Sussex County into precincts, according to an act of the Assembly. The commissioners were Benjamin Smith, William Schooley, Johannes Depue, Joseph Hull, Johannes Cornelius Westbrook, Richard Gardner, and Richard Lundy, Jr. They divided the county into four precincts,—Walpack, Greenwich, Hardwick, and New Town. The area of "New Town" was then nearly or quite one-half of the present county. In May, 1754, Wantage was set off from Newtown, and Oxford and Mansfield-Woodhouse from Greenwich, the bounds of which were defined May 30, 1754. The record thus describes those of Newtown:

"And Also that Newtown Shall begin on The west Side of Moskonunk, where Hardwick bounds on the st River. Thence Along the York Line to the Wallkill. Thence up the Wallkill to the Southeast Corner of Wantage Precinct. Thence Along Wantage Line to Minisinct Mountain. Thence Along the foot of the Mountain To Hardwick. Thence Along Hardwick Line to the Place of Beginning."

Since that date its territory has been lessened by the formation of several townships,—viz., Hardyston, from its northern part, in 1759; Frankford, in 1797; and Byram, in 1798. In 1824, when Newton was one of the nine townships of the newly-formed Sussex, it was still of goodly size; but in 1845, Sparta was created from portions of Newton, Hardyston, Frankford, and Byram, and the same year Lafayette from Newton and Frankford. A division of the township of Newton, in March, 1864, resulting in the formation of Andover and Hampton, leaves Newton as at present constituted, the nearest fragment of its once large domain.

In 1845, before Hampton and Andover were set off, Newton had a population of 3857; in 1870, after they had been formed, it had only 2493 inhabitants.

The following is the principal portion of the enactment which organized the present town of Newton, and which defines its boundaries, powers, etc.:

"An Act to create the Town of Newton, and the Townships of Andover and Hampton, out of the Township of Newton, in the County of Sussex.

"BE IT ENACTED by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That all that part of Newton township in the county of Sussex, adjoining the lines of the townships of Green, Byram, Sparta, and Lafayette, which lies southerly and easterly of the following line, namely: beginning in the line between the townships of Green and Newton, where the highway leading past the late residence of Obad Wilson, deceased, crosses said line, and running from thence to the Devil's Hole (so called), on or near the line between the farms of Wm. M. Babbitt and John M. Carter, Jr., and from thence to a point, where a small stream of water passes under the Sussex Railroad, a little easterly of the dwelling-house of Halsted F. Townsend; from thence to where the line between the lands of George M. Ryerson and lands of Andrew Shiner and John Townsend intersect the canal or ditch recently made in the low meadows by the Pauling's Kill Meadow Company, and from thence down the said ditch to the line of Lafayette township, and the same is hereby set off into a new township to be called Andover. . . .

"5. And be it enacted, That all that part of the township of Newton . . . which lies northerly and westerly of the following line, namely: beginning in the line between the townships of Green and Newton, where the road leading past the late residence of Obad Wilson crosses said line, and running thence by the line of Andover township, to the Devil's Hole (so called), on or near the line between the farms of Wm. M. Babbitt and John M. Carter, Jun., and from thence to the bridge over the stream crossing the highway near the farmhouse of Wm. M. Babbitt; thence to a point of woods, where one fence intersects another on the farm belonging to the heirs of John A. Horton, deceased, a short distance westwardly of the mansion-house on said farm; from thence to a point in the highway leading from Newton to Washingtonville, where the lands of Geo. M. Ryerson and Dennis Cochran corner upon said highway; thence along the line between their lands and following the line of said Ryerson's land, until it intersects the said ditch made by the Pauling's Kill Meadow Company; thence down the said ditch to the line of Lafayette township, and the same is hereby set off into a new township to be called the township of Hampton. . . .

"9. And be it enacted, That all the residue of the said township of Newton, and which is bounded partly by the line herein described, which separates it from Andover township, and partly by the line herein described, which separates it from Hampton township, shall be and is hereby created a borough or town corporate, which shall be called and known by the name of 'The Town of Newton,' and the inhabitants thereof shall be and hereby are incorporated by that name, . . . and by the said corporate name they shall be known in law, and shall be capable of suing and being sued," etc.

"10. And be it enacted, That the said corporation, 'The Town of Newton,' and the inhabitants thereof, shall be entitled to all the power, and privileges, and subject to the same duties, regulations, restrictions, and liabilities, as the inhabitants of the several townships of the said county of Sussex are or may be entitled or subject to by the general laws of the State," etc.

"11. And be it enacted, That the inhabitants of the said 'Town of Newton' shall hold their first town-meeting at the court-house in the village of Newton, on the second Monday in April next ensuing."

[Sections 12 and 13 relate to judges and clerks of elections, and justices of the peace, their duties, etc. Section 14 provides for the election, in the place of overseers of the highways, annually, "of a suitable person, being a resident and landowner in said town, as superintendent of roads and streets, who shall have charge of all the roads and streets and sidewalks within the said town," with authority to "make, form, work, and repair" the same, "and to remove all obstructions and nuisances thereon;" and to expend such money as may be furnished him, "or which the town committee, or any four of them, may authorize him to expend for such purpose," etc. Section 15 asserts that the 25th and 35th sections of the act entitled "An Act concerning Roads" shall not apply to nor be in force in the town of Newton, and "it shall be deemed and taken that the town of Newton have elected and determined to maintain their highways by hire."] "

"16. And be it enacted, That the town committee of the town of Newton, or a majority of them, in addition to their general powers as a town committee, shall have power and authority, in the name and upon the responsibility and credit of the said corporation of the town of Newton, to borrow and raise money, and advance and pay the same, from time to time, to the said town superintendent of roads and streets, for the purposes specified in the 14th section of this act, and for the like purposes may direct, in writing, the said superintendent to expend money upon the credit and responsibility of the said town of Newton, in such sum or sums as they shall specify; but the amount so to be borrowed and raised or directed to be expended shall not exceed the sum voted at the next preceding town-meeting in said town of Newton to be raised for the highways and streets of the said town.

"17. And be it enacted, That Horace V. Edsall, as surveyor, shall be and he is hereby authorized to run, survey, and mark the lines of separation herein described and mentioned, . . . and to make report of the same in writing to the clerk of the county of Sussex, who shall record the said report," etc.

[Section 18 appointed Gabriel L. Dunning, Levi Shepherd, and Thomas Lawrence commissioners to ascertain the amount of moneys raised and paid for bounties to volunteers credited to Newton township, and to apportion the same between the two newly-formed townships and the town of Newton.

Sections 19, 20, and 21 appertain to the manner of raising money by taxation, etc. The final section (22) recites "that this act shall take effect immediately; proviso, that the present officers of the said town of Newton shall be and remain in office, and exercise the powers and be subject to the duties conferred upon them by law, until the second Monday in April next."]

This act may be found in full in the "Session Laws" of 1864, pages 196 to 202. It was approved and became a law March 10, 1864.

A supplement to the act creating the town of Newton makes it unlawful for cattle, horses, mules, sheep, goats, and swine to run at large, and provides for the impounding of the same; approved April 2, 1869. Another supplement (approved Feb. 4, 1874) gives the town committee charge of the streets, defines their powers, allows them to borrow and raise money, to make contracts for lighting the streets, etc.

The only change subsequently to the erection of the town of Newton in its bounds was in 1869 (approved March 24th), the text of which is as follows:²⁶

"An Act to set off a part of the Township of Andover to the Town of Newton in the County of Sussex.

"1. BE IT ENACTED," etc., "That all that part of the township of Andover, . . . lying next to and adjoining the town of Newton, that is bounded by the following courses and distances—to wit, beginning at one of the corners of the town of Newton, near the dwelling-house of Benjamin F. Sherwood (formerly Halsted F. Townsend's), said corner being where a small stream of water crosses the road from Newton to Sparta, and under the railroad from Newton to Waterloo; thence (1) from the southerly edge of the culvert south 39° east 23 chains and 25 links to the southeast corner of Capt. G. Fitts' lot, near a butter-ant-tree; (2) south 43° 45' west 4 chains to a basswood-tree marked with a blaze and three notches on four sides; (3) north 51° 10' west until it intersects the line of the town of Newton, running from the Devil's Hole to the aforementioned culvert—shall be set off from the said township of Andover, and shall become a part of the said town of Newton, and shall be subject to the said town of Newton in her corporate capacity.

"2. And be it enacted, That this act shall take effect immediately."

The following-named citizens served as chosen freeholders of Newton township. The list, from the formation of the township down to the year 1791, is from an old volume of records of the "Justices and Freeholders of Sussex County," rescued from the dust and oblivion of an old desk in the waiting-room to the grand-jury room in Newton. The persons who are named in this list, prior to 1800, were among the pioneers of "old New Town," taking part not only in its civil, but in its social, industrial, and religious affairs, many of them prominently identified with the settlement and growth of what is now not only the town of Newton, but also the townships of Frankford, Sparta, Lafayette, Andover, and Hampton.

† It is safe to say that very few of the living inhabitants of the county were aware of the existence of this volume, as repeated inquiries for records of this class have failed to develop their whereabouts. This book is a "mine" for the historian. Musty, yellow with age, leather-worn, and loose-loaned as it is, it has been liberally drawn upon and used as documentary proofs to verify many of the statements advanced in this history, some of which, perchance, may conflict with and overturn old traditions and local lore.

EARLY RECORDS.

Moses Ayres had a hand in repairing the court-house in 1769. The county collector's account for that year contains the following item:

"Per Contra, Cr., . . . Nov. 29th, By Cash paid Moses Ayres Esqr in part of his demand for repairing the Courthouse as per Recd, the sum of £12."

In 1761 and 1762 the board of freeholders met at the house of Henry Hairlocker, in 1763 and 1764 at the house of Amos Pettit, and in 1765 at Ephraim Darby's. After this time that body usually met at the court-house. In 1784, Jonathan Willis was allowed £1 1s. 8d. "for finding candles for the court."

Amos Pettit figured prominently in the civil affairs of township and county. In 1770 he was ordered by the freeholders to sell all the county arms "that he can collect, at next court, according to the former directions of this board, or at privet sale as opportunity may serve, and that the county collector do inspect²⁷

† Joseph Hull was a justice in 1759, and acted in that capacity, as a member of the board of justices and freeholders, four or five years.

‡ Became a justice in 1775, and was again appointed in 1799.

§ There is a break in the records, the years 1792-93 being missing.

¶ John Johnson was in 1809 clerk of the Court of Common Pleas and clerk of the board of freeholders.

 Mr. Huston was director of the board in 1810.

†† Tied between Charles Arvis and Jacob Gould; the former appointed by town committee.

year were of the steps in front and of the cupola, new steps being built at the back door. Benjamin Griggs was the superintendent of repairs in 1803. In 1807 the high sheriff entered his protest that the jail was insufficient to secure prisoners. The next year, 1808, the inhabitants of the village of Newton applied to the board of freeholders "for liberty to build a market-house on the green;" permission was granted and the location fixed. There is nothing showing that it was ever built.

At this time the good people of Newton became concerned for the welfare of the public buildings, as shown by the following:

"A memorial from a number of the inhabitants of Newton praying the board to take some order respecting the court-room to prevent its being abused by individuals; whereupon the board did resolve that there be a lock purchased by the sheriff at the expense of the county, and put on the middle door of the court-room, and that the sheriff keep the key thereof, and that no person have access to said room unless at times of some public business or meetings of a public nature, preaching, &c."

It was also "Resolved, That the sheriff be instructed to prohibit any fire being kept in the garret of the court-house; that he also prohibit any carpenter or coopering work done therein, and that the prisoners on the limits have privilege of dressing or cooking their provisions at the fire of the jail kitchen, subject to their good behavior."

In 1811, William T. Anderson was attorney for the county. May 11, 1825, the board resolved to build a surrogate's office, appropriated $500, and appointed a committee to select a site, &c. The committee reported, recommended that it be built at the east end of the clerk's office, of same width, and 25 feet in length.

In 1826, Maj. William T. Anderson was instructed to use the authority of the board to keep the public green in Newton clear of obstructions.

In 1827:

"Ordered, that $2 be paid to Isaac Wintermute for his services, assisting to survey 8 acres for jail limits in 1826."

1831:

"A claim was presented by James Beatty, under oath, for whipping three individuals, which was allowed and ordered to be paid, amount three dollars."

Nearly every year since 1800 had the several sheriffs protested against the insufficiency of the jail, and frequent repairs had been ordered, yet in 1832 it was all but in ruin, according to the report of the inspection committee. They said, "A part of the wall in the front jail has entirely given way, the stones have fallen out, and is in immediate want of a thorough repair," and, as to the court-room, "the windows throughout want overhauling, the sills, sash, casings, and bottoms of the frames are wasted by time and rotteness." Maj. Thomas Teasdale, John Dill, Esq., and John H. Hall were appointed to superintend the repairs, which were made to the extent of $143.73. And yet, in May, 1834, Sheriff Uzal C. Hagerty reports the jail as being insecure.

The court-house and jail was destroyed by fire Jan. 28, 1847. Measures were at once taken by the board of freeholders to rebuild on the old site, but of increased size, to meet the wants of the county. Various citizens of Newton tendered their obligations to the board in order that the public buildings might be replaced without delay. The building committee were William T. Anderson, Joseph Greer, Nathan Drake, Robert Hamilton, and James R. Hull.

1856.—Whitfield S. Johnson and George T. Smith "were made a committee to superintend the public green and buildings belonging to the county for the ensuing year."

1860.—The overseers of roads for the several districts of the township, and amounts of road money appropriated to each, for that year, were as follows:

1. Jacob Strader.....	$65.00	15. Henry C. Northrup.....	$224.50

Geo. H. Nelden

GEORGE H. NELDEN'S great-grandfather Nelden (formerly spelled Nulton) was the progenitor of the family in New Jersey, came from Germany, and is supposed to have settled in Pennsylvania.

George, father of George H. Nelden, was born in Bucks Co., Pa., in 1769; married Aehsh, daughter of George Holcombe, of Trenton, N. J., who bore him two sons who grew to manhood,—viz., George H. and John.

The youngest of these sons was graduated at Union College, N. Y., was subsequently a farmer, and during the latter part of his life was engaged in the lumber business in Newton, where he died.

After his marriage George Nelden removed to what is now Hawley, on the Lackawaxen, and there for twenty years was engaged in lumbering. About 1820 he removed to the township of Montague, Sussex Co., N. J., where he purchased a farm, upon which he resided until his death, which occurred in 1836. He was a man of good business ability, and sought to give his sons the advantages of a college education, and well fit them for professional lives. His wife died about 1840, aged sixty-seven years.

George H., son of George Nelden, was born at Hawley, April 21, 1815, and was therefore five years of age when his parents removed to Sussex County. His early education was received in the common school at Montague, under the private instruction of Rev. Clarkson N. Dunn, at Newton, and at a boarding-school at Harmony Vale.

At the age of sixteen he entered the law-office of Maj. William T. Anderson, at Newton, where he diligently pursued his legal studies for three years.

Believing that a business instead of a professional life would be more in accordance with his inclinations, he relinquished his studies, and for four years was a clerk in a wholesale dry-goods-house in New York City.

Returning to Sussex County, in partnership with Col. Joseph Northrup he carried on a general mercantile business at Lafayette for two years, when he again went to New York, where he was associated with George C. Smealley (Smealley & Nelden) for five years as importer and jobber of china, glass, and earthenware.

In 1840 he returned to Montague, where, in partnership with his brother, John, he carried on for five years a general mercantile business, farming, and was engaged quite extensively in lumbering at Shohola, Pa.

During his residence at Montague, Mr. Nelden was, in 1849, elected sheriff of Sussex County, and held the office for the usual term of three years.

In the winter of 1852 he was appointed by the electoral college of New Jersey to carry the vote of the State for Franklin Pierce for President and present it to the president of the United States Senate.

The following spring he was appointed by President Pierce United States marshal of New Jersey, and by reappointment by President Buchanan, in 1857, he held the office for eight years.

By virtue of his office as marshal, Mr. Nelden had in charge the census of the State of New Jersey in 1860, and appointed enumerators in its various counties and townships.

In 1860 he established a foundry, and until 1865 was engaged in the manufacture of stoves, plows, and other agricultural implements in Newton. He then started a coal- and lumber-yard at that place, which he carried on until 1874, when he was elected clerk of Sussex County, and by re-election in 1879 is the present (1881) incumbent of that office.

In all his official career Mr. Nelden has been known as a man of strict integrity; courteous, manly, and frank; in business judicious and vigilant; and has fearlessly performed the duties imposed upon him.

In early manhood he began to take an active part in local politics, and was elected a delegate to the Baltimore Convention that placed Martin Van Buren in nomination for the Presidency, and he has been frequently selected as a delegate to represent Sussex in State conventions.

Upon the breaking out of the late Rebellion Mr. Nelden took an active and influential part as a War Democrat in meeting the demands of the government for recruits for the Union army, believing as he fully did in the preservation of the Union as established by the framers of the Constitution.

His first wife was Caroline, a daughter of Maj. William T. Anderson, of Newton, whom he married in 1812, and who died about one year after their marriage, leaving an infant daughter, who also subsequently died.

His second wife was Elizabeth W., a daughter of Dr. Stephen Hedges, for many years a prominent physician of Newton and Sussex County. Of this union were born three children,—Mary H., John H., and Lucy L.

The mother of these children died Nov. 23, 1877.

V.—CHURCHES.

In Newton are found religious societies of five different denominations,—viz., Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, and Roman Catholic,—each of whom have a house of worship. The oldest of these churches in the present town of Newton is the Episcopal.

It is said that Dominics Ernst, Waulk, and other ministers of the German Reformed Church preached here at one time, using the old Presbyterian meeting-house in common with other denominations.

The Quakers also held meetings here in the early part of this century, and even so late as 1840. They met for worship at the Presbyterian church, the court-house, and at the house of Joseph Schooley, afterwards George M. Ryerson's residence, but not occupied for the last few years. Their preachers came mostly from Burlington or other points quite remote. After 1840 they seldom held "meeting," and finally became merged with other denominations.

CHRIST CHURCH.

The "Parish of Christ Church, Newton," was organized in the year 1769. Its charter, under which it still exists, was given by George III., and bears date of Aug. 15, 1774. The first corporators were Uzal Ogden, Nathaniel Pettit, Archibald Stewart, Edward Pigot, William Hall, Nathan Armstrong, Amos Pettit, Thomas Anderson, John Pettit, Charles Pettit, John B. Scott, and James Shaw. The "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel" was its nursing mother until the Revolution.

The first rector, the Rev. Uzal Ogden, commenced his labors here in 1769. There was then no bishop in this country, and he had to go to England for ordination. The services were then held in the old court-house. The rectory was begun in 1770, and finished in the following year; it was built on land (27 acres) donated for the purpose by Jonathan Hampton. The old rectory is a part of the dwelling of the late Levi Shepherd, and is probably the oldest house now standing in Newton. Mr. Hampton was not only Newton's early benefactor, but likewise the liberal patron of the Church of England here. He built the parsonage, or was the main contributor thereto; he also gave to the church land for cemetery use,—that which is the original part of the old graveyard. Jonathan Halsted, of Elizabethtown, gave the land to the west of the main walk. A farm of 200 acres was also given, in 1770, by the New Jersey proprietors, in trust, and decded in 1774 (December 16th) to "the rector, wardens, and vestry of Christ Church, New Town." A few years since the society obtained a legislative enactment which enabled them to dispose of it, whereupon they sold it to George Conklin. In a letter written by Rev. Mr. Ogden, in 1771, to the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel," he states that the Church of England families in the county number 63, "of whom one-third are in Newton, where services were held once in two or three weeks, alternating with Knowl Town, Hackettstown," etc.

Mr. Ogden continued his pastoral relations to this church until 1784, when he removed to Trinity Church, Newark.* The church was without a rector until 1820, when the Rev. Clarkson Dunn took charge of the parish. It is said the church became so disorganized during the thirty-six years' interregnum between the pastorates of the Revs. Ogden and Dunn, that when the latter gentleman came to Newton there were but six communicants connected with it. During all this time the services, irregular and transient as they were, were held (whenever a clergyman could be found) at the court-house. Mr. Dunn commenced to build up his church, and his zealous labors were crowned with success. In three years' time the society was strong enough to think of erecting a house of worship. He continued to preach at the court-house until 1823, when they built a stone church, on the corner of Main and Church Streets, on the site of the present edifice; it was small, but would comfortably seat 250 persons. The original lot on which it was built was the gift of William T. Anderson, Esq., deceased, although some additions were subsequently purchased of his estate.

In the year 1857 the Rev. Nathaniel Pettit succeeded Mr. Dunn† as rector, and continued until 1867. In 1868 the Rev. William W. Holly‡ was called; he was succeeded by Rev. W. H. Moffitt. There have been but five pastors in this church in a period of one hundred and eleven years.

* The writer of this sketch was recently shown, by Mr. S. H. Hunt, of Green, an old and rare work printed in Newark, N. J., by John Woods, in 1795, of which the following is a copy of the title:

"ANTIDOTE TO DEISM.

The DEIST UNMASKED; OR
an ample Refutation of all the Objections of
THOMAS PAINE,

Against the Christian Religion; as contained in a pamphlet, entitled, The Age of Reason; addressed to the CITIZENS of these STATES.

By the Reverend UZAL OGDEN,
Rector of Trinity Church, at Newark, in the State of New Jersey.
To which are prefixed, REMARKS on BOULANGER'S CHRISTIANITY UNVEILED.

To the DEIST UNMASKED, is annexed an APPENDIX, containing the Confessions and Recantations of several DEISTS in favor of Christianity; And also, a SHORT METHOD with the DEISTS. By the Reverend CHARLES LESLIE.

IN TWO VOLUMES—VOL. II," etc.

† The Rev. Clarkson Dunn was born near Woodbridge, N. J., in 1794. At twenty years of age he commenced to study for the ministry, and soon after entered the Theological Seminary of New Jersey. In 1820, in Christ Church, New Brunswick, he was admitted into the "Holy Order of Deacons" of the Protestant Episcopal Church. In 1823 he was ordained a priest by the Rt. Rev. John Croes, Bishop of New Jersey, in Christ Church, Newton; and upon leaving this church, became pastor of Grace Church, Elizabeth, N. J., the city in which, over forty years before, he was fitted for college, by Rev. Dr. Rudd. He was a classmate of the late Bishops Doane and Potter.

‡ Rev. Mr. Holly is now rector of the Hackensack (N. J.) Episcopal Church.

The first church building, erected in 1823, supplied the needs of the church until 1867, when, largely increased in numbers and wealth, it resolved to build a new edifice. The determination was put into effect the following year. The corner-stone was laid Aug. 21, 1868, the Right Reverend Bishop Odenheimer officiating, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Holly, Stansbury etc. The new church is a fine one, of Gothic architecture, built of the blue limestone so abundant in this section. It has a spire, from the base of which to the top of the cross surmounting it is 113 feet. It is lighted by twelve windows of stained glass, and the floor is laid of alternate strips of maple and black walnut. The building cost about $30,000, "and in point of beauty and durability is in advance of many churches costing double this amount." It was dedicated on its one hundredth anniversary, on Tuesday, Oct. 19, 1869, the services being conducted by the bishop of the diocese of New Jersey, who had previously officiated at the laying of the corner-stone. At the time of its consecration the indebtedness on the edifice was entirely canceled.

The parochial statistics from 1820 to 1867 show an aggregate of 510 baptisms, 241 confirmations, 334 marriages, and 468 funerals.

The present rectory property was purchased of Lyman Edwards about twelve years ago, and adjoins the church.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The Presbyterian Church at Newton was founded only after a long and bitter struggle with adverse influences, which, happily, have passed away.

The earliest record of the church dates back to 1786, when it applied, in connection with the Hardwick Church, for the ministerial services of Rev. Ira Condit, under sanction of the Newton Presbytery. Mr. Condit was settled here in 1787, and remained until 1793, giving one-fifth of his time to this church. The original church edifice, which occupied the site of the present one, was commenced in 1786, but was evidently several years in course of construction. The church lot was small, not extending to High Street, as now; but the house of worship built thereon was large for those times, being about 45 feet square, and capable of seating 300 people. It was built of stone, and faced Church Street. Over each of its two doors, in the side and gable end respectively, was a brown-stone tablet, on which was engraved an appropriate scriptural text. The pulpit was in the north end, with an overhanging sounding-board, on which perched a gilt dove bearing an olive-branch.‡ Fourteen pews and sixteen seats occupied the main body of the church, with five pews and sixteen seats in the gallery. The ceiling overhead was of plain boards, and few members of the congregation were aristocratic enough to have their pews painted. For many years

‡ This emblem of peace and purity, as well as the pulpit Bible first used in the church (two large volumes), is still preserved, and both were exhibited on the occasion of the laying of the corner-stone, in 1869.

divine service was carried on within its walls without either stove or fireplace, the preacher often performing his duties with mittens on. The hours of service were announced by the ringing of the old court-house bell, the bell-ringer having the use of a free seat in the church for performing such service. The cushion and hangings of the pulpit were of crimson, purchased in 1803, in Philadelphia. The pews held from eight to ten persons each. The first sale of pews was on Nov. 9, 1801, at which time Thomas Anderson purchased "Number 8," and presented it to the pastor. The sexton in those days received a salary of five dollars per annum.

The congregation was not only a long time in completing the church, but was for many years after harassed with debts and judgments, which its members were unable to liquidate. The church, still embarrassed by debt, in 1790, petitioned the Legislature to legalize a lottery instituted to raise funds for its benefit, and for an academy. The Legislature granted the authority. It was called the "Newton-Princeton Lottery," as Princeton was to share in the profits. But the effort failed; nothing was realized from it. To pay off a debt due the principal contractor (J. Jessup, of Florida, Orange Co., N. Y.), Archibald Stewart, Jonathan Willis, Henry Johnson, and Thomas Anderson gave their bond for £38. A little later (1793), James Sutter, another builder, obtained a judgment against the church, which was followed by others in favor of the pastor,* etc. Thus "pushed to the wall," the church was sold by the sheriff, and was purchased by Daniel Stewart, Esq., of Newton.

Mr. Condit was succeeded as pastor by Rev. Halloway W. Hunt, Sr., who officiated from 1795 until 1802.†

The minutes of the church show that at a meeting of the trustees at Newton, May 2, 1796, after having been sworn into office,—Thomas Anderson chosen president, Charles Case, clerk,—it was agreed that Rev. Halloway W. Hunt should take an assignment of the seats of the church, "together with what he can get subscribed, for his yearly salary," and "that the trustees do not stand accountable for any deficiency that may happen in said congregation;" it was also "allowed that the assessments do amount to £75." This is signed by "Thos. Anderson, Pres't; Halloway W. Hunt, V.D.M."

Rev. John Boyd, one of the original twelve forming the Presbytery, was the next pastor, serving from 1803 to 1811. The congregation being unable to pay him, he voluntarily relinquished $256 of his salary. The indebtedness to Rev. Mr. Condit still embarrassed the church. In 1804 it amounted to over $1400; it was gradually lessened until in 1818, when, completely liquidated, it is presumed the church was free from debt,—for the time being, at least.

Rev. Joseph L. Shafer, the next pastor, settled in Newton in 1812. The want of a new church was not recognized until 1818, and during the ensuing nine years the project of building a new edifice was agitated. In 1827 its erection was resolved upon. The church was commenced in 1828, and dedicated March 19, 1829. It stood partly on the site of the old one, and cost some $6000. This house was the home of the congregation for forty years. It was 53 by 70 feet on the ground, with an audience-room of 49 by 52 feet, galleries on three sides, and would seat 600 people. At the time it was built it was the largest building in the county. The freestone lintels of the old (first) edifice were incorporated in this; but, by mistake, they were placed over the side doors and covered up by the plastering; hence they were not discovered until the church was torn down to make room for the third structure, in which they were again, for the third time, used. Upon these two stones were the following inscriptions:

"Keep thy feet when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to make the sacrifice of fools."

"Thou shalt keep thy Sabbaths, and revere thy Sanctuary; I am the Lord."

Mr. Shafer's pastorate was a lengthy one,‡ extending from 1812 until 1853, except an interval of three years (1835-38) when stationed at Middletown Point. In 1835, when he resigned, in order to leave the church clear of debt he relinquished all arrears of salary, amounting to $1000, on condition that all other obli-

§ Rev. Dr. Junkin says of him, "He was the man for a life-long pastorate, devoted to the feeling of a flock rather than for aggressive action or sensational occasions. He was excelled by none in the most desirable elements of a Christian pastor. Born at Stillwater, N. J., May 9, 1757. His father was of German descent, his mother a Linn, his grandmother a Kirkpatrick. At the early age of thirteen he joined the Hanrick Church. In his fifteenth year he left home to study under the Rev. Mr. Boyd, at Lamington; was graduated at Princeton in 1808; studied theology with Dr. Woodhull, at Freehold; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1810; labored in Monmouth County for a time as a missionary; was installed over Newton and Hardyston. He soon relinquished the latter, and gave all his time to Newton. Here he labored until the hand of death arrested him, his harness still on, Nov. 12, 1853. But a few weeks before his death he occupied the pulpit for the last time. The last hymn of the morning service was the 186th. In attempting to read the last verse,—

"Soon the delightful day will come
When my dear Lord will call me home
And I shall see His face;
Then, with my Saviour, brother, friend,
A Last eternity I'll spend, Triumphant in His grace,"— his voice became broken with emotion, faltered, and, unable to finish it, he sank back upon the sofa. It was prophetic; in five weeks thereafter a vast concourse accompanied his remains to the Newton cemetery, where they repose,—the only minister's body in that field of graves."

* The amount due the Rev. Mr. Condit was not fully paid until 1818, or after his death.

† "He was," says the Rev. Dr. Junkin (in his anniversary address before Newton Presbytery, in 1867), "a man of very venerable appearance,—tall, partly, of a very fair and healthy complexion, and when I first saw him his locks were white with age. He was a man of no mean ability, and was in early life and in his prime a very popular preacher. His manners were bland and attractive, and he had the faculty of attaching the people of his charge very strongly to him. This was evidenced by their devotion to him when, . . . in 1827, he declared independence of the Presbytery, and ultimately went with his congregations, Bethlehem and Alexandria, to the New School branch of the Church."

gations should be discharged. This was done, except a claim of Judge Howell, which was settled in 1847, the claimant himself generously subscribing towards its payment. Again, for a short time, the church was free from debt; but after Dr. Shafer's return arrears began to accumulate, so that at his death, in 1853, a balance of over $1000 was due him, which was extinguished before 1854. Since that time the pastors' salaries have been promptly and fully paid.

The Rev. Daniel M. Barber served the church from 1835 to 1838, when the Rev. Mr. Shafer was recalled, as has been intimated. The latter's successor was Rev. Myron Barrett, who came in 1854 and served until 1859, when he was followed by the Rev. George S. Mott, D.D.,* now of Flemington, N. J. He remained until January, 1869, and was succeeded by Rev. Theodore Byington, who was installed in May of that year. He resigned his charge in October, 1874, and went to Bulgaria, Turkey.

During this year (1869) was commenced the erection of the present fine edifice,—the third which has occupied the same site. The corner-stone was laid August 19th, with appropriate exercises, in the presence of a large assemblage. There were present the Revs. A. A. Haines, Myron Barrett, Joel Campbell, T. B. Condit, J. F. Smith, George S. Mott, and T. L. Byington. In May, 1871, it was dedicated to the worship of God. Its architecture is of the Ionic order,—plain and substantial, but beautiful. In size it is 64 by 98 feet, with a tower 20 feet square, projecting 6 feet, and 54 feet in height, surmounted by an elegant spire 124 feet high, making the total height of the steeple 178 feet. The walls are of stone, with six pilasters on either side; the ceiling of the auditorium is 30 feet high, and galleries surround it on three sides. It cost about $50,000, and will seat 1000 persons.

Rev. Mr. Byington's successor was Rev. J. Addison Priest, D.D.; he was installed as pastor in March, 1875, and served the church until the spring of 1880, when he resigned his charge. In January, 1881, the Rev. Eugene C. Olney, of Grand Rapids, Mich., was called; he accepted, and is now officiating.

Henry Johnson was one of the first elders, and a most active member. The Griggs family have been represented in the Sessions for about sixty years.† Daniel Griggs united with the church in 1826, was ordained elder in 1830, and acted as such until his death, in August, 1868. The elders in 1867 were Daniel Griggs, Martin Ryerson, Thomas Ryerson, David R. Hull, John Linn, Samuel Johnson, Stockton H. Schafer, and W. P. Coursen. The present board of deacons is composed of Henry J. Rudd, President; Jonathan Havens, Secretary; L. D. Rosenkrans, Treasurer; and Philip J. Hardin.

The membership of the church at the present time is about 350.

The present board of elders is composed of Thomas Ryerson, David L. Foster, David R. Hull, Samuel Johnson, William P. Coursen, James W. Lewis. Present trustees, H. W. Merriam, Oliver P. Woodford, W. W. Woodward, William McMurtry, Martin Rosenkrans, Ira C. Moore, and Charles D. Thompson.

The Sabbath-school of the Presbyterian Church was started between the years 1816 and 1818, in the old academy building, and was taught entirely by the ladies of the congregation,—Misses Nancy Howell, Sarah Vanderan, Susan Johnson, and others. In 1830 it was removed to the academy building on Division Street, since torn down, and there met until 1848, after which it held its sessions in the church, first in the galleries, and later in the body of the audience-room. During the most of the time for twenty years prior to 1855 it was conducted by the late Whitfield S. Johnson. In 1856 the school was reorganized and a constitution and by-laws adopted. Since that time the superintendents have been: 1856-57, W. P. Nicholas; 1858 (six months), Thomas Ryerson; 1859-60, T. H. Shafer; 1861, Martin Ryerson; 1862, Samuel Johnson; 1863-64, T. N. McCarter; 1865-67, J. Coult; 1868-81, David R. Hull. The "infant class" was started June 22, 1856, by Mrs. David Thompson. In 1872 the school had increased to 35 teachers and 395 scholars. At the present time the school numbers about 300 members.

For convenience of reference the following tabulated list of pastors and elders is given:

Pastors.—1787-93, Rev. Ira Condit; 1795-1802, Rev. Holloway Hunt; 1803-11, Rev. John Boyd; 1812-35, Rev. Joseph L. Shafer; 1836-38, Rev. Daniel Barber; 1838-53, Rev. Joseph Shafer, D.D.; 1854-59, Rev. Myron Barrett; 1859-69, Rev. George S. Mott; 1869-74, Rev. Theodore L. Byington; 1875-80, Rev. J. Addison Priest, D.D.; 1881, Rev. Eugene C. Olney.

Elders.—1812, Henry Johnson (died 1826), Benjamin Griggs (died 1825), Abraham Gulick (removed 1814), John B. Miller (dismissed 1839); 1830, Daniel Griggs (died 1868), John Trusdell (died 1852), Richard Brant (dismissed 1842); 1847, John Nyce (dismissed 1852), John Stephens (dismissed 1850); 1855, William Hunt (died 1860), Whitfield S. Johnson (dismissed 1863); 1857, J. Sandford Smith (entered ministry 1859), Martin Ryerson (died June 11, 1875); 1862, Thomas Ryerson, Samuel Johnson, David R. Hull; 1865, S. Halsted Shafer (died Jan. 10, 1877); John Linn (removed to Jersey City), William P. Coursen; 1877, David L. Foster, James W. Lewis.

REV. MYRON BARRETT.

The progenitor of the Barrett family from whom the subject of this sketch is descended was Humphrey Barrett, who came from England and settled in Concord, N. H., in 1640. He had a son, Hon. Charles Barrett, and a nephew, Amos Dakin.

The great-grandfather of Mr. Barrett was Ezekiel, of Concord, N. H. His grandfather, Ezekiel, born at Concord, Sept. 17, 1742, settled in Norwich, Conn., where he married Sarah Lathrop, July 7, 1773; both died there. He died Feb. 10, 1839; his wife, Oct. 27, 1811, in the sixty-third year of her age. Their children were Mary, Ezra Lathrop, and Backus and Oliver, twins. Mary was never married, and died at North East, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1843, in her sixty-ninth year. Backus married Mary Rundle, and settled at Stillwater, in Saratoga Co., N. Y., where both he and his wife died; their children were Henry, Ezekiel, Catharine, Sarah, Mary, and Laura. Oliver settled in Brooklyn, N. Y.; he married late in life, but had no children.

Ezra Lathrop, father of our subject, was born at Norwich, Conn., Sept. 27, 1775, and settled in the township of North East, Dutchess Co., N. Y., where he married Rhoda Dakin; both died there,—the former Nov. 18, 1857, the latter May 23, 1860, in the eighty-first year of her age. Her grandfather was Rev. Simon Dakin, one of the earliest Baptist ministers in America, and resided in Dutchess Co., N. Y. The children of Ezra Lathrop Barrett were Sarah Louisa, Caleb Dakin, Edward Lathrop, Myron, and Oliver.

Rev. Myron Barrett, our subject, son of Ezra Lathrop Barrett, was born at North East, N. Y., Sept. 19, 1816. He prepared for college at Burr Seminary, Manchester, Vt., and was graduated at Yale in the class of '41. He taught school at Columbus, Ohio, during the next four years. He was converted during the last year of his college life, but did not decide to study for the ministry until after he began teaching at Columbus. He commenced his theological studies at the Union Theological Seminary in New York City, but went from there to Princeton, where he remained one year, and was graduated in 1851. His only pastorate before he came to Newton was at Pontiac, Mich., though he had during the fifteen months previous been preaching for Dr. Dufield, of Detroit, who was absent in Europe.

Mr. Barrett was pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Newton from 1854 until May, 1859, when he resigned his position. He afterwards acted as assistant to Rev. Mr. Carroll, of the South Church, New Haven, Conn., for one year, and preached at Stroudsburg, Pa., one year. He was a trustee of the Newton Collegiate Institute from 1868 and secretary and treasurer of the same from 1871 until his death, which occurred May 8, 1876.

The presbytery which examined Mr. Barrett before he was appointed pastor of the church in Newton was composed of Old-School Presbyterians of the bluest kind, and, as Mr. Barrett was not educated under their supervision, they suspected that he might have New School tendencies, and questioned very deeply concerning the finer points of doctrine. Though he held his own opinion, he had closely studied the views of leading divines, and quoted them in reply to the presbytery's questions, and in so doing he revealed the index of his future life. He never pressed his own views if he thought by so doing he might weaken the progress of a good cause, and the opinions of others were more in harmony with those for whose welfare he was working. He had made the expression of his thoughts in as few and terse words as possible a study, and has sent many a telling letter after this style into the newspapers which none ever suspected came from his pen. He was a man of broad and liberal views, and took a deep interest in every question of public importance, and especially in that of education. He was one of the most active among the trustees of the collegiate institute, and was continually making plans for its greater efficiency. He was so thoroughly identified with the Dennis Library, at Newton, that he seemed to be almost the library itself, and he was sadly missed from both institutions.

His zeal for the welfare of the people was not confined to the village in which he resided, as, though not obliged to do so for his support, he preached temporarily at Andover, at Clove, and at other places. His sympathetic enthusiasm in matters that interested his friends was such that their affection and regard for him increased with better acquaintance. By his decease the town lost a most useful citizen, the public institutions with which he was connected were deprived of a strong pillar, and his family and friends were called upon to mourn the departure of one whose counsel and sympathy were missed.

His wife was Miss Emma E., daughter of the late David Ryerson, for many years one of the most prominent business men of Newton and Sussex County. She was born June 7, 1821, and was married to Mr. Barrett April 8, 1856. Their children are David R., died at the age of fifteen; Andrew L., a student at Princeton College, entered in September, 1878; and Sarah Louisa.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.*

The germ of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Newton was planted in a sermon preached about 1800 in a house then standing in the neighborhood of Drake's pond. The Methodist pioneer in this section was the Rev. Robert McCoy, of the Philadelphia Conference. At intervals during a period of about ten years occasional services were held, but no attempt at permanent organization of a society was made.

In 1811, under the Rev. Messrs. Reed, and George Banghart, the first class was formed in this section, and Mr. James Hiff appointed leader. This was the first definite organization, and out of that class the Methodist Episcopal Church grew. About 1817 the appointment was changed from the residence of Mr. Ingersoll to the court-house, in the village of Newton. Through the kindness of the jailer, the court-house was opened for the services, the Rev. Benjamin Collins being the preacher in charge.

At this time the services were held on a weeknight, and only about once in two weeks. In 1817 the further advance was made of holding them on the Sabbath. The question of a building for the services was answered in securing the barn of Maj. W. T. Anderson, on the Springdale road, a few rods from where now stands the Baptist church.

The Sabbath appointment met with varying success and some interruptions until 1823, when it was made permanent, under the charge of Revs. William A. Wiggins and Daniel Best of the Hamburg circuit, in which Newton had been included. By kindness of the officer in charge of the building, the court-house was again opened to them, and the services were held until the building of a church edifice.

The following preachers had charge until 1859:

1824, George Banghart, David Wiltshire; 1825, George Banghart, John K. Shaw; 1826, Benjamin Collins, John K. Shaw; 1827, Benjamin Collins, James Loog; 1828, James Dandy, James V. Potts; 1829, James Dandy, James Lawton; 1830, Jacob Hevener, James M. Laurin; 1834, Caleb A. Lippincott; 1835, Jacob Hevener, P. W. Blair; 1836, Sedgwick Rusling, C. S. Van Cleave; 1837, Sedgwick Rusling, Richard Lanting; 1838, John S. Swain, William Burrongs; 1839, John S. Swain, E. B. Wilkinson; 1840, Edward Sanders, G. A. Wharton; 1841, P. D. Day, Edward Sanders; 1842, John A. Crane, J. D. Blain; 1843, John A. Crane, Reuben Van Syckle; 1844-45, George Winsor; 1846-47, Benjamin Kelley; 1848, Samuel D. Laughhead; 1849, Richard Van Horn, Richard Brookfield; 1850, Richard Van Horn, Thomas Walters; 1851, Martin Herr, Rev. Ackerman; 1852, Martin Herr, David Walters; 1853, Thomas H. Smith, Thomas Rawlings; 1854, Thomas H. Smith, George F. Dickinson; 1855, William M. Burrongs, J. Lawton; 1856, William M. Burrongs, Caleb Malsbury; 1857, John Faulstich; 1858, Rodney Wiggins; 1859, Cornelius Clark.

In 1831, James Ayres, Abraham Gerhart, and George Brown officiated, Newton being at this time included in a six weeks' circuit. During this year Rev. George Brown was removed to New Province, and his place supplied by Rev. P. D. Day. In 1832, Newton was detached from the Hamburg district, the pastors being James Ayres and Bromwell Andrew. During this year the idea of building a church edifice was definitely advanced. A lot was purchased, on what is now known as Coon Street, for the sum of $100, and contracts made for the building of a church, to cost $2000. After many delays, the structure was completed about two years after the purchase of the lot, the dedication service being held Feb. 15, 1834.

A new church building had long been talked of, and it was decided that the time had come for moving definitely in the matter. The lot on which the present church edifice stands was secured. The work of obtaining subscriptions proceeded, and a few weeks after the Conference of 1859 the contracts were given out. On the 20th of July, at 3 P. M., the corner-stone of the new church was laid, addresses being made by Rev. C. S. Vaneleve and Rev. Dr. Bartine, of Philadelphia. When the walls were all up the building committee told the builders that the work had not been done according to contract. An inspector was appointed, and as the result the walls were torn down level to the foundation. They went up again, but further hindrance put a stop to the work, and nothing was done all winter. In the spring the work was renewed, and when the building was about ready for occupancy the contractor refused to work further, and, under the claim that he had not been paid, locked the door, took the key, and held possession of the property. Legal advice was taken, and, after assurance that the right as well as the law was on their side, a committee, in connection with the male membership of the church, after determined resolutions, in which they fully expressed their purpose, went in a body and took possession of the church. A committee was appointed to attend to the work of completing the building, and after many new difficulties the dedication service was held Saturday, March 23, 1861, in a blinding, drifting snow-storm, Dr. Bartine preaching in the morning, and Rev. R. L. Dashiell in the evening.

At the Conference of 1861, Rev. Cornelius Clark was succeeded by Rev. R. B. Lockwood, who remained till 1863, when he was followed by Rev. George Whitney, who remained until 1866.

During the pastorate of the Rev. George H. Whitney the church paid its entire indebtedness on the building and purchased the present parsonage property. Since then the church has had the following pastors:

R. B. Yard, to 1867; J. N. Fitzgerald, to 1870; C. C. Wiggins, to 1873; J. I. Boswell, to 1876; J. I. Morrow, to 1878; David Walters, to 1880.

S. H. Opdyke succeeded David Walters in 1880 and died in October of the same year. His unexpired term was filled by Rev. M. D. Church, by appointment of the presiding elder.

THE NEWTON BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1835, and recognized as the "Second Baptist Church of Newton," by a Council, on the 18th of June of the same year, with the following constituent members:

All of the above are dead.

|| "Agreed to receive the letter and messenger sent from the church recently constituted in Newtown, Sussex Co., N. J., in union with this Association. William Marsh their minister."

This is an extract from the minutes of the Philadelphia Association, in 1757. The church here referred to was the parent of the one in the village, and was located near Augusta. It was organized Nov. 14, 1756, with eight members, and was known as the "First Newton Baptist Church." William Marsh preached in 1756, but the church had no settled pastor until 1771, when Nicholas Cox was ordained. In 1776 it had 80 members after which its membership gradually decreased. Rev. Mr. Cox was succeeded in 1783 by Rev. James Finn, 76 members; Rev. Silas Southworth 1787. In 1790 it merged with the Wantage Church, and went by the latter name.

* From this time Newton became a separate appointment with one preacher.

† This year Tranquillity was added to the circuit.

‡ The latter left during the year, and his place was supplied by J. W. Hoff.

§ This year Tranquillity was detached and but one pastor appointed.

Thirteen pastors have served this church,—viz :

John Teasdale, from organization until Sept. 26, 1835; Thomas Teasdale, from Sept. 26, 1835, to March 28, 1849; J. F. Jones, Aug. 8, 1843, to 1846; Samuel Morland (supply), Nov. 6, 1847; Thomas Davis, July 21, 1848, to March 13, 1850; J. M. Cochran, Nov. 28, 1852, to Jan. 28, 1854; Henry B. Shermer, Jan. 17, 1857, to Nov. 30, 1860; Levi Morse, June 8, 1862, to Aug. 8, 1867; A. D. Williffler, Jan. 1, 1868, to Oct. 10, 1869; John T. Craig, Dec. 19, 1869, to May 31, 1874; Simeon Seagrifield, July 19, 1874, to Aug. 19, 1875; J. L. Davis, Oct. 23, 1875, to Oct. 20, 1878; Ernest Thompson, Dec. 1, 1878, present pastor.

The membership of the church has been of changing character, never exceeding at any one time over 150, and that number secured during the pastorate of Rev. John T. Craig. Of the pastors seven are still living.

The present officers of the church are: Pastor, Rev. Ernest Thompson; Clerk, E. J. Crissey; Deacons, B. H. Hand, Moses Northrup, and Dr. P. N. Jacobus.

CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Tradition holds that Catholicity was introduced in Sussex County by some of the first settlers of Newton, who came from Ireland before the Revolution of 1776. There are still about Newton some of their descendants, who bear their name, but not their faith. This may be explained by the scarcity and almost absence of priests in American colonial times. According to the Catholic system the priest is essential to his people, encouraging their faith by the sacrifice of the altar and the sacraments.

Coming to historic fact, about the year 1821, Rev. F. Bulger, resident at Paterson, there attended the spiritual wants of his few and scattered flock. Occasional visits to Sussex County were in after-years made by Rev. John Callan, of Dover, Rev. L. Seney, the Rt. Rev. B. J. McQuaid, the present bishop of Rochester, N. Y., and Rev. M. A. Madden.

Rev. Philip McMahon became the first resident pastor at Newton, in 1854. The old frame church in Newton was erected, at a cost of $1400, under his administration.

Father McMahon continued his labors in the county until the fall of 1857, when he was succeeded by Rev. James McKay. Father McKay endeared himself to the people of all creeds by his eloquence and amiability. After a pastorate of four years he was promoted to the charge of the church in Orange, N. J., and during the civil war retired to his home in Ireland, where he still works in the master's vineyard.

In 1861 the Rev. Edward McCosker took charge. By his zeal and well-directed efforts he erected the present brick church in Franklin Furnace in 1864, and in a short time gave it to God free from man's claim upon it.

In 1871 the handsome brick church of St. Joseph in Newton was opened for worshippers by the Rt. Rev. James Roosevelt Bayley, bishop of Newark, and lately deceased archbishop of Baltimore. It was an undertaking sufficient to deter any pastor. The Catholics were few and generally of humble means, but their generous non-Catholic townspeople assisted them in erecting their tasteful church. Its location is most desirable. Its cost, with the property, was $19,000, and at present but a small debt remains. A handsome brick parochial residence was also erected a few years after.

During the administration of Father McCosker missions were established at Andover, Hunt's Mills, Branchville, Deckertown, Franklin Furnace, and at several other points. In the summer of 1880 he was removed, at his own request, to Rahway, N. J., where he continues his missionary labors. During his long pastorate he underwent many hardships in providing for his flock, and gained the respect and esteem of the whole community by his self-sacrificing and religious spirit.

On account of the growth and increase of Catholicity in the county two priests now divide the labor. Two additional churches, at Deckertown and Ogdensburg, are now being built, and renewed efforts are made to keep alive the faith in the hearts of all the Catholics of Sussex County.

VI.—SCHOOLS.

On the Easton road, where now is the corner of Liberty and High Streets, stood in the early days an old log school-house. It was erected during the past century, but in what year is not known. Pemberton Britton's mother, who was born in 1781, went to school in the "old log" house when she was quite young,—about 1789.

The late Rev. Clarkson Dunn, rector of Christ Church, established a small classical school in Newton, in 1825, in the old Episcopal rectory on the hill. "This school, though small in numbers, was conducted with dignity, taste, and propriety, and attended with success. The fruits of this early-planted tree of education were such cultivated minds as the late Hon. Martin Ryerson, Dr. Thomas Ryerson, Rev. N. Pettit, and numerous others." William Rankin, one of the pioneer educators of Sussex, who had been teaching a select school at the Clove, removed to Newton in 1828-29, and became the English teacher of Mr. Dunn's school, while the rector himself taught the classics. Mr. Rankin remained for a year or two, then went to New England and entered Yale College; in 1833 he returned to New Jersey and founded his school at Deckertown, which became quite famous and was an important factor for good in this part of the State.

The old Newton academy building was erected in 1802, on a lot donated by Jonathan Hampton for school purposes, but now occupied by W. P. Nicholas, Esq. Here, in this steeple-crowned edifice, the academy flourished for many years, and until the building was traded by the trustees, in 1829, to Judge John H. Hall, for a property which is now known as the old academy, in Division Street. At the new location more land was obtained and a new building erected.

Samuel Tuttle, Medad Raymond, Benjamin McCarter, and a Mr. Andrews were among the teachers in this school. The academy on "Coon" (now Division) Street was occupied as a school until the spring of 1868, when Henry D. Chapin was teacher. The select (paid) schools, taught respectively by Miss Agnes McCarter and Katy Leport, were in July, 1868, suspended on account of change in the school laws establishing the free-school system.*

In the house now occupied by Thomas G. Bunnell, Esq., on High Street (it was built about the time of the Revolution), Mrs. Elizabeth Stinson taught an infant school about the year 1800. Among her pupils were Dr. Franklin Smith, ex-Judge Daniel S. Anderson, Charles P. Rorbach, Charles Morford, and others.

The present public-school building, located on Halsted Street, upon the heights near the Sussex depot, was erected in 1869 and 1870 at a cost of $26,000.† It is 64 by 100 feet, 3 stories high exclusive of basement, and is constructed of pressed brick and limestone, with Newark brownstone dressings. J. D. Daly was the architect, and Messrs. Hoppage & Moore, of Newton, the builders. The grounds upon which it is built are spacious, inclosed, trees planted, and walks laid out. Trustees in 1868, Robert Hamilton, Moses Northrup, and Rutherford Tuttle. No schools were held in 1868 (after July) or in '69. The first principal in the new building was Elisha M. Allen, 1870-79; he was succeeded by Frank Transue, the present incumbent. The trustees at the present time (1881) are Jacob L. Swayze, Henry M. Ward, and Rutherford Tuttle.

The corps of assistant teachers in 1870 was as follows: Misses Kate Leport, Kittie Trusdell, Theresa Badgley, Carrie V. Hamilton, Annie J. Gustin, Agnes Hallock, Sarah Ribble, Eva Couse. At the present time (1881) the teachers employed are Jennie Hand, Sarah Ribble, Maggie Franks, Hattie Ridgeway, Anna Bryan, Annie Nichols, Emma Rycerson, Ellen Connel, Stella Smith.

Since the present school building was erected, in 1870, the salary of the principal has ranged from $600 to $1500 per annum, starting at $1000, rising to $1500, and falling back to $600. During the same period the salaries of the assistants have varied from $17.50 to $40 per month, the average at the present time being about $30.

The number of children of school age in the district in 1880 is given at 718; the number enrolled on the school register was 465. School was taught ten and a quarter months during the year, and the average attendance was 297 pupils.

* Another school of considerable notoriety in its time was the "Female Seminary," started by the Misses Linn, and continued until 1861. It was a most deserving and successful institution, and its discontinuance was not from any want of patronage.

† This does not include the cost of four heaters, which aggregate $1600, the furniture, which cost $100, and the grounds, grading, etc., $4500,—a total of $35,200.

The receipts and expenditures for the year ending March 1, 1880, were:

State appropriation.....	$161.13
Surplus revenue.....	161.12
District tax.....	3750.08
Two-mills tax.....	1642.20
From Hampton township.....	603.81
	$6218.26
Total school expenditures.....	$3770.12

Of the latter amount, $2962.51 was paid for teachers' salaries; $276.43 for fuel; $77.88 for repairs; $453.30, incidental expenses.‡

THE NEWTON COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.

This institution was organized April 5, 1850, and incorporated Feb. 12, 1852, as the "Presbyterial Academy at Newton." It was then, and until 1856, under the direction of the Presbytery of Newton. In the year last named the title of the school was changed, by legislative enactment, to "The Newton Collegiate Institute." A boarding-house was erected, at a cost of $4000, on grounds adjoining the school edifice. The buildings were repaired in 1865.

The institute buildings were on lands formerly owned by William Beach, and the school was first started under the management of Rev. James I. Helm, and afterwards continued by Rev. Baker Johnson.

Other principals have been Rev. William Travis, W. A. Magill, A.M. (about 1869), J. Sanford Smith, Chester Teel, etc.; it is at present under the management of Prof. S. S. Stevens.

This school was first started in a building erected by John S. Potvine, and now owned by W. W. Woodward. Later it was removed to a new edifice on the hill.

There is at the present time a select school for small children taught by Misses Moore and Rorbach. It is located on Halsted Street, in the vicinity of the public school.

VII.—SOCIETIES AND CORPORATIONS.

There have been from time to time various secret organizations in Newton, but the only order now represented in the town is the Masonic, the first lodge of which was instituted in June, 1788, and was known as

HARMONY LODGE, No. 8, A. F. AND A. M.

The details of its history are as follows:

A petition was sent to the Right Worshipful Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey, June 19, 1788, by Thomas Anderson, Samuel Kennedy, John Holmes, Mark Thomson, Edward Dunlop, John J. Hendrie, and John Johnson, praying for a warrant to establish a lodge in Sussex County, in which memorial they asserted they were "not within cable-tow of any warranted lodge." A warrant of dispensation for the period of three months was granted to Thomas Anderson by the late David Brearly, Grand Master, on June 24, 1788, to "congregate the brethren together and form them into a regular lodge." On the 23d of June of the same year the Grand Lodge issued the charter which constituted "Brother Thomas Anderson, Esq., Counsellor-at-law of Sussex, Master, Dr. Samuel Kennedy Senior Warden, and Mr. John Holmes Junior Warden, of a lodge of Ancient York Masons to be known and distinguished by the name of Harmony Lodge, No. 8, with full powers to hold their lodge in Newton," etc. The only lodges in the State at that time were "Solomon," No. 1, at Pluckamin, Somerset Co.; "St. John's," No. 2, Newark; "Trinity," No. 3, Freehold; "Hiram," No. 4, Morristown; "Trenton," No. 5, Trenton; "Essex," No. 6, Hackensack; and "Unity," No. 7, at Kingwood, in Hunterdon County,—seven lodges only that were older than old "Harmony."

In 1808 authority was given by the grand body for Harmony Lodge to meet alternately in the townships of Newton and Hardwick, but it ceased to hold its sessions at Marksborough after March, 1811.

The first meeting of Harmony was held at the house of Jonathan Willis, July 16, 1788, at which was present the three brothers named in the charter, Edward Dunlop, Secretary, and Joseph Hendrie. Jonathan Willis was the first candidate initiated in the lodge.

The following served as its principal officers after the year of institution:

Senior Warden.—1789-91, John Holmes; 1792, Jonathan Willis; 1793, Mark Thomson; 1794-95, Thomas Armstrong; 1796-97, John Johnson; 1798, Anthony Spier; 1799, Van Tile Cousen; 1800, Jonathan Johnson; 1801, Robert C. Thomson; 1802-5, Joseph I. Hendrie; 1806-7, Jacob Stewart; 1808, Stephen Strong; 1809-11, Jacob Stewart; 1812-13, Henry M. Miller; 1814-15, Samuel Johnson.

Junior Warden.—1789, Timothy Symmes; 1790, John Johnson; 1791, Joseph I. Hendrie; 1792, Abraham Bailey; 1793-94, Charles Barshlee; 1795, William Coe; 1796-97, Anthony Spier; 1798, Joseph I. Hendrie; 1799, Samuel Johnson; 1800, Robert C. Thomson; 1801, Joseph I. Hendrie; 1802-5, William Johns; 1806-10, Samuel Johnson; 1811-12, Thomas O. Anderson; 1813-15, Peter B. Shaver.

The last preserved record is the minute of a stated meeting held Oct. 16, 1815. On that occasion there were present Brothers John Johnson, W. M.; Samuel Johnson, S. W.; David Kerr, J. W. (pro tem.); Joseph Y. Miller, Treas.; Amos Bassett, Tyler; Joseph I. Roy, and Jacob Armstrong. Particular notice had previously been given of this meeting by the lodge, and by publication in the Sussex Register. "This being the meeting," says the record, "to consider of the question and finally decide on the expediency of giving up our warrant to the Grand Lodge; whereupon the lodge . . . unanimously agree, and it is accordingly ordered, that our warrant be surrendered, and that the funds of the lodge be settled and divided as our by-laws require." Among the members of this ancient lodge who were particularly distinguished and useful in public capacities may be mentioned the first Master, Thomas Anderson, occupying a front rank in the bar of the State; Col. Mark Thomson and Peter Merkle, both members of the Legislature, etc.; John Holmes and John Johnson, efficient on the bench as judges; Gen. Thomas Armstrong, a prominent Revolutionary patriot and officer; and Lieut. Thomas O. Anderson, who in the navy assisted the gallant Decatur to destroy the "Philadelphia" in the harbor of Tripoli.

The lodge held its sessions at the hotel of Brother Isaac Bassett. During its existence many of the Masonic anniversaries were commemorated, among others the celebration of St. John's day, on the 24th of June, 1809, by a joint meeting of Harmony and Olive Branch Lodge, No. 16, at Hope, N. J. Among those of the latter organization who participated were Gen. Jona. Hill, Maj. Hayes (P. M.), Capt. Chas. McHenry, Gen. Abr. Horne, Thomas Bullman (Master), George Wolf, Esq. (S. W.), Dr. Jacob Reese (Tyler), Maj. Barthold, Capt. D. Swayze, Capt. John Kinney, Hyman McMiller (V. Bro.), and C. Dusenberry, Orator. Those present from No. 8 were Brothers John Johnson, Jacob Stewart, Capt. Samuel Johnson, Isaac Bassett, Dr. Palmer, Maj. Jacob Kerr, Peter Smith, Dr. Marvin, Dr. Hendrie, Jacob D. Howell, Capt. John Mackey, James Ryerson, Capt. R. Courson, Theophilus Phillips, Adam Hibler, Ephraim Green, Jr., James Kinney, and Amos Bassett.

Others than those who have been already mentioned who were members of Harmony, No. 8, were Samuel Hull (2d), Jacob Norcross, Joseph M. Schoonover, Jacob Bale, Christopher Longstreet, Dr. S. Little, Christopher Case, James Haggerty, Nehemiah Broderick, Charles Lamb, Rev. Holloway W. Hunt, Jesse Holly, Daniel Pierson, John Larrabee, Thomas Paul, John Coolbaugh, David Reynolds, Robert Morrison, James Beatty, Samuel De Puy, Robert Hoops, Henry Hoffman, Isaac Willis, Henry Cherry, Benjamin Barton, Eugene McFarland, James Hyndshaw, Cyrus Beckwith, John Carson, Charles Croxall, John Brodhead, Moses Moore, Jacob De Witt, Stephen Potts, Robert Morrison, Wilson Carman, Alexander Rea, Adam Runkle, Charles Rhodes, Jr., Dreel Hopkins, George R. King, Jesse Carkhuff, Peter Merkel, etc.,—representing all portions of Sussex and Warren. The last-named member, a resident of Stillwater, was an Entered Apprentice Feb. 15, 1813, passed March 15th, and raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason April 12th of the same year; and at the time of his demise, Nov. 13, 1874, it is said he was not only the oldest member of the fraternity in the county, but the only survivor of old No. 8 out of over 100 members.

The charter was surrendered, as before stated, in 1815. After an interregnum of three years the lodge was resuscitated, the warrant having been restored

Nov. 9, 1819. But, unfortunately, the minutes have not been preserved. The Grand Lodge records show that the following served as Masters:

1821, Peter B. Shafer; 1822-23, Robert A. Linn; 1824, Joseph Y. Miller; 1825-26, William Beach; 1827, Gen. Lyman Edwards; 1828, Thomas A. Dildine.

In the last-named year the lodge suspended, and was not represented in the grand body for thirteen years. Twenty-four years later it was succeeded by

HARMONY LODGE, No. 23, A. F. AND A. M.

It was instituted, under dispensation, April 15, 1852, at the Cochran House, with Gen. Lyman Edwards, Worshipful Master; Ira Beach, Senior Warden; William Beach, Junior Warden, pro tempore. John Beach was the first initiate. Jan. 1, 1853, a charter was granted, the lodge having worked over eight months under dispensation. The meetings were first held in a room at the Cochran House, later over a store, and for six years in the third story of the brick building of Dr. J. R. Stuart. In August, 1864, all its furniture and property, except the charter and records, was destroyed by fire. They temporarily met elsewhere, but, the sum of $1500 being promptly raised, they refurbished their hall. They also suffered some from one or two other fires. About 1873 the Masonic hall was established in the upper story of the brick building owned by Jacob L. Swayze, corner of Spring and Moran Streets.

Its officers since 1852 have been as follows:

Worthy Master.—1853, Lyman Edwards; 1854, John Hunt; 1855, Benjamin Stewart; 1856, Walter Johnson; 1857, David N. Deazley; 1858, Nathaniel Pettit; 1859, John R. Stuart; 1860, D. N. Deazley; 1861, John Hunt; 1862, R. A. Sheppard; 1863, Andrew J. Rogers; 1864, Isaac S. Hunt; 1865, Nathaniel Pettit; 1866, W. H. Hagaman; 1867-68, John T. Stewart; 1869, William H. Hagaman; 1870-72, John T. Stewart; 1873-75, George Hardin; 1876, William E. Ross; 1877, George Hardin; 1878-79, Oscar C. Laing; 1880-81, A. J. Bale.

Senior Warden.—1853, John Hunt; 1854, Benjamin Stewart; 1855, Walter Johnson; 1856, David N. Deazley; 1857, Nathaniel Pettit; 1858, John R. Stuart; 1859, D. N. Deazley; 1860-61, R. A. Sheppard; 1862, Andrew J. Rogers; 1863, Isaac S. Hunt; 1864, William H. Hagaman; 1865, Hiram C. Clark; 1866, J. T. Stewart; 1867, Theodore Morford; 1868, G. B. Dunning; 1869, J. P. Edgerton; 1870, G. B. Dunning; 1871, F. M. Hough; 1872, George Hardin; 1873-74, Robert T. Johnson; 1875-78, Simon S. Cook; 1879, A. J. Bale; 1880-81, Thomas Decker.

Junior Warden.—1853, Benjamin Stewart; 1854, Walter Johnson; 1855, David N. Deazley; 1856, C. B. Yetman; 1857, M. Cochran, Jr.; 1858, Gerald Howett; 1859, Gabriel Post; 1860, C. Crook; 1861, Theodore Morford; 1862, Thomas Anderson; 1863, Joseph S. Hunt; 1864, E. D. Goodrich; 1865, Jacob A. Cousen; 1866, Fem. B. Horton; 1867, G. B. Dunning; 1868, J. P. Edgerton; 1869, Wallace Myers; 1870, Frank M. Hough; 1871-72, Robert T. Johnson; 1873, Ira S. Bigger; 1874, Andrew I. Van Blarcom; 1875, William E. Ross; 1876, James W. Cizgar; 1877, Oscar C. Laing; 1878-79, Benjamin E. Knox; 1880, D. F. Decker; 1881, M. B. Snyder.

The other officers for 1881 are A. F. Fellows, Treas.; J. S. Newman, Sec.; Andrew J. Van Blarcom, S. D.; John Pinkney, J. D.; G. R. Leport and D. F. Decker, M. C.; L. H. Trusdell, Tyler; A. H. Bunnell, J. T. Stewart, and R. F. Goodman, Trustees.

The lodge numbers 159 members in good standing.

BALDWIN CHAPTER, No. 17, R. A. M.

This chapter of the Royal Arch branch of Masonry was instituted in Newton in January, 1867, by Grand High Priest Israel Baldwin, of Newark, in whose honor it was named. G. H. P. Baldwin always manifested a great interest in this organization in various and practical ways, one of which was the presentation to it of an extremely beautiful and very valuable High Priest's breastplate, whose setting of precious stones is undoubtedly equal to any in the State.

Its convocations are held monthly in Masonic Hall. Officers are elected at the December convocation. Its first officers were: M.: E.: W. H. Hagaman, High Priest; E.: Theodore Morford, King; E.: H. M. Ward, Scribe; P. B. Horton, Capt. of Host; Jonathan Havens, Prin. Soj.; D. L. Wyckoff, R. A. Capt.; Jesse Ward, M. 3d Veil; S. J. Coarsen, M. 2d Veil; E. D. Goodrich, M. 1st Veil; Theo. Morford, Treas.; Thos. C. Elston, Sec.; R. B. Westbrook, Chaplain; Aaron H. Bonnell, Sentinel; J. R. Stuart, Thos. Anderson, Trustees.

The principal officers of the chapter since that date have been as follows:

High Priest.—1868, Theodore Morford; 1869-71, Jonathan Havens; 1872, Theodore Morford; 1873-81, John T. Stewart.

King.—1868-70, William H. Hagaman; 1871, Theodore Morford; 1872-74, Jonathan Havens; 1875, Oscar C. Laing; 1876, Thomas G. Bunnell; 1878-81, Wallace Myers.

Scribe.—1868, Henry M. Ward; 1869-73, Benjamin Stewart; 1874-76, Wallace Myers; 1877-78, James W. Cizgar; 1879-81, Aaron H. Bunnell.

Bro. John T. Stewart was District Deputy Grand Master of the Fourth Masonic District, embracing fifteen lodges in the northwestern part of the State, in 1876.

THE SUSSEX BANK.

This institution was chartered Jan. 31, 1818, with an authorized capital of $100,000. The first board of directors, elected June 8, 1818, was composed of the following named gentlemen: Daniel Stuart, William T. Anderson, Job S. Halsted, James Stoll, Grant Fitch, Ephraim Green, Jr., John Gustin, John Armstrong, David Ford, Gershom Coursen, and David Ryerson,—all men of note in their day, and probably among the best business men at that time in the county. In the course of years, as their places became vacant by resignation and death, they were filled by other men from among our citizens, among whom were Nathaniel A. Shafer, George H. McCarter, Pettit Britton, Peter W. Blair, John H. Hall, G. Fritts, Cornelius Smith, Ephraim G. Coursen, Elias Mushback, Charles Munson, Jonathan Whitaker, Robert H. McCarter, David Thompson, Stephen Hedges, Robert A. Linn, Martin Ryerson, Aaron H. Kelsey, James R. Hall, Henry McDanolds, John H. Nelden, George M. Ryerson, J. N. McCremond, Thomas N. McCarter, Robert Hamilton, Thomas Lawrence, David M. Sayre, James H. Struble, A. H. Kelsey, William McDanolds, Charles V. Moore, James B. Huston, John D. Everitt, and others.

Daniel Stuart was elected the first president in July, 1818, and Samuel D. Morford cashier. On the 17th of August the bank commenced business. The first dividend was declared Jan. 17, 1820, being three and a half per cent. upon a capital of $27,300. In 1833 the capital was increased to $41,000 by calling in an instalment of $10 on a share. In like manner it was increased in 1837 to $67,500, and on April 2, 1849, an extra dividend of fifty per cent. was made in stock and the capital raised to $135,000. Another dividend in stock, in 1858, increased it to $200,000, at which amount it remained until March, 1865, when the old Sussex Bank was merged in the present national organization.

During the last forty-six years of its existence regular semi-annual dividends were made to the stockholders, varying from three to five per cent., until the ninety-second and last dividend in July, 1865.

The first president, Daniel Stuart, was also surrogate of the county, and held that office at the time of his death. He was one of the most popular men of his time, possessing qualities of head and heart well calculated to win the favor and confidence of the community. He died in the prime of life, lamented and honored. At his death he was succeeded by Ephraim Green, who was elected president Jan. 28, 1822, and after his decease, on Dec. 29, 1828, David Ryerson was chosen president, to which office he was annually re-elected until (and even after) the old bank was merged into the present one,—the lengthy period of thirty-eight years' incumbency. To the above-named officers and to the long-time and faithful cashier, Samuel D. Morford, as well as to the efficient management of its directory, is due much of the success of this financial institution.

Mr. Morford died April 11, 1865, and was succeeded by his son Theodore as cashier, who served in that position so long as the bank had an existence, and then acted in the same capacity in the national bank, its successor.

The bank was first located on Main Street, where Dr. Sheppard now resides, and about 1823 the building on the corner of High and Church Streets was erected and occupied.

From a sketch of the bank prepared a few years since by the Hon. David Thompson, who was for nearly twenty-five years a director of the same, the following is given as showing some of the elements of its success:

"The ninth by-law of the old bank is as follows: 'If a note or bill made by any of the directors of the company shall be offered for discount, its fate shall be decided by ballot.' Although this by-law has long since become obsolete and forgotten, yet its effects and influence have always been recognized. The directors of the bank have never, as a general rule, been borrowers. I find, upon examining the old minutes, that if occasionally the accommodation of a director should happen to become too lengthy, and finally lapse into a permanent loan, he would be delicately reminded by a resolution of the board, that upon any subsequent renewal of his notes three per cent. must be paid; and in course of years, as money became more abundant in the country, the amount to be paid at such renewal was raised to ten per cent.

"Another reason for the past success of the bank is found in the policy, uniformly pursued, of extending its loans to the many rather than in accommodating a few individuals with large amounts. This policy has been found to combine both safety and utility.

"The location of the bank was in former years a circumstance favoring its success. Being the only bank in the county, it enjoyed a monopoly of circulation, which, in the days when the circulation could be enlarged according to the demands of the community, was no small advantage. Until the incorporation of the Belvidere Bank, in 1829, there was no other bank in the district comprising Sussex and Warren. The banking capital in the same district, exclusive of Belvidere, Phillipsburg, and Washington, is now more than twenty times the amount of the capital of the Sussex Bank in 1829.

"But, aside from these causes of success, a large measure of the past prosperity of this bank is undoubtedly due to the untiring industry and financial skill of the late cashier, in concert with the prudent and economical management of the late president, David Ryerson. To those of you who are familiar with the past history of this county I need not say that among the names of directors who have preceded us you will find the principal business men of these times,—those to whom the best interests of any community could be safely intrusted.

"In the space of forty years the banking capital has increased, in the district in which this was the only bank, more than twenty fold. . . . We may safely conclude that the amount of business conducted is more than ten times as much as forty years ago,—and that, too, in an agricultural community,—and that the value of the products has increased in a like proportion. Judging by the past, we may reasonably conclude that in the future the business of the community will give employment to all the banking capital it now possesses."

THE SUSSEX NATIONAL BANK.

"The Sussex National Bank" was established, under the provisions of the National Banking law, in May, 1865. It is the successor of the old Sussex Bank, which was founded in 1818. The capital stock was $200,000, and the officers, upon its formation, were David Ryerson, President; Theodore Morford, Cashier; George S. McCarter, Teller. July 3, 1865, in consequence of increasing infirmities, Mr. Ryerson resigned the presidency, and David Thompson was elected his successor.

The first board of directors was composed of John D. Everitt,* James R. Hull,* James B. Huston, Thomas Lawrence, Jacob Lowrance,* Thomas N. McCarter, William McDanolds, Charles V. Moore, David Ryerson,* George M. Ryerson, David M. Sayre,* David Thompson, and George D. Turner. Levi Shepherd was elected a director in place of George D. Turner, who resigned Jan. 19, 1869.

The first vice-president, Levi Shepherd, was appointed Jan. 23, 1871; he served until his death, in August, 1875, when he was succeeded by David R. Hull, at present officiating.

The present officers and management of this bank are as follows: David Thompson, President; David R. Hull, Vice-President; Theodore Morford, Cashier; Charles S. Steele, Teller; Hiram C. Clark, David R. Hull, James B. Huston, Henry C. Kelsey, Thomas Kays, William McDanolds, Thomas Lawrence, Charles V. Moore, Charles Roe, David Thompson, Anthony S. Stoll, J. Seward Wills, and Virgil H. Crisman, Directors.

ration in 1823, and in which that institution transacted its business for over forty years. The counting-room is in an addition to the original building, and is of more recent construction.

DAVID RYERSON.

Joris Ryerson, great-grandfather of David, was one of the five sons of Martin Ryerson, who came from Amsterdam and settled first at Flatbush and afterwards at the Walabout, on Long Island. Joris, with two of his brothers, Ryer and Francis, first settled in the city of New York, and subsequently removed to Bergen Co., N. J., about 1701, and were the first settlers of Paquanac. Joris Ryerson married Sarah Schouten, who died in 1743, by whom he had four sons and four daughters,—John, Martin, George, Lucas, Mary, Blandina, Elizabeth, and Ann.

Martin, son of Joris and grandfather of our subject, married Catharine Coxé, and settled in Hunterdon County, near Flemington, on the South Branch of the Raritan. He was a surveyor and one of the king's judges, also a colonel of the militia. He had five sons and four daughters. Of these children, Martin, John, and William A., with their widowed mother, removed to Sussex County in the year 1770, where each reared families.

Martin married Rhoda, daughter of Benjamin Hull, who bore him the following children, who grew to maturity: Jesse, David, Anna, Emma, Thomas C., and Elizabeth, who became the wife of Robert A. Linn. Thomas C. died in 1838, then a judge of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, and one of his sons, Martin, was subsequently a judge of the same court; a second, Thomas, is a practicing physician in Newton, N. J.; a third, Henry Ogden, was an officer in the late Rebellion; and a daughter became the wife of T. F. Anderson, of Newton.

David Ryerson was born Oct. 9, 1781, and spent his early life on the farm. Prior to his decease, Jan. 21, 1867, for many years, Mr. Ryerson was one of the most influential citizens of Sussex County. He was clear-headed and practical, slow and deliberate in forming his opinions, and firm as adamant in their maintenance. During a part of his long life he dealt largely in real estate. He purchased extensive tracts of land of non-resident owners, divided them into farms, and sold the latter to individuals at moderate rates, giving them long terms wherein to make payment. The result was that among the scores of men to whom he sold upon such easy conditions hardly one failed in due time to pay in full. By this process waste lands were improved and plodding tenants were transformed into independent farmers. The amount of good accomplished in this way by Mr. Ryerson cannot be computed. It is undoubtedly true that he invariably had a regard to his own interest, but, while subserving that, he ever aimed to put those around him in a way of bettering their circumstances in life. Possessing a judgment that was seldom at fault, he was an adviser who could be relied upon, and out of the hundreds who sought his counsel and abided by it not one can rise up and say that he was not the gainer by it.

In early life, and to some extent in his maturer days, Mr. Ryerson followed the business of a surveyor, which he had learned from his father. The accuracy of observation and calculation required in this pursuit was carried by him into everything which he did,—in his systematic mode of living, of transacting business, and of cultivating his farm and garden. For twenty-six years he was collector of Sussex County, and guarded its finances with unremitting vigilance. From 1831 to 1865 he was president of the Sussex Bank, and by his careful and cautious supervision contributed more than any other man connected with that institution to make it worthy of the public confidence and to establish its reputation upon its solid and impregnable basis. In 1829, 1830, 1831, and 1835 he was a member of the State Council, and distinguished himself by laborious application to business and by a conscientious and intelligent discharge of his public duties.

As a man and a citizen Mr. Ryerson was very decided in his views and methodical in his actions. He was rigidly just in his dealings and discriminative in his charities. Any philanthropic project that met his full approval received from him a liberal benefaction; but if it contained aught that he considered objectionable, he was invulnerable to all appeals in its behalf. Unostentatious in manners, of fixed and temperate habits, self-reliant in all his enterprises, and inflexible in his purposes, he was a man of marked individuality and fitted to be a leader in a community. In politics he was a Republican of the school of Bryant and Bancroft,—more a patriot than a partisan, whose highest aspirations were for the paramount unity of the nation, and who felt that no sacrifice was too costly to defend the government and perpetuate the great principles of the Declaration of Independence.

His education was simply elementary, yet by reading, observation, and experience he acquired a large amount of knowledge. He was a clear and logical thinker, and, though unacquainted with the rules of grammar, spoke and wrote with remarkable precision and perspicuity. He had a retentive memory, and, from the fact that he was acquainted with nearly all the heads of families in Sussex County at the beginning of the century, his reminiscences of "olden time" were exceedingly interesting. He left to his children, besides a large property, the priceless legacy of a good example.

His wife was Mary, granddaughter of Joseph and Martha (Kirkpatrick) Linn, and daughter of Dr. Andrew Linn. Her maternal grandfather, Andrew Kirkpatrick, with his two sons, John and David, and two daughters, Martha and Elizabeth, and his brother, Alexander Kirkpatrick, with his family, removed from Wattie's Neach, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, where they were born, to Belfast, Ireland, about 1725. In 1736 they embarked at Belfast for America, landed at New Castle, Del., crossed the Delaware at Philadelphia, and wandered up through New Jersey, reaching Bound Brook. Finally they settled on the southern slope of Round Mountain, near Basking Ridge, in Somerset County. They were all on foot, and there was no road other than the Indian path.

The descendants of Andrew and Alexander Kirkpatrick have filled many of the most prominent offices in the State and nation, both as legislators and as judges, and many members of the family have been among the most prominent of the legal and medical professions.

Joseph Linn had eight children. Dr. Andrew Linn, third son, died at Newton, aged forty-four. He practiced medicine in Sussex County and Newton nearly the whole of his professional career. His wife was Ann Carnes, of Bladensburg, Md., and sister of Thomas Carnes, member of the Third Congress from Georgia. His children who lived to maturity were Robert A., a merchant of Hamburg; Margaret, wife of Maj. William T. Anderson, for many years a prominent lawyer at Newton; Mary, wife of David Ryerson; Martha, who was first the wife of Hugh Taylor, and after his decease became the wife of Richard R. Morris, of New York; and Alexander, of Easton, Pa.

The children of David and Mary (Linn) Ryerson are Andrew L., died at the age of seventeen, a member of the junior class at Princeton College; George M., a graduate of Princeton and lawyer at Newton; Emma E., widow of the late Rev. Myron Barrett, of Newton; Margaret A., wife of Dr. Anthony Morford, of Nyack, N. Y.; Catharine R., wife of William McMurtry, of Newton; and Mary L., wife of Judge William E. Skinner, of Hackensack, N. J.

SAMUEL D. MORFORD.

Zebulon Morford, grandfather of Samuel D., a native of Wales, was born in 1722, and died in Cranbury, N. J., Oct. 25, 1794. His wife was Susanna Barton, who was born in England, Sept. 25, 1727, and died, also in Cranbury, Jan. 15, 1812.

Zebulon Morford and his wife are supposed to have settled at Cranbury soon after their marriage, and there they resided until their decease. They had eleven children,—viz., John, Mary, Noah, Benjamin, Stephen, Zebulon, Susanna, Lewis, Theodosia, Charles, and Sarah.

Prominent among these children was Stephen, who married Mary Hamilton (whose parents are mentioned by the Dentons in the "Republican Court"), of Philadelphia, Pa., March 17, 1779. He was one of the earliest volunteers in the cause of his country after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, having enlisted in August, 1776, being then in the eighteenth year of his age. Throughout the entire struggle, until the peace of 1783, he was an active, efficient, and patriotic soldier, and ranked as major. On several occasions he was selected by Washington personally for the performance of duties difficult and hazardous, and acquitted himself to the entire satisfaction of the commander-in-chief. He was stationed as one of the guards over the prisoners taken at the battle of Princeton while they were confined in the college, and when they were marched to Philadelphia he was one of the soldiers detailed to take charge of them. He was born Nov. 10, 1756, and died in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

Another son, Zebulon, was father of our subject, born March 30, 1759; married, Nov. 13, 1785, Mary Denton, who was a descendant of Denton Hall, of Warrick, County of Cumberland, England. The earliest records of the Dentons are at Hempstead, L. I. Rev. Richard Denton came from England with Winthrop in 1630, and at his death left four sons, one of whom led from Hempstead the settlers of Jamaica, L. I., another in a like manner settled Elizabethtown, N. J. Zebulon Morford died at Princeton, where he resided, April 2, 1841. His wife, born Dec. 5, 1765, died Dec. 20, 1843.

The children of Zebulon and Mary Morford were Susan, Mary (who became the wife of William Little), Samuel Denton, Charles, Harriet (married John Nichol), Josiah Firman, Robert C., and Evelina Belmont (who became the wife of Robert L. Weakley).

Of these children, one son, Josiah Firman Morford, born April 23, 1799, was graduated at Princeton, and soon after went to Tennessee, where he read law with Judge Crabb. After his admission to the bar he located at McMinnville, where he began a brilliant professional career. He had a mind stored with most historic reading; besides, he was perfectly familiar with all the polite literature of the day. He was one of the best belle-lettrists in the State. He was a brilliant debater, and possessed high mental endowments and culture of character, but his shining virtue was kindness and sympathy with the poor and distressed. In 1836 he was elected to the State Senate, and was made a clerk and Master in Chancery, holding jurisdiction over ten counties; this position he filled with great credit for many years. In 1840 he was chosen as one of the Presidential electors on the Harrison ticket. His death occurred April 5, 1865.

Another son, Charles, came to Newton, N. J., while a young man, and for some time was engaged as a teacher. He died at the age of twenty-one years.

Samuel Denton Morford, subject of this sketch, was born Sept. 20, 1799, on the old homestead, at Princeton, N. J. He received a liberal English and business education in his native place, and during his early manhood was for several years a clerk in a bank in New York City. On June 25, 1818, he married Elsie, a daughter of Samuel de Reimer, and granddaughter of Peter de Reimer, of New York, and some two months after his marriage came to Newton upon the solicitation of some of the leading business men of the place, and organized the Sussex Bank, of which he was made cashier. He continued to fill that position uninterrupted during a period of forty-seven years, and until his sudden death, which occurred April 11, 1865. He was buried at Newton on the afternoon of the day of the assassination of President Lincoln.

Mr. Morford's long continuance in connection with the Sussex Bank made him widely known among the business men of New Jersey and of New York City. His care and vigilance over all the interests of its finances, his skillful management and good judgment in the investment of its funds, in more cases than one received the indorsement of the stockholders of the bank in other ways than by mere resolutions of approval. He was known to the people of Newton and Sussex County as a safe, prudent, and successful financier, a skillful banker, and an honest man. With a disposition naturally social and a temper remarkably uniform and cheerful, he was successful in making friends and happy in retaining them.

Mr. Morford was a promoter of the best interests of society, and a member of the Presbyterian congregation at Newton. He was in no sense of the term a politician, but kept aloof from any office of a political nature, yet, as formerly a member of the old Whig party, and subsequently of the Republican party, he exercised the right of suffrage with unswerving fidelity to his principles. His wife possessed those womanly qualities that grace the pleasant home, and reared her children under the influences of the Presbyterian Church, of which she was a devoted member. She was born June 13, 1795, and died Sept. 1, 1851. Their children are Charles Augustus, of New York City; Anthony Denton, of Nyack, N. Y.; Mary Anthony, wife of Peter C. Adams; William Edwin, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Robert Halstead, of Minnesota; John Henry Livingston, cashier of the National Currency Bank of New York City at the time of his death; Theodore, cashier of the Sussex Bank—now the Sussex National Bank—since the death of his father; and Harriet Eveline.

THE MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK.

This bank was established March 6, 1865, and began business June 1st, with a capital of $100,000, under the following management: Robert Hamilton, Dr. Franklin Smith, Joseph Coult, Zachariah H. Price, William H. Pinkney, George Neldeu, Anson P. Rosenkrans, Christopher B. Van Sickle, William W. Woodward, Jacob L. Swayze, Luther Hill, John Linn, and William Snyder.

Robert Hamilton was its first president, and officiated until his death, when Jacob L. Swayze was chosen as his successor, and is the present incumbent. He was the first cashier, and upon his promotion to the presidency he was succeeded by John C. Howell, who is still officiating in that capacity.

The first teller, William H. Faull, served as such from May 20, 1869, until Oct. 11, 1873, when he became connected officially with the North Ward National Bank of Newark, N. J., and so continued until his death, Aug. 14, 1880. He was born at Newton in January, 1854, while his father, the Rev. John Faull, was pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church of this place. He was but fifteen years old when he became teller, and was under twenty-six when elected cashier of the North Ward Bank,—the youngest cashier in the State of New Jersey.

William H. Faull was a faithful and efficient bank official, a polished gentleman, of the strictest morals, and of unimpeachable integrity, whose demise was sincerely mourned in Newton, Newark, and wherever he was known.* In 1873, R. J. Nelden became teller, and is still officiating.

The bank was first located in a building owned by Mr. Swayze, on High Street; two years later it removed to its present location, on Spring Street, near the Cochran House, occupying the first story of the building which was erected by the bank in 1867.

Most of the original directors are either deceased or removed; four only remain in the present board, and their names are the first four of the following list of members of the board of directors, as constituted in 1881: Jacob L. Swayze, Zachariah H. Price, Chr. B. Van Sickle, William H. Pinkney, Henry W. Merriam, Obadiah P. Armstrong, John J. Baxter, Daniel Vliet, Joseph Andress, Jr., Jacob L. Lawrence, John C. Howell, Samuel H. Hunt, and Ralph Dildine.

The capital stock of the bank is the same as when first instituted. It declared a dividend six months after it was organized, and has done the same semi-annually ever since, without a single omission. It has been well managed, is on a firm basis, and has a clean record.

JACOB L. SWAYZE.

The progenitor of the family in New Jersey was Samuel Swayze, born in Southhold, L. I., March 20, 1689, and removed to Roxbury, Morris Co., N. J., May 17, 1737, where he resided until his death, May

* He was a young man of the most sterling probity, and added to a high order of business talent the faculty of winning and retaining friends. By the president of the board of directors of the North Ward National Bank, with whom he came in constant and close intercourse and intimacy, he was highly esteemed, as well for his fidelity and business capacity as for his genial nature and courteous demeanor. He died at the residence of his father-in-law, Allen Ridgewell, in Middletown, N. Y., of consumption. He had been granted a furlough by the directors of the bank, believing that a month's absence from his labors, with recreation in the open air, would restore his health; and it was not until a few weeks before his death that his father abandoned hope of his recovery, and so notified the bank officials. His remains were removed to the residence of his father, at New Springville, Staten Island, and were buried at that place on Tuesday, Aug. 16, 1880. A highly complimentary notice was published in the Newark Daily Advertiser at the time of his death, and we are informed by an officer of the Merchants' National Bank of Newton that the character given to Mr. Faull is not too highly drawn, but that much that is truthful might be added thereto. Mr. Faull was such a rare specimen of an honest man in charge of other people's money, in these days of moral as well as financial delinquency, that we feel we can do a public service by calling attention to the fact, and give it as wide a circulation as lies within our domain.

A. M. Mayo

11, 1759. His father was of Welsh birth, and with his family emigrated from Wales and settled on Long Island about the year 1660.

The wife of Samuel Swayze was Penelope, who was born in Southhold, L. I., Feb. 14, 1690, and died at Roxbury, Dec. 1, 1746.

The children of Samuel and Penelope Swayze were Penelope, born July 31, 1710; Samuel, Jr., born July 4, 1712; Barnabas, born Jan. 12, 1715; Richard, born May 20, 1717; Israel, born Oct. 16, 1720; Caleb, born March 22, 1722; Johannah, born June 23, 1725; Mehitable, born July 27, 1728; Lydia, born March 4, 1731; Mary, born April 3, 1733. Mary, youngest daughter of Samuel, married John Seward, a captain in the Revolutionary war. Capt. John Seward was father of Dr. Samuel S. Seward, whose son was Hon. William H. Seward, Senator and Governor of New York, United States Senator and Secretary of State.

Barnabas, son of Samuel Swayze, Sr., removed from Roxbury or Chester to Hope township, Warren Co., N. J., in 1743, where he purchased some 800 acres of land, a part of it lying on the present road leading from the village of Hope to Belvidere, and a part of it in the direction from Hope to Delaware Station. The purchase of Barnabas proved to be larger than he could handle and pay for, so his father said to the brother Israel, "You must go up there and take a part of it, and I will come up and divide it between you," which was accordingly done in about the year 1745. Nearly the whole of this land was then covered with timber.

From these two brothers—Barnabas and Israel—sprang the numerous family which since then has branched out over the United States in different directions from that locality.

Israel had four sons,—Joshua, Caleb, Jacob, and James,—born in the following order: Joshua, died at sixty-five years of age; Caleb, at fifty-nine; Jacob, at thirty-nine,—all in the neighborhood of Hope; and James, in Ohio, at eighty.

Caleb Swayze, one of the sons, had five sons and two daughters. One daughter died in infancy, the other at the age of nine years. Henry D. died Nov. 26, 1819, aged twenty years; Israel survives at the age of seventy-seven; James K. died May 15, 1878; Jacob died in 1838; and Caleb survives, aged sixty-six.

Israel Swayze, son of Caleb, and father of our subject, was born at Hope, Feb. 22, 1803, and married Mary Ann, daughter of John Lawrence, of the same place. She was born in 1801, and died in 1873.

Their children who grew to manhood and womanhood are Jacob L.; Lydia, wife of Jacob R. Freese, of Hope; Alpheus, a farmer and merchant of Hope; Camilla S., wife of Prof. Ellis A. Apgar, State superintendent of public schools; and Minnie C.

Israel Swayze has led a quiet life as a farmer, and has always been interested in all worthy local enterprises of his township. As a member of the old Whig party he was active in placing others whom he thought fit in positions of trust and responsibility, but was never solicitous of any place for himself. Since the organization of the Republican party he has been a firm supporter of its principles.

For many years he was a member of the Christian Church at Hope, and a promoter of religious interests and charitable institutions. Since 1870 his residence has been at Trenton, with his daughter, Mrs. Apgar.

Jacob L. Swayze, son of Israel and Mary Swayze, was born March 3, 1824, in the village of Hope, Warren Co. He received his early education in the schools of his native place. At the age of fourteen years he became a clerk in the store of his uncles, James K. and Caleb Swayze, at Hope. Here his natural business ability began to develop, and he soon became conversant with all the details of a general trade. He remained as clerk in this store until June 13, 1842, when he became a partner in the concern with his uncle Caleb, under the firm-name of C. & J. L. Swayze. This business relation continued until Jan. 4, 1845, when Mr. Swayze bought his uncle's interest, and carried on the store until April, 1847.

He relinquished business at Hope at this time, and from May 18, 1848, until April 15, 1854, carried on a general mercantile business at Stanhope, in Sussex County.

In May, 1854, he went to Trenton, N. J., and commenced the study of law under Hon. Martin Ryerson, who was subsequently a judge of the Supreme Court of New Jersey.

After one year Mr. Ryerson removed to Newton, N. J., and Mr. Swayze then entered the law-office of Hon. Mercer Beasley, now chief justice of the Supreme Court of the State, where he remained for three years, and was admitted as an attorney at the June term in 1858. He at once entered upon the practice of his profession in Trenton, which, however, on account of ill health, he continued but a short time.

In the autumn of 1858 he came to Newton, where he, in the spring of 1859, again entered into mercantile business, which he carried on until 1865. He was foremost in the organization of the Merchants' National Bank at Newton, is its largest stockholder, and was elected cashier, March 6, 1865, at the first meeting of its directors. Upon the decease of Col. Robert Hamilton, its first president, Mr. Swayze was elected his successor, and retains that position in 1880.

In politics Mr. Swayze formerly held to the principles of the old Jackson school, and never differed with the platform of the Democratic party, except on the question of slavery. He became a member of the Republican party upon its organization, and until 1872 unwaveringly advocated its measures of reform. Since that time he has taken an independent stand on political questions, and cast his vote and influence for what he conceived to be just and correct principles, irrespective of the men or party representing them.

Believing fully in a protective tariff for all American industries, and protection to American labor, he ardently supported the election of James A. Garfield for the Presidency in 1880. He was a member of the Constitutional Commission that proposed amendments to the Constitution in 1873, and introduced a number of measures of reform, several of which were adopted in whole or in a modified form, and are now incorporated into the Constitution of the State.

He labored earnestly, industriously, and zealously in favor of every reform measure that was introduced. He favored an elective judiciary, the abolition of the Court of Chancery, the abolition of capital punishment, woman suffrage, the equal taxation of all kinds of property and no exemptions (even for churches and institutions of learning), the election of State officers by the people, measures to prevent bribery at elections, and several other reforms; and he opposed a change of representation in the Senate and the creation of any new offices.

Mr. Swayze married, Sept. 10, 1860, Joanna, a daughter of Jonathan Hill, of Green township, Sussex County. Her mother was Joanna Price, an aunt of ex-Governor Rodman M. Price.

Their children are Francis J., a graduate of Harvard in the class of '79; Mary C., William Henry Seward, John Lawrence, and Joanna H.

THE NEWTON GASLIGHT COMPANY

was chartered in 1860,* which franchise constituted Robert Hamilton, John Linn, and D. S. Anderson commissioners, empowered to open books for subscriptions to its capital stock, limited to $30,000. They were permitted to organize and proceed to business so soon as $15,000 was subscribed. On account of various discouragements about that time the project was laid aside, and nothing was done. In January, 1869, the Rev. Myron Barrett suggested to certain citizens who talked of getting a gas-machine of sufficient capacity to light their dwellings that many others in various parts of the town would like gas also, and also suggested the putting of the several investments into a common stock and erecting works sufficient to light the town. He was reminded that the charter, obtained some years before, must still be in existence. It was found, and under its provisions subscription books were opened, a company formed, and gas-works speedily erected. They were completed in the fall of 1869, and are of sufficient capacity to light a town of 20,000 inhabitants,—with a six-inch main,—so there is no immediate danger of their proving inadequate to the demand. The first president was J. L. Swayze, and J. L. Lawrence secretary.

The present officers are Alfred F. Fellows, President; Dr. Franklin Smith, Secretary and Treasurer; Franklin Smith, Jr., Superintendent.

THE NEWTON CEMETERY COMPANY was incorporated March 22, 1860, with Michael B. Titman, Moses W. Northrup, Daniel S. Anderson,

Samuel Cassady, Nathaniel Pettit, Thomas N. McCarter, and Whitfield S. Johnson as corporators. Several meetings were held, but the amount required for the purpose was not obtained until 1866, when the company was organized. Dr. Franklin Smith was elected president, Daniel S. Anderson secretary, and Thomas Anderson treasurer, with about $16,000 capital. The present grounds were purchased of the heirs of Aaron Peck,—some 20 acres, beautifully situated in the south part of the town. The first interment was Joseph A. Linn, in August, 1867.

The present officers are Franklin Smith, President; Thomas E. Smith, Secretary and Treasurer; Charles Stickle, Superintendent.

"THE NEWTON BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION" was organized in September, 1869. A. W. Price was chosen president, Joseph Coult vice-president, John C. Howell treasurer, and S. S. Cook secretary. The first directors were the following-named gentlemen: Joseph Coult, William W. Woodward, John C. Howell, Francis Graey, Lewis J. Martin, Henry M. Ward, A. W. Price, William E. Taylor, S. S. Cook, Thomas Farrel, O. B. Pellet, A. J. Landon, George Nelden. It closed up its affairs in 1880. During its existence it transacted a large amount of business by loaning its money on real estate, etc.

THE DENNIS LIBRARY.

This institution is the result of the munificent gift of $25,000 by Alfred L. Dennis, Esq., of Newark, N. J., to this his native town. The citizens of Newton added $5000 to this sum, which purchased the lot on which the library building was erected. The corporate name is "The Newton Library Association," yet, out of respect to the founder, the directors unanimously resolved to let the library bear his name and be called "The Dennis Library."

The act of incorporation is dated April 2, 1867, and names as incorporators Martin Ryerson, George H. Nelden, Thomas Ryerson, Franklin Smith, Thomas Anderson, Rev. Nathaniel Pettit, John R. Stuart, Charles P. Rorbach, David Thompson, Benjamin B. Edsall, John Linn, George M. Ryerson, Daniel S. Anderson, Samuel Dennis, Theodore Morford, John McCarter, Jonathan F. Shafer, and Robert Hamilton.

The charter provided that the capital stock should not exceed $50,000, nor the yearly income from real and personal property exceed $10,000. The association was to have power to commence operations as soon as $10,000 was subscribed. An annual stockholders' meeting was to be held, to elect from their number thirteen directors, the incorporators to act until said election should be held. The officers therein provided were president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, "also a librarian, and such other officers as may be necessary," all to be chosen by the directors, seven of whom constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. A supplement to the act of incorporation, passed March 31, 1869, made it legal for the town to vote money, not exceeding $500 in any one year, in aid of the library.

The first directors (elected May 30, 1868) were Alfred L. Dennis, Robert Hamilton, Daniel S. Anderson, Joseph Coult, Samuel Johnson, George M. Ryerson, Henry C. Kelsey, Thomas Ryerson, Theodore Morford, Myron Barrett, Jonathan F. Shafer, John McCarter, and Franklin Smith. The following were the first officers: Robert Hamilton, President; Daniel S. Anderson, Vice-President; Henry C. Kelsey, Secretary and Treasurer; Rev. Myron Barrett,* Librarian.

Mr. Hamilton continued to act as president until his death, in 1878, when he was succeeded by Daniel S. Anderson, at present officiating. S. H. Hunt is the present vice-president, Dr. Jonathan Havens secretary, and Theodore Morford treasurer. The present directors are as follows: A. L. Dennis, S. H. Hunt, D. S. Anderson, Thomas Ryerson, Theodore Morford, George M. Ryerson, Jonathan Havens, H. C. Kelsey, Thomas G. Bunnell, Franklin Smith, Thomas Anderson, Samuel Johnson, J. W. Lane.

The library building was erected in 1871-72. It is 45 feet front by 75 feet deep, three stories in height, with a basement, and is constructed of pressed brick with blue limestone corners. The first story is occupied by the post-office and the New Jersey Herald establishment; the second story by the library, reading-room, etc.; while the third or upper story, extending over the whole area of the building, is used as a public lecture-room, and known as "Library Hall." It is of sufficient size to comfortably seat 500 people. The building, with its mansard roof and ornamental tower, is a valuable architectural addition to the place; while the public conveniences and literary privileges therein embodied are invaluable to the present, and will continue to be to coming generations.

The general rules, adopted by the association and governing the library, are:

"The Library shall be open from 2 to 6 P.M., and from 7 to 8.30 in the evening.

"The Reading-Room will be open from 9.30 A.M. to 9.30 in the evening.

"TERMS.—The stockholders, free; to subscribers, 25 cents a month, 60 cents a quarter, or $2 a year, in advance.

"The Reading-Room, free to all."

The library contains 3580 volumes, and is under the superintending care of Dr. Thomas Ryerson, librarian, assisted by Miss Elestine Foster. David L. Foster is janitor.

* To the Rev. Myron Barrett, who labored so zealously and efficiently, giving his entire time gratuitously to the arranging, cataloguing, and preparing the library for public use, and later serving as librarian, much credit is due. Upon his death the directors passed complimentary resolutions and directed that a tablet be placed over his desk in the reading-room as a memorial. This was done. The tablet bears the following inscription:

"REV. MYRON BARRETT,
First Librarian of Dennis Library, and whose services were indispensable in its organization,

Died May 8, 1876,

In the 60th year of his age."

ALFRED L. DENNIS.

It is a chief glory of our country that it sets "an open door" before young men, bidding them enter if they be worthy. Among the most fascinating pages of our history are those which record the struggles, the courage, and the successes of young men with no resources but their own in reaching high position among their fellows.

A few years ago a citizen of Newark made a large gift in money for the establishment of a public library in Newton, the shire-town of Sussex Co., N. J. A sketch of that noble institution can hardly be regarded complete without giving a sketch also of the life of the donor.

Alfred L. Dennis, the founder of the Newton Library, is the son of Ezekiel Dennis and his wife, Mary Baldwin. The father was for several years in business in Newton, and was honored with several important trusts in the county. He was an accomplished surveyor, and much esteemed in every position by those who knew him. He died in middle life, leaving a family of five young children, Alfred being the second. He received his early education under the instruction of the Rev. Clarkson N. Dunn and Dr. H. Hallock, of Newton. At the age of thirteen he went to Newark and found employment for a short time as a grocer's clerk. His worldly goods consisted of a small bundle of clothes and his mother's blessing.

Mr. William Tuttle, who had a bookstore at the corner of Broad and Academy Streets and was the proprietor of the Sentinel of Freedom, advertised for a boy to learn the bookbinding business; the same evening a lad of diminutive stature applied for the place. It is said that Mr. Tuttle, after inspecting him, remarked, "I am afraid you are not big enough to handle the press-bar," referring to the iron bar used in pressing the sheets for binding. The boy answered with words that at once won him a lifelong friend, and which also were the true index of his character and the key to his future success: "I am large enough to try it!"

He at once became an apprentice to the business, and, what was a matter of no small importance, a member of Mr. Tuttle's household. In those days the master-mechanics and employers of Newark boarded their apprentices in their own families, and there are scores of cases besides that of Mr. Dennis where the apprentice-boys were made so much at home in their employers' families as to refer to those days, even after they had become men of wealth, with real satisfaction. Between Mr. Dennis and Mr. Tuttle's family there grew up a strong attachment, which not even prosperity has weakened.

For many years Mr. Tuttle was a director in "the Old Bank," as the Newark Banking and Insurance Company was commonly called. One of the duties which he regularly performed was on Thursday to go to New York for the bank to effect its exchanges. It was not an uncommon occurrence for the ice to drive the boat miles from the ferry; so that not only all day would be taken for the Thursday trip to New York, but sometimes a large part or the whole of the night.

This day of bank exchange became an important circumstance in Mr. Dennis' life. He had no sooner been placed in the bindery, under the foremanship of John Smith, in Academy Street, a few doors from Broad, than he began "to show the stuff there was in him" not merely by proving that he was "large enough to try to handle the press-bar" and to master other details of the trade, but by studying the nature of the business itself, especially as related to the materials used in it. In this way he studied the business of binders' leathers, the process and cost of their manufacture, where they were chiefly made, and even the laws regulating their importation into this country. Of this more presently.

After Mr. Dennis had been some months in the bindery he asked Mr. Tuttle to be allowed to act as clerk in the bookstore at night. At once he began to display the grand trait, as already mentioned, of getting a thorough knowledge of the business. He soon knew the position on the shelves of all the books, and their cost and price, and the principles on which the bookselling business was conducted. His employer was not reluctant to impart intelligent answers to his inquiries. Not long after this "night service" had been in successful operation Mr. Tuttle found it to be to his interest to have his apprentice as clerk in the bookstore on the Thursdays when he went to New York for the bank. So skillfully did he conduct his sales and so well did he conciliate customers, that the sales of books on Thursday were perceptibly larger than those on other days. Of course, it was not long before he became the trusted and active clerk whose services were devoted entirely to the bookstore. All this while the young man was enlarging his stores of knowledge not merely of the bookselling, but of books. Of this he gives evidence to this day.

As the day of his majority was drawing nigh, the question of his own future was one that caused young Dennis no little anxiety. He had carefully studied bookselling as a business, and especially the bookselling at the old store, corner of Broad and Academy. Not long before he was twenty-one he astonished his employer by a proposition to buy out his business as a bookseller, with all the stock in hand. He admitted he had no capital, but was sure he soon would have some if he could have a chance. After careful consideration Mr. Tuttle—a man noted for his caution—agreed to sell out his store to Mr. Dennis on terms satisfactory to both.

At once a great change was effected in the stock of books and in the business. The "dead stock" of the upper shelves was sent to the auction-rooms to be sold for what it would bring in cash. With great sagacity he also devised and introduced into his business a method at that time unknown—as is said—in any salesroom of Newark,—the taking orders for merchandise in his line and filling them by immediate purchase in New York. Several times a week he went to the city, and each night he would be ready to furnish his customers with the merchandise ordered. Of course, he made quick sales, turned his capital often, and accumulated no dead stock. Careful of his credit and on the alert for custom, he soon greatly enlarged his business. Sometimes he seemed rash to his old employer, but rarely failed to make his investments profitable. In due time he had not only paid Mr. Tuttle for his books, but he had purchased the valuable property on which the store was located. This last purchase was not made until after Mr. Tuttle's death.

Mention has been made of the fact that when in the bindery Mr. Dennis had carefully studied the history of binders' leathers. Sure there "was money in it," after he had become a bookseller he quietly invested a few hundred dollars in sheepskins only partially finished in England. He had the process completed in Connecticut, and then among the first to whom he offered his leathers were the Harper Brothers, who, finding his wares excellent and his prices reasonable, purchased largely. In a very short time he had disposed of his stock at a fair profit and had ordered a larger invoice from England. This was the beginning of a large and profitable business so shrewdly managed that it led the wealthy firm of Abram Bell & Co., bankers, commission and shipping merchants, of New York, in 1849 to offer him an interest in their business and to give him its principal control. This move proved to be one of large profit.

Meanwhile, Mr. Dennis continued the book business in Newark, having taken his brother, Martin R. Dennis, into partnership. In 1861, having disposed of his interest to his partner, he retired from the firm. Mr. Dennis proved so successful also in the investment of his surplus capital that he had become an acknowledged authority in matters of finance, and about twenty-five years ago he was elected a director of the same "Old Bank" of which Mr. Tuttle had been a director. He has continued in this position until the present time, and is also an influential director of the Newark Howard Savings Institution, which now stands among the best managed in this country.

Having married in Connecticut, he was led to examine the condition and probable outcome of the Naugatuck Railroad, and he finally purchased a large amount of its stock and was elected its vice-president. Not a little owing to his tact is due the fact that this road has cleared off its entire bonded debt and regularly pays satisfactory dividends. It is said that the Naugatuck, and the New York, New Haven and Hartford roads are the only ones in this country that do not owe a debt of any sort.

In 1861 that very able railway manager John P.

A. L. Dennis

Jackson, the vice-president of the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, died. Mr. Dennis was elected his successor in the directorship of the road, and in 1864, when Gen. John S. Darcy, who had from the organization been president of the road, died, he was elected his successor,—a position which he filled with great ability until the road was leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in 1872, and he still continues the vice-president of the corporation that contracted that lease to the Pennsylvania road, known as "The United Railroads of New Jersey."

It almost bewilders one to think of the boy of slight stature uttering the keynote of his poverty and also of his pluck—"I am large enough to try it"—now occupying so many positions of great responsibility in the business world: the vice-president of the Nautaugue Railroad, vice-president of the United Railroads of New Jersey, the fiscal and executive agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad at New York, president of the Jersey City Ferry Company, and of several other railroad and bridge companies. He is also an active director in the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, and, in connection with such men as Jay Gould, John I. Blair, and Samuel Sloan, is building an extension of the road from Binghamton to Buffalo. Whilst this enumeration does not exhaust the list of his responsible trusts, it is sufficient to indicate the confidence placed in his sagacity and executive ability as a business man.

Whilst Mr. Dennis has been investing his fortune so advantageously in these great corporations, he has not forgotten the city of his adoption, but has freely invested in buildings in Newark, and in other ways has helped to enlarge the city. Occasionally, as a railroad executive, he has met with some very marked and pleasing incidents. Such a one was his placing a palatial train from Jersey City to Washington at the service of the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia, then visiting this country. It was a graceful and complimentary act in honor of "our distinguished guest." The grand duke recognized the act by a beautiful souvenir, and also an autograph letter which he sent to Mr. Dennis.

In 1866, Mr. Dennis determined to aid in founding a public library in Newton, the place of his birth. Accordingly he pledged the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars on certain conditions. On Nov. 28, 1872, private subscriptions having been obtained sufficient to secure his gift, the building was dedicated, and addresses made by Col. Robert Hamilton, Judge Martin Ryerson, and other distinguished gentlemen of the place. Col. Hamilton said in delivering the address of welcome, "That it was with much pleasure that he was allowed to officiate at the presentation of this beautiful building, with its ample dimensions and well-ordered apartments. Well might we congratulate ourselves upon its success. He hoped soon to be able to announce an interesting and attractive library, —not fully equaling, perhaps, the famous libraries of Alexandria and Paris, yet such a one as where the lovers of reading might find a feast of reason and a flow of soul. He did not suppose this beautiful hall would attain to the celebrity of Independence Hall, Philadelphia,—the birthplace of our great and glorious Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution of the Union,—or Faneuil Hall, Boston, which has rung with the eloquence of the great Webster and the magnetic Choate; but we hope to make it the place where the vocalist, the elocutionist, the scientist, and the philosopher may exert their powers, and great wisdom and solid good be imparted.

"For it we are indebted to a gentleman who is with us,—who, though a native of our town, has gone abroad and prospered, and who in his success forgets not his native town and people. I feel assured that you will be glad with me to express to him our grateful acknowledgments for his generosity in the following resolution:

Resolved, That we tender to Alfred L. Dennis, Esq., our most heartfelt thanks for his magnificent endowment of twenty-five thousand dollars for the library enterprise in Newton, and that we present to him our best wishes for his continued welfare."

Mr. Dennis is an active patron of many worthy objects that come before him, and is a trustee, with William E. Dodge, S. B. Chittenden, William A. Booth, and others, of the Syrian Protestant College, at Beyrout. He married, September, 1841, Eliza, a daughter of Maj. James Shepard, of Norfolk, Litchfield Co., Conn. The children born of this union are five. The oldest, Rev. Dr. James S. Dennis, is a graduate of Princeton College, in the class of '62, was one year at Harvard University Law School, was foreign missionary at Sidon, in Syria, for a few years following 1868, and afterwards called to Beyrout, in Syria, and added to that magnificent band of workers in Syria of which the venerable Thomson and Calhoun, Vandyke, one of the most learned of Arabic scholars, the Jessup brothers, Bliss, and others are members. Dr. Dennis has already become so proficient in the Arabic as to have prepared several textbooks with special reference to the Theological Department of the Syrian Protestant College, of which he is the professor.

Mr. Dennis' remaining children are Dr. Frederic S. Dennis, of New York, a partner of the celebrated surgeon Professor James R. Wood, of Bellevue Hospital; Warren E., just admitted to the bar in New Jersey; Samuel S., assisting his father in business; and Mary Eliza, an only daughter.

There was one scene in Mr. Dennis' life which deserves mention. When the civil war broke out threats were freely made that if the New Jersey Railroad took troops South, the torch would be applied to the bridges over the Hackensack and Passaic. Gen. Darcy, the president of the road, and Mr. Dennis, one of the directors, were one whole night looking after these bridges and directing the batteries whose guns were trained to guard every foot of the endangered structures. They were surrounded by a mob of desperate men bent on burning the bridges. Gen. Darcy and Mr. Dennis, in the carriage of the general, were driving to the scene of danger, when they were beset by the roughs, who took the horse from the carriage. Gen. Darcy was popular with the men, and so great was his influence that the men hitched the horse to the wagon and allowed them to drive on. It was a night of danger, but prudence, courage, and the well-loaded cannon brought the matter to a safe conclusion; so that not a single train was detained.

It certainly seems almost like a tale of the romancer thus to note a few of the incidents in the life of one who by fidelity to principle and duty has steadily risen from "the iron press-bar of the bookbinder" to be the counsel, friend, and partner of some of the greatest monarchs of the rail in our country.

VIII.—THE FIRE DEPARTMENT.*

The first fire company in Newton was organized in 1835, after the burning of Trusdell's chair-shop, on Mill Street, with Maj. John Kraber as foreman, Judge Martin Ryerson secretary, and Whitfield S. Johnson treasurer; Gen. Lyman Edwards was appointed chief engineer. An old "crank"-engine was purchased by the town and placed in charge of the company, under the name of "Phoenix Engine Company, No. 1." Previous to 1835 the only protection the town had against fire was fourteen leathern buckets, which were kept hanging on a pole in the lower hall of the court-house.

In January, 1847, the court-house was destroyed by fire, and the following year a "goose-neck" hand-engine, known as "Neptune, No. 3," formerly used in New Haven, Conn., was purchased, and a company formed, with Lewis N. Williams as foreman. Williams was succeeded by Maj. Kraber and Foreman Shafer, and Dr. Thomas Ryerson, Dr. Morford, John C. Williams, Aaron H. Bonnell, Alexander Shafer, Henry W. Johnson, James R. Hull, William Morford, John W. Lane, Harvey Raymond, George Ryerson, David Auble, and others took an active part. Another company was organized about the same time, with John J. Edwards, as foreman, who took charge of the "crank"-engine, and for a few years a warm and friendly rivalry existed between the two companies. Gen. Lyman Edwards acted as chief engineer during this organization.

In 1857, Charles Crook formed a new company for No. 3, and was elected foreman. Mr. Crook took a very active part in fire matters, and principally through his efforts the organization was continued for three or four years.

In 1863 occurred what is known as the Snook fire, on Spring Street. At this time there was no organized company, and the goose-neck engine was manned by the citizens under command of Charles Crook, who had kept the engine in order for use. After this fire the purchase of another engine was advocated, and, through the efforts of Mr. Crook, No. 4, a piano-engine, was purchased at Newark, where it was known as "Dutch Four." A new company, known as "Hercules, No. 4," was organized, with Joseph Coult as foreman, and S. C. Randall assistant foreman.

A few weeks later Pemberton B. Horton formed a company for Neptune, No. 3. Mr. Horton was elected foreman, Robert R. Gray assistant foreman, Henry C. Bonnell secretary, and Oakley B. Pellet treasurer. In 1864 the company abandoned the old "goose-neck," and with the assistance of the town purchased No. 7 of Newark. At that time this engine was considered one of the finest hand-engines in the State. It was a piano make, and was heavily ornamented with silver.

The organization was completed by the appointment of Charles Crook, as chief engineer, by Charles Rorbach, president of the fire board. This board was elected by the property-owners in April of each year.

This department was finely equipped, and was very active until Nov. 21, 1866, a number of fires occurring on Spring Street. Between the hours of 11 p.m. on the 21st and 11 a.m. on the 22d of November, 1866, there were three fires, the first destroying three stables in the rear of English's blacksmith-shop, with the contents, including two horses and a cow. The second fire was in Tilman & Davidson's clothing-store, which was extinguished after the stock had been badly damaged. The third was at No. 3's engine-house. The building caught from the stove while several of the members were engaged in oiling the old leather hose in an adjoining yard. The engine was badly damaged, but the boys succeeded in rescuing it from the building, and while No. 4 was engaged in saving the engine-house and lecture-room of the Presbyterian church No. 3 did effective work in saving the church, which was on fire twice.

During the organization of this department a revival meeting was conducted in No. 3's house by Dr. Thomas Ryerson, which resulted in the conversion of one of the members.

On Nov. 27, 1866, at a meeting of the citizens, it was voted to purchase ground and erect a new engine-house. A site was obtained on High Street, and a brick building erected; on its completion it was occupied by No. 4. An effort was made at this time to purchase a hook-and-ladder truck, but failed.

April 10, 1867, the property-owners voted to dispose of No. 7. It was sold to Morristown, and afterwards to New York parties, who shipped it to Brazil.

July 25, 1867, Company No. 3 held a meeting in Cannon's Hall, and voted to disband. No. 4 also disbanded a few weeks later.

Oct. 19, 1867, a fire broke out in Gillam's upholstery room, on Spring Street, and No. 4 was taken to the scene by the citizens. It was found to be out of order, and a bucket brigade was formed and the fire extinguished with pails of water.

From this time until 1873 there was no organized department. Chief Engineer Crook, however, had charge of No. 4 and the old "goose-neck," both of which are still in possession of the town.

HISTORY OF THE PRESENT DEPARTMENT.

On the morning of Sept. 22, 1873, the town was visited by the most destructive fire in its history. It originated in the drug-store of George L. Smith, on Main Street, and the flames were not subdued until the buildings of Mr. Smith, W. W. Woodward, Mrs. R. Cramer, Dr. R. A. Sheppard, and Dennis Cochran were destroyed. The loss was about $65,000. The hand-engines were brought to the scene, but were of little service, the citizens becoming exhausted after a few minutes' work at the brakes, and the old leather hose being too rotten to stand the pressure of a stream. Aid was telegraphed for to Morristown and Hoboken. Steamer Company No. 1, of Hoboken, answered the call, arriving in Newton about 5 A.M. The danger was past, but the steamer was fired up and a stream thrown on the smouldering ruins. This was the first steamer in the town, and the people were so much pleased with its workings that it was decided on the spot that the town must have a steamer. On the 23d the town committee, consisting of Martin Rosenkrans, Dr. Levi D. Miller, Joseph Warbasse, A. W. Price, and Emanuel Ackerson, held a meeting, and voted to purchase a steamer and 1000 feet of hose.

On the 24th, Martin Rosenkrans and Chief Engineer Crook visited Paterson and other cities, inspecting the different make of steamers, and finally purchased of Clapp & Jones, of Hudson, N. Y., a handsome fourth-class steamer that had been built expressly for exhibition at the New York State Fair; 800 feet of rubber hose was also purchased. The total cost was $5000.

September 30th the town committee appointed the following officers and members to constitute the department: Chief Engineer, Charles Crook; Assistant Chief, John Hemingway. Officers of the company: Foreman, M. R. Snyder; Assistant Foreman, Coulter Cannon; Engineer, Henry C. Bonnell; First Assistant, Dr. John J. Case; Second Assistant, Stephen Norris; Third Assistant, Charles S. Steele; Stoker, Charles McCollum; Assistant, John Massaker. Twenty-eight members were appointed, but only the following served: L. L. Davenport, C. K. Foster, C. M. Woodruff, W. D. Steele, I. L. Hallock, William F. Howell, Andrew Phillips, William Farrell, George Wintermute, Wesley Trusdell, G. B. Dunning, George France, Peter Hough, J. D. Simmons, Thomas E. Smith, G. W. Dawkins, Theodore Simonson.

At the first meeting, October 2d, the organization was completed by the election of C. K. Foster as secretary, and W. D. Steele treasurer. W. S. Layton was also elected stoker, in place of Charles McCollum resigned. October 17th a constitution and by-laws were adopted, and twenty new members elected to take the place of those who refused to serve.

The steamer arrived October 9th, and the day following a public trial took place. Horizontal streams were thrown 265 and 229 feet, through 150 and 800 feet of hose, and a perpendicular stream over 218 feet.

At the first annual meeting of the company, held Oct. 3, 1874, Henry C. Bonnell was elected foreman, and was re-elected yearly for six years, until October, 1880. At the last annual meeting, having become exempt by seven years' service, he declined a re-election, and a committee consisting of Charles E. Demarest, Richard Redhead, and F. Ingersoll was appointed to draft resolutions, which were handsomely engrossed and presented to him.

The present officers of the company are as follows: Foreman, R. F. Goodman, succeeding Coulter Cannon as assistant foreman in 1877, the latter at that time being appointed assistant chief engineer; Assistant Foreman, Charles E. Demarest; Secretary, William H. Nichols; Treasurer, Richard Redhead. M. R. Snyder was appointed assistant chief engineer November, 1874, and served until the summer of 1877. Charles S. Steele, the present engineer, has faithfully served the company in that capacity for six years, being re-elected each year without opposition.

The following have also served as officers since the organization:

Secretaries.—Charles M. Woodruff, Charles D. Thompson, I. L. Hallock, John P. Pellet, Charles E. Demarest.

Treasurers.—C. K. Foster, R. F. Goodman, C. S. Steele, Harry Lindsley.

Assistant Engineers.—C. M. Woodruff, Jacob Bryant, George Demarest, R. F. Goodman, Fred Loges, Frank Losee, John R. Booth.

Stokers.—William S. Layton, Fred Loges, Frank Losee.
Assistant Stokers.—Fred Loges, Frank Losee, Wallace Myers.

RITTATINNY HOSE COMPANY.

Oct. 24, 1873, twenty members were appointed by the foreman of the steamer company to act as hosemen, with Wesley Trusdell as foreman. The hosemen had charge of a large two-wheeled jumper.

Both companies held meetings together, and were virtually one company. Mr. Trusdell held the foremanship until October, 1876, when George Vangilder was elected, with E. B. Wilkinson as assistant foreman.

At the annual meeting in 1878 the hose company withdrew from the steamer company, and became a separate company. The officers were George Vangilder, Foreman; Lewis M. Morford, Assistant Foreman; I. L. Hallock, Secretary; John C. Howell, Treasurer. These officers were continued in office until January, 1880, when Lewis M. Morford was elected foreman, and Harry O. Ryerson assistant foreman.

The present officers are: Foreman, Harry O. Ryerson; Assistant Foreman, I. L. Hallock; Secretary, Isaac De Kay; Treasurer, James E. Baldwin.

In September, 1879, the hose company purchased a fine parade-carriage of Humeau Steamer Company, of Easton. The original cost of the carriage is reported at $2500, and it was at one time owned by a Philadelphia company. It was on exhibition at the Centennial in Philadelphia in 1876, and took the first premium.

Sept. 16, 1874, the steamer company visited Morristown and participated in the annual parade of that department as the guests of Independent Hose Company. The following Christmas a committee of the steamer company visited Morristown and presented the Independents with a handsome silver pitcher.

Oct. 8, 1875, the department held its first parade. Independent Hose Company of Morristown and Hoboken Steamer Company, No. 1, participated, the former the guest of the steamer company, and the latter of the hand-engine company, No. 4, which had been reorganized with E. A. Vernon as foreman, and M. R. Shiner as assistant foreman. The parade was witnessed by over 7000 people.

On Christmas day, 1875, a committee from Independent Hose Company of Morristown visited Newton and presented the steamer company with a handsome pair of silver parade-trumpets.

Oct. 2, 1879, the steamer company participated in the annual parade of the Middletown, N. Y., firemen as the guests of Monhagen Hose Company. The same day Kittatinny Hose Company were the guests of Independent Hose Company of Morristown, and participated in the annual parade at that place.

Jan. 30, 1880, a committee from the steamer company visited Middletown and presented Monhagen Hose Company with a handsome swinging silver pitcher and goblets.

March 15, 1880, a committee of Kittatinny Hose Company visited Morristown and presented Independent Hose Company with a set of beautiful jardinières.

Feb. 19, 1880, Chief Engineer Crook was presented with an elegant gold badge by Kittatinny Hose Company.

Sept. 30, 1880, the department celebrated its seventh year of service—known as “exempt year”—by a grand parade. Visiting companies were present from Middletown and Warwick, N. Y., Dover, Morristown, and Hoboken. The parade was one of the most imposing that ever occurred in Northern New Jersey. The public and private buildings were bedecked with bunting and flags. At least 6000 people, coming from all parts of Sussex, Morris, Warren, and Orange Counties, witnessed the parade. The visiting companies were handsomely entertained by the home firemen, including the hand-engine company, No. 4, which had been again reorganized, with John M. Law as foreman.

Jan. 4, 1881, a delegation of Independent Hose Company of Morristown visited Kittatinny Hose Company, and presented them with a beautiful marble clock and side ornaments, valued at $100.

EXEMPT FIREMEN.

The following is a list of the firemen who were exempt at the time of the parade, Sept. 30, 1880: Chief Engineer Crook, Assistant Chief Cannon, Foreman H. C. Bonnell, Engineer Charles S. Steele, C. K. Foster, W. D. Steele, I. L. Hallock, W. F. Howell, G. B. Dunning, George Frace.

Up to Feb. 1, 1881, the following additional members had become exempt: Thomas G. Bunnell, Joseph Pool, Jacob Bryant, Richard F. Goodman, J. W. Crigar, Ira Moore, Jr., Thomas Ryerson, Henry N. Dunlap, George Van Gilder, George Wilkinson, Edward Williams, Charles D. Thompson, George Hardin, Lewis M. Morford.

FIRES.

From the organization of the department, in 1873, up to Feb. 1, 1881, forty alarms were responded to, as follows: 1873, 3; 1874, 3; 1875, 3; 1876, 4; 1877, 1; 1878, 4; 1879, 3; 1880, 15.* Two of the alarms were out of town,—one at Andover, the other at Branchville. The former was responded to, but for the latter place no transportation could be procured.

The fire in 1877 was at Clark's furniture store, on Park Place; two firemen were injured by a falling wall. Seven men, in charge of the pipe on Simonson's law-office roof, had a narrow escape from death. The minutes of the company say, “Foreman H. C. Bonnell noticed the swaying of the wall and ordered the men from the roof. While three of the men were still on the ladder the wall fell, crushing through the roof just left by the firemen, and instantly killing S. Halstead Shafer, who was in the office.” Theodore Morford and Hubbard Stevens, who were in the office with Mr. Shafer, had a narrow escape. Both were seriously injured, and were confined to their homes for several weeks.

Oct. 6, 1880, the most destructive conflagration since the organization of the department occurred. At 9.10 P.M. a fire broke out in the barn of Huston & Van Blarcom, in the rear of their store, and fanned by a high wind, spread rapidly, consuming the carpenter-shop of S. S. Cook and three adjoining stables, including James L. Northrup's livery-stable. At one time thirteen buildings were on fire, and it was feared the whole block of stores would be destroyed, with the Cochran House. The firemen were compelled to fight the fire behind a barricade, owing to the intense heat. The property saved on this occasion alone more than repaid the whole cost of the steamer and department since its organization.

The department has lost but one active member, Marion N. Smith, a member of Kittatinny Hose Company.

CHARLES CROOK.

Benjamin and Mary (Taylor) Crook, the parents of Charles, were both born in Chatham, county of Kent, England,—the former in 1800, the latter in 1806,—

* The Andover fire is not recorded, and also three other alarms,—one at Mr. Hill's house, in South Newton, one at the old Methodist Episcopal church, on Division Street, and one caused by the burning of wood along the Sussex Railroad track.

and married in the city of London, where they resided for a time afterwards, and in 1829 emigrated to America, bringing their only son, Alfred, then about one year old, with them. They settled at Middletown

Charles Crook

Point, now Matawan, Monmouth Co., N. J., where Mr. Crook carried on the business of a baker until his decease, in 1843. His wife died in February, 1881. They had three children born in Matawan,—Charles, Eliza, and Thaddeus,—all of whom are living.

Charles Crook was born June 7, 1831, and during his minority served an apprenticeship as a marble-cutter. He married, February, 1852, Mary A. Vaughan, of Hightstown, N. J., who has borne him two children,—viz., William A. and Charles B. In 1854 he removed to Newton, N. J., and after working for a short time for the estate of Daniel Baker, carrying on the marble business left by him at his death, he purchased and has since continued to manage it. He became a member of the "Neptune Fire Company, No. 3," of Newton, in 1855; shortly afterwards was elected foreman, which position he filled with great credit until he was elected chief engineer, a few years afterwards, and has discharged the duties of this office since.

Mr. Crook's service in the department has been so efficient and so satisfactory to the people of Newton and members of the fire department that to write a history of his connection with the company, narrating his fearlessness in times of extreme danger, his promptness to every call, his superior judgment in times of difficulty, in planning the work of the company to quench the destructive element and save property, is to give a complete account of the fire department since he became connected with it.

BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

Feb. 24, 1876, the firemen organized a Firemen's Benevolent Association, under the laws of the State. The officers were: President, George Hardin; Vice-President, Henry C. Bonnell; Secretary, George Van Gilder; Treasurer, W. D. Steele. There are also three trustees, one elected each year for a term of three years. Since 1877 the officers have been: President, Henry C. Bonnell; Vice-President, R. F. Goodman; Secretary, George Van Gilder; Treasurer, Charles S. Steele, since 1878.

The funds of the association, up to Jan. 1, 1881, amounted to $450, which is derived from the insurance companies paying to the treasurer two per cent. on the amount of risks taken in the town. The fund can be used only for benevolent purposes.

FIRE WARDENS.

The officers of the fire wardens the first year were: Foreman, James W. Crigar; Assistant, David Couse, Jr.; Clerk, Andrew H. Konkle; Treasurer, Samuel Johnson. The present officers (1881) are: Foreman, David Couse; Assistant Foreman, Hiram C. Clark; Clerk, Andrew H. Konkle; Treasurer, M. R. Snyder.

FIRE PATROL.

"The Board of Fire Patrol of the Newton Fire Department" was organized June 7, 1875, and reorganized Feb. 23, 1880. It is established under a legislative enactment approved March 14, 1879. This defines the duty of the fire patrol "to be present at all fires within the limits of such fire department, and take charge of all goods and chattels that may be removed from buildings in consequence of such fire, and keep the same under their care and protection until the same can be delivered to the owners thereof, and shall, during the continuance of such fire . . . have the power of constables, and may arrest, without warrant, any person interfering with said goods, and take such person before any justice of the peace of the county where apprehended, to be dealt with according to law."

The members of the patrol, with the dates of their election, are:

June 7, 1875.—James W. Crigar, Frank M. Ward, Hiram C. Clark, George Hardin, Charles Arvis, Thomas Decker, Samuel Johnson, Simeon S. Cook, Thomas G. Bunnell, Whitman D. Steele.

April 15, 1879.—David Couse, Jr., Andrew H. Konkle, and Andrew J. Van Blarcom.

Feb. 23, 1880.—Lewis Cochran, Martin R. Snyder.

Oct. 4, 1880.—Henry Huston, Charles L. Ingle, John N. Clark, Robert T. Johnson, Theodore Morford.

The officers are as follows: James W. Crigar, Foreman; David Couse, Jr., Assistant Foreman; Andrew H. Konkle, Clerk; Samuel Johnson, Treasurer; Martin R. Snyder and George Hardin, Auditing Committee.

IX.—HOTELS.

The first inns were those of Henry Hairlocker and Thomas Woolverton, who were licensed in 1753 at the first court held in the county. Of that of the former there is nothing known further than the fact already stated. Of that of the latter there is a better knowledge. What names it may have borne before or who may have been the intervening landlords (if any) is not known, but it was later called the "County Hotel," and was kept by Isaac Bassett, whose wife was a Woolverton. He was succeeded by Daniel Harker (who moved the building), the Widow Mackey, Benjamin T. Hunt, Theodore Allison, David D. Chandler, Samuel Rorbach, Andrew Shiner, Mr. Holloway, John Stoll, and Redmond Ward. It stood facing the park and burned down in 1857, at which time William Fox was proprietor.

In 1815, Job Bates kept a tavern in a yellow house on Main Street, facing the green, where are now the residences of Dr. R. A. Sheppard and Mrs. A. Cummins. It was a frame with a brick front, and was burned down about 1874.

The "Gold Eagle Hotel" was kept by William I. Bassett from 1817, or earlier, until 1820, or later. In the fall of 1827 it was removed to make room for the present residence of Charles L. Inslee.

Jason King opened a tavern in 1820. It was kept later by his brother Justus; then by Lewis De Camp, Moore Armstrong, John Warbasse, R. Washer, and David Cox. Redmond Ward was proprietor about 1857, and his daughter Maria was his successor; she married Peter Hoppaugh, and it later became the Hoppaugh House.

The "Phillips Hotel," now a part of the Durling House, was kept in 1818 by Hezekiah Phillips and his brother Joseph. They also owned a 50-acre tract of land, a saw-mill, distillery, and tannery.

COCHRAN HOUSE.

The "Cochran House" was erected in 1842 by Dennis Cochran, then owner of considerable real estate along Spring Street. The first landlord was Isaac Bassett; his successors have been Nathan Drake, Dennis Cochran, Sherwood & Conger, Newman E.

Benjamin, Jacob Konkle, Thomas Armstrong, Sherwood & Haynes, Sherwood, Henry M. Ward, Ward & Kelsey, Henry M. Clark, John N. Clark in 1879, the present host.

The "Anderson House" was converted into a hotel about 1852, and its first proprietor was Newman E. Benjamin.

The "Ward House," Henry Ward, below the courthouse, was in 1857 transformed into a hotel by Dr. Franklin Smith.

The "National Hotel," near the depot, and built by Jacob Cummins, was opened as a hotel by him. Jesse Ward was proprietor at one time, also his son, and Col. J. G. Fitts. It is now owned and run by William E. Ricker.

X.—INDUSTRIAL.

Daniel Symmes, son of Judge Timothy Symmes, was a silversmith in Newton during the latter part of the last century. In 1793 he sold a lot near the court-house to John Cleve Symmes,* which established his identity with the place at that time.

In 1820 the principal manufacture of the village was that of hats, in which Pettit Britton and David Kerr were engaged, employing from ten to twenty hands. The factory was located on Church Street.

The first newspaper in Newton—and the first in the county—was the Farmers' Journal and Newton Advertiser, which first appeared Jan. 8, 1796, published by Elliott Hopkins and William Huston. It lived only a few years.†

The first stage from Newton, via Morristown, to Elizabethtown Point, was established by Basset, Britton & Hinchman. It was a two-horse vehicle, and Zephaniah Luce, who was one of the drivers, later became one of the proprietors. The three enterprising proprietors of this line—Isaac Basset, Pettit Britton, and James Hinchman—were all prominent in the early day. It was finally merged into the Owego line.

A saw-mill formerly stood on the Phillips property, later owned by E. C. Moore, deceased. No trace of it except the race-way now exists.

A distillery operated by several different parties was built about 1820. The old still-house is now a barn on the property of the late E. C. Moore.

The first brickyard was located on the Amos Pettit farm, now owned by the Horton estate. In 1818, where now are Francis Gracy's and Widow Mary Johnson's residences was burned the brick for George H. McCarter's (now David Thompson's) house. It was operated only for that special occasion.

* This lot passed through the hands of several celebrated personages. In 1794, Judge John Cleve Symmes conveyed it to his daughter, who became the wife of President William Henry Harrison, and in 1802 it became the property of Judge John Holmes, grandfather of Judge D. S. Anderson. It afterwards came into the possession of Col. Pemberton, who died upon it, in 1817.

† For later established papers see the general chapter upon the "Press of Sussex County."

The steam-mill is said to be the only grist-mill that ever existed in the town of Newton. It was erected in 1850 by Moses Northrup. It was burned, rebuilt, and operated for a while, but has been idle for years.

XI.—MILITARY.

The first company raised in Newton during the war of the Rebellion was recruited in April, 1861. The call for three months' men being filled, this company was not mustered into the service. Most of the men, however, enlisted for three years in Co. D, Third Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, under Capt. Pitts. It is said that inside of one hour seventy-two persons signed the roll on Newton Green.

The original muster-roll of the three months' men is now in the possession of Thomas G. Bunnell, having been recently presented to him by Col. Pitts. It is headed "Muster Roll of Union Company, A Regiment, 4th Brigade." The words in italics are written in the blanks of the printed heading, which briefly records that "The undersigned hereby enlist in the militia of New Jersey, for active service, subject to the commands of the commander-in-chief of New Jersey and of the commander-in-chief of the militia of the United States, for the term of three months, unless sooner discharged."

The names attached thereto are as follows:

Hendershot; 73. Richard Decker; 74. Amos Kimesy; 75. James Syleox; 76. John Bell; 77. Samuel F. Givens; 78. John B. Vanderhoof; 79. Laffery Hanchawont; 80. Jacob S. Smith; 81. John McManus; 82. Israel C. Potter; 83. Elijah Sharp; 84. George E. Brown; 85. Charles Bonnet; 86. James Monaghan; 87. Charles M. Sawson; 88. Adam Drake; 89. Edward Decker.

For the names of those who volunteered and served in the other organizations raised in this town, see the rosters given in connection with the military history in the general chapters of this work.

It may be said in conclusion, however, that no part of the county or State manifested a greater degree of patriotism. It contributed freely and largely of men and money to sustain the government during the late Rebellion.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

WILLIAM PETTIT.

The Pettits were originally French Huguenots, who, to escape from religious persecution, came to America in 1660 and settled at New Rochelle and Newtown, L. I. Some members of the family removed thence to Northern New Jersey, and about 1742 are found in Hardwick, Warren Co., at Newton, and at the Log Jail, now Johnsonsburg.

There were six brothers who came to Sussex County. Jonathan Pettit lived in Hardwick, and died in 1753 (he was one of the four judges for the county who were first appointed by George III.); Amos, who lived in Brighton, was born in 1724; John, who lived in Newton, was born in 1726, and died in 1796; Nathaniel was the first representative of Sussex County, elected Aug. 17, 1772, to the Legislature of New Jersey; Isaac and Charles were Tories, and removed to Canada during the Revolutionary war.

The descendants of John Pettit are the only ones residing in the county at present, the others having all removed. Governor John Jay, of New York, owned a large tract of land northeast of Newton, and, probably because they were the same national descent and co-religionists, he appointed John Pettit his collector of rents and general agent for his property. He erected the stone house on the farm now owned by G. M. Ryerson, in which is a room still called the "Governor's room," which His Excellency occupied in his annual visit to his estates. John Pettit also erected a stone building, known for a hundred years as "The Parsonage." It has been remodeled, and at present belongs to the estate of the late Levi Shepherd. It is the oldest house in Newton. He was one of the first wardens of Christ Church, and served many years in that capacity. His patriotism and integrity may be inferred from the fact that during the Revolution his two Tory brothers were put in his charge by the Committee of Safety, and the custody was faithfully observed till they were permitted to depart for Canada. His wife was a daughter of Richard Fisher, of Hackettstown, who belonged to the light-horse infantry of the American army, and who is said to have erected at Hackettstown and carried on the first iron rolling- and slitting-mills in this country. His children were Samuel, Nathaniel, John, Sally (who became the wife of James English, of Newton), Mary (who became the wife of Alexander Huston), Betsy (who became the wife of James Huston, once a sheriff of Sussex County), Amos, and William.

In the first generation his descendants numbered eight, in the second generation thirty-nine, and in the third ninety-four. Among these are the well-known citizens Winfield H. Cousens, attorney-at-law in Newton; Capt. Robert Pettit, of Montague, who served with honor during the Rebellion; Mrs. James Henry Hoyt and Mrs. George H. Coursen, of Newton; Rev. N. Pettit, rector of Christ Church, Bordentown, N. J.; James H. Simpson, a successful merchant at Dover; James C. Pettit, of the Park Bank, New York City; and Judge James B. Huston, of Lafayette.

William Pettit, youngest child of John, was born March 16, 1788, and married, Feb. 17, 1816, Nancy, daughter of Robert and Mary (Jacques) Morrow, of Sparta, Sussex Co., N. J. She was born Oct. 21, 1794, and resides (in 1881) with her daughter, Mrs. Hoyt, in Newton. Many of the facts contained in this sketch were dictated by her, and she retains the faculties of both body and mind to a remarkable degree for a person who has reached her eighty-seventh year.

The other children of Robert Morrow were Rebecca, a twin-sister of Mrs. Pettit, who became the wife of Nathan Drake, and, having survived her husband many years, resides in Newton; Margaret, who became the wife of Samuel Rorbach; Sally, who became the wife of Henry Hart; Eliza, unmarried; Henrietta, who was the wife of the late Dr. John R. Stuart, a prominent physician of Newton; and George. Of these children, only Mrs. Pettit and Mrs. Drake survive.

Prior to and after his marriage William Pettit was a clerk in the general store of his brother Nathaniel, who for many years before his death did a successful business in Newton.

Upon his brother's decease Mr. Pettit purchased a farm near Newton, where he resided several years, but about 1827 he returned, established himself in trade at the old stand where he served a clerkship, and continued in business until he retired from the active duties of life. His place of business was on the north side of the public square in Newton, where he erected his store and dwelling. Mr. Pettit received a good practical business education in early life, mostly while a clerk, from his brother, who was a man of fair education, and had been for some time a teacher before engaging in mercantile pursuits. He belonged to the class of substantial business men of "long ago," who started very many of the interests that added to the growth and prosperity of Newton as developed in its later history. Unostentatious in his ways, he followed his chosen business quietly, seeking neither official position nor its emoluments. He was identified with the party of reform in his locality, and was a member of the Whig and Republican parties. Mr. Pettit was known as a man of sterling integrity in all his business relations, temperate in his habits, and a man of good moral and Christian influence. Both he and his wife were members of the Episcopal Church of Newton, and did their part well in contributions to church and charitable objects. He died Jan. 1, 1867. Their children are Sarah and Mary, died young; Sarah Elizabeth, born March 6, 1823, married, Sept. 16, 1847, James Henry, son of James Moody Hoyt, of New York City, and has one surviving child, Miss Mary Nesbitt Hoyt. James Moody Hoyt married Mary, a daughter of Dr. Nesbitt, a noted physician, and for many years was a prominent flour-merchant in New York. Upon his death his sons, who had been associated with him, succeeded him in the business, in which James Henry continued until his decease. He was born July 4, 1823, and died Nov. 29, 1869. The only son of William Pettit is Robert Morrow Pettit, who was born Oct. 17, 1824, and resides in Newton.

GEORGE A. HILES.

His great-grandfather came from Germany with his family prior to the Revolutionary war, and settled in the southern part of New Jersey. His grandfather, William Hiles, was born in Southern New Jersey,

Geo. A. Hiles

April 30, 1775, and married Margaret, a daughter of Jacob Titman, of Warren Co., N. J. She was born in April, 1775, and died Jan. 26, 1850. He died Jan. 26, 1848.

Soon after his marriage he came to Lafayette, then called Frankford, and settled on one hundred and sixty acres of land, upon which he resided the remainder of his life. The farm is now owned and occupied by his son Thomas J. He owned considerable other real estate, which was left to his children upon his decease. His children were Anna, who became the wife of Samuel F. McCoy, John, George, William, Jacob, Matilda, who became the wife of James Shelley, Jeremiah M., Eliza, wife of Ford Shelley, and Thomas J.

R. A. Sheppard

ROBERT ALEXANDER SHEPPARD'S grandfather, Henry Sheppard, was a resident of Hunterdon Co., N. J., whose ancestors were among the early settlers of that part of the State. This fact is established by the family having in its possession a deed for land given during the reign of George III., and the property has remained as a homestead in the family since.

His father, Jacob, born near Ringos, Hunterdon Co., about 1794, married, Feb. 22, 1811, Elizabeth Henderson, who was born Nov. 30, 1796, and survives in 1880, residing on the old homestead near Flemington. She was a daughter of Joseph Henderson, a ship carpenter, who came from Ireland, and lived and died in Philadelphia. Her mother was Hopy Henry. Jacob Sheppard died on the homestead, Dec. 3, 1856. He lived a quiet life as a farmer, and was esteemed for his honesty and fair dealing. He was unostentatious in his ways, frank in his manners, and sociable and manly.

The children of Jacob and Elizabeth (Henderson) Sheppard are John, William, Emma (wife of Peter Wilson), Catherine, Joseph F. (a physician at Phillipsburg), Ann (wife of George L. Boss), Samuel S., Robert Alexander, and Margaret.

Robert Alexander Sheppard, son of Jacob and Elizabeth (Henderson) Sheppard, was born in the township of Baritan, Hunterdon Co., N. J., April 2, 1827. His education was obtained in the common school of his native place and at the Flemington Academy. Upon reaching his majority he commenced the study of dental surgery with Dr. J. P. Trux, of Baltimore, Md., with whom he remained for two years, during which time he attended two courses of lectures at the Baltimore Dental College, from which he was graduated in 1850. Immediately after his graduation he began the practice of dentistry in Mauch Chunk, Pa., where he remained only six months, and practiced for a few months also in Schuylkill Haven and Hackettstown.

On June 8, 1852, he came to Newton, N. J., where he found Dr. Swayze practicing dentistry, but a good field for a skillful and thoroughgoing dentist. Here Dr. Sheppard set himself about to lay the foundation for what has proved to be a very successful business. His means were limited to a few dollars, and the support of himself and small family depended upon his immediate success. At this time plates were made upon gold and silver, and not until about 1860 was rubber used as a base upon which to set teeth.

He soon gained the confidence of a few whom he did work for by his careful attention to every department of his profession; his trade increased, and, after a year or more, Dr. Swayze withdrew from Newton entirely, leaving Dr. Sheppard full control of the business here. His energy in business, his careful attention to the interests of his numerous and increasing patrons, and his substantial and skillful work in a few years gave him control of a large patronage in Sussex County, which he has held for nearly thirty years, and has done more to elevate the standard of dentistry than any other one in Sussex County.

Dr. Sheppard is, in 1880, one of the substantial business men of Newton, and since his first settlement here he has been interested in all that pertains to the growth and prosperity of the village.

Upon the organization of the Merchants' National Bank at Newton he was one of the first subscribers to stock and for many years a director, and for several years he has been a stockholder in the Sussex National Bank at Newton.

In 1873 he erected a substantial brick residence on Main Street, in Newton, a part of which he occupies for an office. In August, 1879, he purchased the Cochran House, the leading hotel of the place, to which he is making (in the winter of 1880) a fine brick addition of four stories, and the whole when completed according to present designs will be one of the most desirable parcels of real estate in Newton.

Thus in a few years, by industry and careful management, Dr. Sheppard has, comparatively speaking, from nothing accumulated a valuable property.

He has been somewhat active in local politics, and in 1873 was elected collector of Sussex County. He resigned this office after three years, but by re-election served in the same capacity in 1878 and 1879.

Dr. Sheppard has been married three times. On Oct. 8, 1851, he married Elizabeth A., a daughter of John R. and Lucretia Holcombe, of Flemington, N. J. She died at Newton, Aug. 12, 1855, leaving two children,—Richard H. and Lizzie A. His second wife was Sarah C., daughter of Dennis Cochran, whom he married Oct. 20, 1858, and who died April 22, 1868, leaving one daughter,—Minnie L. He married for his present wife, July 10, 1872, Mary Cochran, a sister of his second wife. The children born of this union are Robert Alexander, Jr., and Frank H.

Pemberton Brittin

THE progenitor of the Brittin family in Sussex Co., N. J., was William Brittin, who was of English birth, and emigrated to America in the year 1700, settling in Pennsylvania. He died April 16, 1765. His wife, Rachel, died Aug. 28, 1766.

His son, William Brittin, Jr., born in Pennsylvania, married Mary Thomas, a native of Wales, and lived to an advanced age. His wife, born in 1714, died Oct. 14, 1780. Their son John, grandfather of our subject, born about 1730, married, June 15, 1772, Phoebe Pettit, who was born in February, 1756, and died in 1776, leaving three children,—Elizabeth, Pettit, and Isaac.

For his second wife he married Martha Gray, who died July, 1811, aged ninety years. The children of this marriage were Thomas, Sarah, Rachel, John, Hannah, and Jacob.

He lived at the Fox-Chase, near Philadelphia, and kept a public-house. He came to New Jersey just before the Revolutionary war, and during the struggle for the independence of the colonies he served as ensign and sergeant in Spencer's regiment. His youngest brother, Joseph, served as one of Washington's body-guard, and two other brothers, Jacob and William, were also in the service, the latter in command of a company as captain. After the close of the war he returned to his native State, where he died in 1811. Benjamin Pettit, a brother of his wife, was also a captain in the Revolutionary war.

Pettit Brittin, son of John Brittin, was born June 12, 1774, at New Providence, N. J., and married for his first wife Elizabeth, a daughter of Judge Levi Adams, of Wantage, who bore him two children,—John, and one who died in infancy.

His second wife was Elizabeth, daughter of George Rorback, of Newton. She was born May 30, 1781, and died June 5, 1868.

The Rorback family was among the earliest settlers of Newton, and by marriage were connected with the most prominent families of Sussex County.

He served under Capt. Kent, in a Philadelphia rifle company, in suppressing the Whisky Rebellion in Western Pennsylvania when a young man.

In 1795, Mr. Pettit Brittin settled in Newton, and from 1815 to the time of his decease, March 13, 1858, carried on a general merchandise business.

He was a man of quiet habits and unostentatious ways, and known by the citizens of Newton as a man of good business ability, discretion, and integrity in all his business relations.

For many years he was a director of the Sussex Bank, and he was always interested in the various local enterprises of Newton and in the welfare of its people.

He was a member of the old Whig party, but no seeker after place or the emoluments of office.

The children of his second marriage are Sarah P., who became the wife of John A. Horton, and Pemberton.

Pemberton Brittin was born at Newton, July 31, 1812, and spent his minority at home. For several years of his early life he was engaged as a clerk for his father; was with John A. Horton as clerk at Newark, N. J., and in 1835 he was a clerk in New York City.

After spending some time South, he returned to Newton, his native place, where he has since resided in the old homestead built by his father in 1811, located on the south side of the public park.

Mr. Brittin was never married. He has spent his later years in the quiet management of his own business, avoiding all strife of a political nature or otherwise, neither soliciting nor desiring official position. Following in the political line of his ancestors, he was formerly a member of the Whig party, and joined the Republican party upon its organization.

Of these children, John, father of our subject, was born on the homestead in Lafayette, Oct. 18, 1799, and married Miss Hila Maria, daughter of John Seward, of Morris Co., N. J., Oct. 21, 1826. She was born Nov. 27, 1807, and died April 16, 1869. He died Nov. 23, 1847.

Mrs. Hiles was a second cousin of Hon. William H. Seward, and a granddaughter of Col. John Seward, a brave officer during the Revolutionary war, who shot the English spy at Snuffdown during that trying struggle.

John Hiles resided on a farm adjoining the homestead, which he purchased of his father. He was a careful, judicious farmer, and during his active business career accumulated a fair competency. Both he and his wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

He was naturally of a retiring disposition; did not seek any political place among his fellow-men, although, as a member of the Democratic party, he always had a pride in the right of suffrage accorded to every loyal American citizen. His children who reached manhood are two sons,—Thomas S., born May 16, 1837, married Mary B., daughter of Peter and Elizabeth (Couse) Dennis, Jan. 5, 1859, and has three children: Florence I., Maria S., and John Jay. He owns and resides upon the farm formerly owned by Mr. Hill in the township of Audover, which he purchased in November, 1876.

George A. Hiles was born July 14, 1834, and remained at home until he was twenty-four years of age. His early education was obtained at Mount Retirement Seminary and at Seward Institute, Florida, Orange Co., N. Y. For some four years after leaving home he was a clerk in a produce commission jobbing house at Newton, and for some twelve years following he carried on a jobbing business in the same articles in New York City. In 1873 he returned to Newton, where he has since resided.

Mr. Hiles has been successful as a business man, and by his judicious management has secured a fair competency. Since his return from New York he has been engaged in the care and management of his own private affairs, seeking neither the preferment nor emoluments of office. He has never been married.

W A N T A G E . °

I.—DESCRIPTIVE.

WANTAGE is the largest of the townships of Sussex County, having an area of 41,353 acres, and a total population of 3361. It is 11 miles long and 7 miles broad, much of this land being highly cultivated and productive. The total valuation of real estate in the township is $1,829,396, and of the personal property $817,707, its personal indebtedness being $673,671. It is one of the townships lying adjacent to the New York State line, and is bounded on the north by Orange Co., N. Y.; south by Lafayette, Frankford, and Hardyston; east by Vernon and Hardyston; west by Montague, the townships on the eastern boundary being separated from it by the Walkkill River.

II.—NATURAL FEATURES.

In connection with this history it will be interesting to afford the reader a concise account of the geography and natural advantages of the region of which Wantage is a part. The whole valley, more than 100 miles in length and varying in breadth from 10 to 20 miles, was called the Kit-a-ting valley by the Indians who first inhabited it. It extends from the Delaware River on the southwest to the Hudson on the northeast, and is bounded on the west by the Blue Mountain, or rather a spur of the great chain of that name, and which was originally called the "Kittatinny Mountain." On the east is the Hamburg or Schooley's Mountain, the Indian name of which is Wawayanda. This valley contains nearly four counties,—Warren, Sussex, Orange, and Ulster on this side the Hudson. This is indeed but a section of one of the finest valleys in the Union, extending into Pennsylvania on the one side and into the New England States on the other.

The principal rivers are the Paulinskill and the Walkkill, having their sources nearly at the same point in Sussex County, and pouring the first into the Delaware and the second into the Hudson near Kingston.

The face of this valley is uneven,—in some portions exceedingly so,—but the soil is generally strong, good for grain, and peculiarly fine for grazing. For its large dairies and excellent butter it is unrivaled. This valley may be said "to flow with milk and honey." It was not, however, so regarded by the first emigrants, who deemed much of the land scarcely worth possessing. As an illustration of this may be mentioned that of one of the finest farms in the county a Mr. Winfield selected about 15 acres, then in a wild state, which he judged might answer for tilling, and a Mr. Cortwright found about ten acres in another place which he thought suitable for the plow. The first emigrants selected the flat lands along the creeks and rivers as the best adapted to farming purposes. This was natural, having been accustomed to the lowlands of Holland, from whence they came to this country and place.

Connected with this valley is the Mamakating Hollow, down which flows the beautiful Rosendall and its tributaries, emptying into the Walkkill. "Mamakating" is said to mean "the valley of the dividing of waters." It is in this valley that the Neversink, emptying into the Delaware, and the Lackawanna, which discharges itself into the Rosendall, both rise in the same fountain. And so likewise the Sandkill and Basha's Kill originate in the same spring in this valley. If it would serve to recover this significant Indian name and preserve a knowledge of its meaning, it might be mentioned, also, that a branch of Paulinskill and the Papakating rise in the same fountain and part in different directions.

The Indian word "kating" meant "dividing of waters" or "the waters of strife," which is countenanced by the above facts, the termination in each name being the same, and in each valley one fountain originates two streams, descending in opposite directions,—on the one side to the Delaware, and on the other to the Hudson.

These two valleys were the principal gorges along which the early emigrants were dispersed after leaving the mother-colony at Kingston. Kingston was a connecting link between many of the original families that settled along the Walkkill and in the Mamakating Hollow, where their descendants are still found. This fact holds the two colonies in such close affinity, at the first, as in a great measure to identify their early history. A range of the Kittatinny Mountain was the only barrier between the fertile valley along which proceeded the two collateral and enterprising colonies, making "the wilderness and solitary place to bud and blossom as the rose."

Scarcely in the Union, or in the world perhaps, is there to be seen a richer or more picturesque landscape than presents itself to the eye as you ascend the Wawayanda or the noble Kittatinny, where the immense valley opens the distant perspective, bestudded with cottages, hamlets, and villages embossed in outstretching lawns and fields waving with the rising harvest.

The township of Wantage embraces that portion of the Kittatinny valley which lies between the Pochuck Mountains on the east and the Blue Mountains on the west. This part of the valley is not a level surface, but interspersed by several low ranges of hills, with valleys of considerable extent between.

Two streams drain these sub-valleys and pour their waters into the Walkkill, having previously formed a union. These streams run in opposite directions, and together form nearly a straight line from north to south through the township. The northern stream has its source near the New York State line, and runs south through the exceedingly productive valley called the "Clove" to the village of Deckertown. Here it unites with the Papakating, a stream of nearly the same volume, but rising in the adjoining township of Frankford. This stream runs almost due north until it unites with the Clove Creek, just described, after which it turns east, and eventually empties into the Walkkill.

The soil of the township may be technically described as composed of argillaceous slate and diluvium deposit, and is, according to the theory of a former State geologist, an upheaval of the third series from the bottom of a former sea. It is a soil eminently adapted to the dairy business and to agricultural purposes.

III.—EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

As to the time when the township of Wantage began to be inhabited by the whites, and who the first families were that removed within its borders, no accurate account can be given. It is extremely improbable that there were civilized men here one hundred and fifty years ago, though this fact cannot be stated with positive certainty. Some few families came into the township as early as any settlement was effected at the Forks of the Delaware. Of these were the Cortwrights, Winfields, Deckers, Titsworths, Middaughs, and Cuddabachs,—perhaps, also, the Westbrooks, Wilsons, and Adams, though the presence of the latter families at this early date is involved in some uncertainty.

It is thought that as late as 1780 there were not more than seventy families in the town. As these families may very properly be considered as ancestors to the rising generation, a catalogue of their names will very appropriately begin this part of our history. It will at least serve as a respectful inscription to their memory and a pleasing relic to their descendants. A threefold division in time will mark with sufficient accuracy the periods when they settled in this region.

1st. Those who were here one hundred and forty years ago or more were the Messrs. Decker, Cortwright, Winfield, Titsworth, Middaugh, Cuddabaeh, Westbrook, Wilson, Adams, Wyker, Brink, Koykindall, Crowell, Beemer.

2d. Those who were here one hundred years ago were the Messrs. Strader or Strouder, Criger, Conulus, Snook, Kymer, Bockover, Sebold, De Witt, De Puy, Cox, McCoy, Roloson, Collum, Skellinger, Longcor, Elston, Davenport, Cole, Rittenhouse, Chimers, Ayres, Sayre, Vanfleet, Gomo, Martin, Hains, Swazy, Lewis, Colt, Tims, Hough, Casky, Stephens, Nightengill, Newman, Westfall.

3d. Those whose settlement in this region will range from eighty to one hundred years ago were the Messrs. Vansickle, Swartz, Rutan, Wintermute, Carr, Rogers, Watson, Havens, Phillips, Dunning, Crowell, Compton, Baxter, Vanauken, Struble, Dunn, Williams, Shepherd, Quick, Richards, Smith, Evans, Rosen- crantz.

The descendants of these families are to a great extent resident in this region, and constitute a large majority of the inhabitants of Wantage.

The whole line of settlements along the Walkkill up to this point, with few exceptions, and along the Rosendall until we reach the Delaware in that direction, are two limbs of the same parent stock, the root of which must be sought in the countries of Europe. The early emigrants comprising the series of settlements alluded to are, with few exceptions, either of Dutch or French origin, as their names sufficiently indicate.

A few German families found their way here directly from Germany. There are also in the township several families—a few that are ancient, and some more recent—who are descended from the Pilgrim Fathers, who fled to this country for the love of civil and religious liberty.

The first white settler of whom any authentic facts are known was Peter Decker, who came from the Neversink settlement in 1740 and chose a spot of ground where now stands the growing village of Deckertown.* Upon this he erected a log abode, which was occupied during his lifetime, and passed by descent to his son, who also made it his residence. Peter Decker is the progenitor of all the family of the name now residing in the township. Joseph, one of his sons, resided early at the Clove, where he erected the first grist-mill and was an extensive farmer. His children were Bowdewine, Abram, William, Famitje, and Margaret. The sons lived and died in the township. Famitje married Ephraim Kilpatrick, grandfather of Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, and Margaret was united to Seth Wickham. Bowdewine, one of the sons, was, during his lifetime, a prominent citizen of Wantage. John B. Decker, a venerable resident of the township, is a great-grandson of Peter and a son of Bowdewine Decker.

William Titsworth (formerly spelled Titsoord), the earliest representative of a pioneer Wantage family, with his household, escaped from the massacre in Schenectady, N. Y., and by invitation of friendly Minisink Indians removed to a home situated on the elbow of the Neversink. On June 3, 1700, he received a deed of land from the Indians during his residence there. While the French and Indian war was in progress he left the Neversink settlement and located in Wantage, upon land where his descendants have since resided. Among the latter are William, Wallace W., and Alfred, who are all residing upon ancestral estates.

The Dewitt family came early to the township, and located on the Jacob W. Dewitt farm. The pioneer of the family was Moses Dewitt, who served in the Indian wars and participated in the Minisink slaughter, in which he displayed marked bravery. He was a captain of militia, and a considerable landowner in the township. Jacob and Soferein Dewitt located in Wantage, and Samuel removed to the West. The family is still largely represented in the township. Evi Dewitt is one of the oldest residents of Wantage, being now in his ninety-second year. Moses and Jacob are also prominent citizens of the county. There are twenty-four grandchildren, most of whom reside on adjacent lands.

Capt. Elias Cooper was a native of Fishkill, N. Y., and became a resident of Sussex County in April, 1812. His maternal uncle, Dominic Elias Van Benschoten, owned large landed estates and other property, which came by inheritance to Capt. Cooper. The representatives of the family now in Wantage are John J. Cooper, Dr. Charles A. Cooper, and Dr. Daniel W. Cooper. Dr. Charles A. Cooper, who is a son of the captain, for a score of years followed his profession in the township.

Among other prominent physicians of an early date were Drs. Berret Havens, John Titsworth, and Alexander Linn.

Moses Coykendall was born in 1767, and came early to the township. He married Hannah, daughter of Samuel Decker, and had many children. The late Simeon Coykendall, attorney, of Deckertown, was his grandson. Many representatives of the family still reside in the township.

Samuel Coykendall was born near Beemerville in 1752, and served with distinction throughout the Revolutionary war. His son, Gabriel Coykendall, is still a resident of Deckertown.

The Martin family were early residents of Middlesex County, from whence they emigrated to the southern portion of the township, the pioneer of the family having been Humphrey Martin. The representatives of this family have for many generations been actively identified with the progress of the township. A more detailed sketch of its members will be found elsewhere.

James Cuddeback was a descendant of an ancient Dutch family of Esopus, and first settled in Wantage in 1770. He came from Minisink and selected a small tract of land, where he built his cabin of logs. He then brought his Dutch wife and began the work of clearing the wilderness. He was famous as a hunter and trapper, and would frequently start for a campaign of three months in the forests of the Delaware. He would invariably return laden with bear, wolf, and other skins of much value as the trophies of his skill, the proceeds of which assisted in the payment of his lands. He later raised large quantities of wheat. The first market for that commodity was at Goshen. Several farmers would join together for protection and go down with six or eight loads. By industry and close economy he bought and paid for tract after tract, until he got together about 400 acres. After his first cabin got old and he had paid for his land he concluded to build a new one, and did erect a spacious mansion for the times. It was about 16 by 24, two stories high, with a cellar under it, built of hewn logs. He also bought and owned the Perry mill-property. His last purchase was a large tract of land in the Holland Purchase, on Lake Ontario, where his sons moved after his death. The homestead remained for a long time in the hands of his executors, but was finally purchased by Lewis Whitaker.

* Edsall, in his "Centennial Address," gives the date of 1731 as the time of Peter Decker's advent in Wantage.

George Backster was an early settler, and followed his profession of surveying, in which his services were much in demand. Until 1800 the meadow in front of his house was a vast swamp and a secure refuge for bears, wolves, and other animals. Through the industry of its owner it was later converted into a fruitful field. Mr. and Mrs. Backster both died during 1817, and were interred in the same grave.

The farm adjoining Mr. Backster's was settled at an early day by a Mr. Pierce, who sold his improvement to a Mr. Southworth, and he to Abram Coursen, a tanner by trade, who, having capital and enterprise, improved the place rapidly, built a large dwelling-house, barn, and the necessary buildings for carrying on his trade. Mr. Coursen conducted his business on an extensive scale, bark having been plenty and no tannery was then nearer than Newton. He also employed a large force of skilled laborers to work up the leather for customers. The supply of water was furnished by a spring not far distant, which also conveyed it to the dwelling by means of an aqueduct.

George McCoy came from Bucks Co., Pa., in 1754, purchased land, and erected upon it a log cabin. His first clearing was a tract of land on the east and south side of the meadow, in front of the house, and the sandy gravelly vales where he cultivated his corn, wheat, and other grains necessary for family use. Being away from ready markets, it was natural to resort to every available means to defray current expenses, and, game being plenty and furs high and light to carry, he devoted his time to hunting and trapping. Being uncommonly expert at such business, he realized large sums for his peltry, as it was then called.

Among the settlers on the west side of the Papakating was a family named Smith, embracing the patriarch of the tribe and his nephews, Hector and Malcom Smith. They at once erected their log cabin and improved the land surrounding it. Hector for many successive seasons taught school in a building on the west bank of the brook. The last time he taught, when engaged in his usual routine of duty, he was closing the exercises for the day; while giving out the spelling-lesson he fell from his chair with a scream and groan that like a shock of electricity affected the whole school. Many ran off screaming, and others, with more fortitude, stayed by him until the neighbors came and bore him home. He revived from the paralytic shock, and lived some months afterwards. His nephew, Malcom, raised a family, and died about 1800.

The Dunn family were early represented in the township, Daniel, the first to locate in the county, having come from Piscataway, N. J., before the Revolution and located on a tract of land now owned by Oscar Dunn, and which has been generally known as the homestead. Charlotte, the wife of Nicholas Cox, is a granddaughter of Daniel Dunn, and resides in the township.

Zachariah Hoffman located in Wantage soon after the Revolutionary war, near what is known as Van Sickletown. He married Sarah De Witt, to whom four children were born,—James, Zachariah, Cornelius, and Mary. James continued his residence in Wantage, where his descendants still live. Zachariah, who died in the township, was the father of Ira D. Hoffman. Horace D. Hoffman and Mrs. Thomas N. Rolosen are children of Ira D. Hoffman.

Samuel Whitaker was born in Unionville, N. Y., in 1796, having been an early merchant at Beemerville, and later at Deckertown, where his death occurred in 1871. He was a man of much influence in the latter place, which owed much of its progress to his business energy. He was early married to Miss Margaret Adams, of Wantage, and two of his children now reside in Deckertown,—Jonathan A. Whitaker and Mrs. Jacob E. Hornbeck.

The Kilpatrick family, of which Gen. Judson Kilpatrick is a distinguished representative, are among the oldest settlers in Wantage. The members of this family are further referred to elsewhere.

The Wilson family are of Scotch descent, and have resided for many years in the township. Andrew Wilson, the earliest representative, was born in Scotland, and emigrated to America in early life. He served in the battle of Ticonderoga, was badly wounded, and retired to Wantage, where he followed farming pursuits. He had fifteen children, a portion of whom settled in the township. Most of the family followed farming pursuits, and for a succession of years cultivated the same land. Many of its members still reside in the township.

Soferin Westbrook came from Kingston and located upon the place now occupied by Jacob Westbrook. His son John, better known as the "Blind Captain," served with credit in the war of the Revolution. The homestead has been for many years in possession of the family.

John McCoy, a brother of George, already mentioned, came from Bucks Co., Pa., at the same time, and chose land on the east side of the Papakating stream. The following graphic description of his settlement, and the primitive methods employed in the construction of the early dwelling, given by his grandson, Simeon McCoy, and written nearly thirty years ago, will be of especial interest here:

"My grandfather, John, chose the east side of the stream, and George the west side, opposite nearly to each other. John built his first log house on the rock now covered by William McCoy's granary and carriage-house, and began clearing up the land to raise something to support himself and rising family; and by industry and perseverance the forest was opened around him, and in a few years he had quite an improvement, so that he began to have herds of cattle, and flocks of sheep, and horses. He had also sons and daughters to help indoors and out. Others coming in, the settlement advanced; produce and all kinds of stock commanded a high price, and was bought up and driven away by speculators beyond the mountains south of the valley. After paying for his first tract he took up another, and as his means increased he bought more land, until he had about 1000 acres all in one body, and he, like the patriarchs of old, in the centre, his sons and daughters settled around him. As his family increased and grew up he found his log house was too small for their accommodation, and he built another near to the first, leaving a passage of 5 or 6 feet between them, through which, and mounting up a ladder, they entered the chambers through a passage made by sawing off the logs; the shingle roofs were joined together, so as to cover the passage-way between them. They were not costly mansions, yet the erection of one did require two skillful axemen, one on each corner, to cut the notch and fit them to their place. I have been to several such raisings in my boyish days. After the neighbors had assisted the owner in laying up the logs the shingles were prepared by selecting some giant red-oak in the forest that was sound and straight-grained, as the shingle-men called it. It was cut down, sawed in shingle lengths, split into bolts, and with a tool called a free split and shaved fit for putting on the roof. A carpenter was then called to put them on, make the doors and windows, lay the floors, etc. The owner and his boys did the mason-work by chinking between the logs with split pieces of wood, plastering over with clay, laying up a wide back with stones as high as the beams, and carrying the chimney above the roof with split sticks laid in clay mortar, and well plastered with the same. Generally there were no jams; the back projected six or eight inches inward, and a large stone hearth joined up to the back; thus they saved all the room, and a log could be rolled on as big as three or four stout boys could handle,—and thus in a few days after the logs were on the ground the house could be built and occupied. His barn and stables were large, built of logs, and the roof made of straw, as was the custom in those days. He built the first saw-mill ever erected in this settlement, and had a complete monopoly of that kind of business for many years. In the house thus described he lived to a good old age, and saw his children settled around him on lands purchased by their joint efforts solely by agricultural pursuits. He settled his oldest son on the farm now owned by James Shelley. My father, Samuel, went on what was called the Brown place, where the Widow McCoy now lives. He built a house for his son John where J. W. McCoy now lives, and his son James settled on what they called the log-meadow place, now owned by Robert Mabce. He retained his homestead till near his death, and superintended his business, which he carried on largely, especially in breeding fine horses and cattle. I can remember of his having many colts running in the fields unbroken until they were four or five years old. He was of Scotch descent, had no education, but showed his nationality in every trait of his character; of a robust frame and constitution; quick of apprehension, shrewd in business transactions, indefatigable in accomplishing his purposes; a true Whig and bitter enemy of the Tories in Revolutionary times. He suffered great losses by the young government; his flocks and herds were driven off to support the army fighting for liberty, and never got compensation for them in money. A few years before his death he desired his son John to come and build a house and live with him; which request was complied with, and they built the house where William McCoy now lives. Before it was fairly completed he died intestate, and his large estate was divided among his children under the law giving sons two shares and daughters one."

Dr. Heman Allen came from Orange County in 1821 and located near Deckertown. He was a physician, enjoying a large practice, and also followed farming pursuits. He continued his professional labors until ill health compelled their relinquishment, when he retired to private life, and died in his eighty-first year. His daughter, Mrs. Sanford Leach, still resides in Wantage.*

* See biography of Dr. Allen in chapter upon the "Medical Profession of Sussex County," in this work.

Samuel Shelley came from Morris County before the Revolution, and was employed by Bowdewine Decker as a tanner and currier. He later occupied a farm, now owned by James Cox, in the southern portion of the township, where he conducted a tannery. Mr. Shelley afterwards purchased the property now owned by Simon Wilson, and at a later date moved upon the farm at present occupied by Mrs. Samuel Van Druff. He was a man of migratory habits, and made a final removal to the farm now owned by his son, James Shelley, in this township. His death occurred in Sparta, in his one hundred and second year. But two children, a son and a daughter, now reside in the township.

The progenitor of the Ayres family in Wantage was Levi Ayres, who came from Basking Ridge and located in the township, where Enoch Ayres now lives. He erected, about 1755, a dwelling one story in height, filled in with chinking, with boards for ceiling and a fireplace eight feet wide. It also had two large stone chimneys, and hand-made nails were used in its construction. Here the family have for years resided. This structure was demolished in 1854, and a modern dwelling erected by Enoch Ayres in its stead, which is his present residence. Levi Ayres had four sons,—Levi, Edward, Israel, and Enoch,—all of whom lived and died in the township. The sons of Levi were Israel, Levi, Isaac, David, Edward, and Caleb. The sons of Edward were Enoch (one of the lay judges of the county), John, Jehial, and Edward. The sons of Israel were Elisha, Selah, and Israel. The sons of Enoch were John, William, Thomas, Squire, Enoch, and Jefferson. Each had daughters, most of whom married. There are now living in Wantage William and Enoch Ayres, the sons of David, and the children of Levi and William.

Charles Roloson, one of the early settlers of Wantage, was of Dutch descent, and resided on the farm occupied by his son, the late Isaiah Roloson. He was the parent of a numerous family of children, whose descendants are now residents of the township. John V. Roloson, the son of Henry, resides at Beemerville, and others of the family are located near Mount Salem.

The Hornbeck family are of Dutch extraction, and early sought a home in Sussex County. The pioneer to Wantage was Philip Hornbeck, whose son Jacob was one of the early and prominent physicians of the township, and resided during a portion of his life in Sandyston, and also in Montague. He was also a member of the Legislature. Jacob married Esther, daughter of Capt. John I. Westbrook. Their children who reached mature years were John W., Maria, Elizabeth, Cornelius, Margaret, and Jacob E. The latter is a prominent citizen of Deckertown.

The Shepherd family were early residents of the Minisink region. Abram Shepherd fell a victim to the Indian depredations in 1755. His son James, an early blacksmith at Deckertown, purchased later a tract of land $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles southeast of the village, where he pursued his vocation, and also became a tiller of the soil. He was the grandfather of George Shepherd, the present occupant of the homestead, which was erected in 1806 and occupied for years by Henry, father of the latter gentleman. The children of Henry are Jesse, George, Fanny, Lavinia, Lydia Ann, and Mary. The latter two reside at Unionville.

Petrus Swarts was of Holland lineage, and settled in Ulster Co., N. Y., near Kingston, where he died in 1735, leaving five sons and six daughters. One of the sons, Baltus by name, came to Sussex County about 1780, and engaged in farming pursuits, which were followed until his death. Of his large family of children, Jacob Swarts was the eldest. He resided during his lifetime in Montague, where his death occurred in 1879.

William Mott came from Monmouth Co., N. J., in 1755, and, having purchased a tract of land, erected a log cabin. He was an industrious and successful farmer and a skillful hunter and trapper. Mr. Mott had two daughters, whose children, together with an adopted son, inherited the property which was afterwards purchased by Simeon McCoy.

The Cooke family, though not among the oldest settlers in Wantage, merit, from their prominence, a word in this history. Rev. Sylvester Cooke was born in Massachusetts, Aug. 25, 1799, was graduated at Amherst College, and ordained to the ministry in 1829. In 1843 he received a call to the Clove Church, where he remained until 1871, when increasing infirmities rendered his retirement necessary after a pastorate of twenty-eight years.

Mr. Cooke had five sons, all of whom entered the service of the government during the war, and two of whom are buried in the cemetery of the Clove Church. Frederick A. died in the service, June 13, 1864, at the age of twenty-six, while an officer of the Second New Jersey Cavalry. Edwin F. rose to the rank of colonel and brevet brigadier-general, and died at Santiago, Chili, Aug. 6, 1867, while secretary of the United States legation under Gen. Kilpatrick, from disease contracted while confined a prisoner in Libby Prison; he was thirty-two years of age.

Rev. Sylvanus Cooke was one of the respected citizens of Wantage who have left their mark upon the religious, moral, and educational interests of the township.

IV.—SCHOOLS.

Little information is obtainable regarding the earliest schools opened in the township. That portion of the population who were able to incur the attendant expense educated their sons and daughters at the popular classical and boarding schools of the day. The common schools of the township were not of a high grade, and comparatively little was done at an early day to foster education.

The most widely known of the public schools of the township was that opened in the Pond schoolhouse. Many of the children within a radius of several miles received their first lessons here, under the dictation of one Master Gunn. Another school building was located on the site of the present hotel of Benjamin Smith, at Deckertown. It was 20 by 24 feet in dimensions, and was also taught by Master Gunn, or "the old Gunn who shot the boys every time," as he was facetiously described by the scholars. His terms were $1 per scholar for a period of three months. He was followed by Masters Hammill, Wheeler, and Loomis.

At this time the school-houses in some localities of the township were built of logs, though that known as the union school-house, near the Wantage Methodist Episcopal church, was more pretentious in its construction.

WILLIAM RANKIN'S SCHOOL.

In 1833, William Rankin, having realized the lack of opportunities for education in the township, determined to open a select school at Deckertown. So little interest was felt in the enterprise that he with difficulty obtained a room 14 feet square for the purpose. This he rented, and began his first term with a single scholar,—Mr. John A. Whitaker, still a resident of Deckertown.

Mr. Rankin was esteemed as a classical instructor, but the undertaking was regarded by the community as an impracticable one. The school continued for some time with but a single pupil, though the number gradually increased, until the ensuing spring it numbered twenty scholars. From this small beginning it grew to be a power for good, and with its success dawned a new era in educational matters in Sussex County. At the end of ten years over a thousand pupils had sat under his instruction.

Mr. Rankin subsequently taught in Amity, N. Y., after which he removed to Morris County. His later efforts were at Mendham, in that county, where the school he established enjoyed a prosperity fully equal to that of former years.

MOUNT RETIREMENT SEMINARY.

The school familiarly known as Mount Retirement Seminary was established by Edward A. Stiles, whose parents removed from Morris County to Vernon when he was but two years of age. During 1819 they located upon a farm in Wantage, on which their son spent the greater portion of his life as principal of the seminary above named. This school arose from the humblest beginnings. In 1833 half a dozen boys were instructed in a room of the farmhouse, and made such decided progress as to have very soon established the character of Mr. Stiles as a successful teacher. The school soon increased to a size and reputation far beyond his early hopes. For many years it enjoyed an average patronage of seventy-five pupils, and the enterprise was in full vigor when its control was relinquished, in 1865. The graduates of this seminary are to be found in every part of the country, many of them having filled high and responsible public positions.

The education of Mr. Stiles was thoroughly practical in its system, and marked by a considerate kindness that made every pupil his friend. In 1869 he was appointed superintendent of the schools of the county, which position was filled by him with marked ability.*

HARTWELL'S SCHOOL.

The post-office address of Hartwell's School is Unionville, Orange Co., N. Y., from which it is distant one mile, but it is on the New Jersey side of the boundary line between the States, which is also the boundary line of the school premises. It was established in 1867 at Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y., by S. S. Hartwell, the present principal and proprietor, and was removed to its present location two years later.

This school owes its origin to the discontinuance of Mount Retirement Seminary, with which Mr. Hartwell, son-in-law of its founder, Mr. E. A. Stiles, had been for several years connected.

The design was to establish a smaller school than that excellent institution had been, and one to be conducted more upon the plan of a well-regulated family than is possible with a large number of pupils, thus offering the advantages of a thorough preparatory school without some of the objections which parents, desiring to send their sons away, sometimes make to large schools; but, as in the case of that seminary, a retired situation, free from the interruptions and dangers of a town, and eminent for its healthfulness and for the general attractiveness of the surrounding country, was chosen.

It has always been well patronized, drawing its pupils from the near-by counties, from New York City and vicinity, and not infrequently from distant parts of the country, occasionally also from foreign countries. Several young men have been prepared here for Yale and other colleges.

The school territory of the township is divided into eighteen districts, over whom the following teachers preside:

Duna Vale, No. 82, Charles J. Cooper; Dunnings, No. 83, Miss M. A. McMickle; Wolf Pit, No. 84, Miss Maria Depue; Mount Salem, No. 85, Miss Sarah E. Reid; Jacksonville, No. 86, M. D. Coykendall; Coleville, No. 87, ———; Clove, No. 88, T. L. Strong; Rosenkranz, No. 89, Miss Alice Shorter; Libertyville, No. 91, Grant J. Roo; Deckertown, No. 92, H. A. Halsted (principal), Miss Charlotte E. Howell, Miss Anna M. Harlan; Central, No. 93, Charles Armstrong; Van Sickle's, No. 94, William H. Beemer; Woodbourne, No. 95, Carrie E. Hough; Lewisburg, No. 96, C. H. Thurber; Pond, No. 97, James McCue; Blooming Grove, No. 98, Miss Anna McCoy; Union, No. 99, F. T. Smith; Beemerville, No. 100, D. A. Roo.

The total amount received by Wantage township, from all sources, for the support of the above-named eighteen schools, during the school year ending Aug. 31, 1879, was $5344.85,—which may be taken as a fair average of other recent years. The estimated value of school property in the township is given at $14,650.

* See pages 169-175 of this volume for further details of these two renowned schools.

V.—ORGANIZATION.

The township of Wantage was erected as an independent township in May, 1754. It originally extended to the Delaware River, and included the north-west corner of the State, now embraced in the township of Montague.

VI.—CIVIL LIST.

The succeeding list is as complete as the records of the township enable the historian to make it:

FREEHOLDERS.

1852-53, Wm. J. Shorter, James Cox; 1854, James Cox, John B. Adams; 1855, Amos Munson, William Elston; 1856-58, Martin Wilson, William J. Shorter; 1859-61, Azariah Lewis, Jacob W. Dowitt; 1862-63, James Smalley, Jacob W. Dewitt; 1864-65, Uz Van Anken, James Smalley; 1866, Uz Van Anken, William J. Shorter; 1867, William J. Shorter, Joshua Y. Coleman; 1868-69, William Y. Cole, W. J. Shorter; 1870, William P. Cole, Thomas Gray; 1871-72, Isaac P. Mead, Thomas Gray; 1873, Zenas Stambaek, Isaac P. Mead; 1874, Peter J. Swarts, Judson J. Wickham; 1875, Judson J. Wickham, Oren J. Richards; 1876-77, John M. Cox, James Smalley; 1878, Levi C. Deavenport, John M. Cox; 1879, Jacob B. Leport, Levi C. Deavenport; 1880, Benjamin H. Smith, Jacob Swartwout.

TOWNSHIP CLERKS.

1852-53, James Decker; 1854, M. W. Elston; 1855, B. W. Decker; 1856-58, Mordecai Wilson, Jr.; 1859, James Decker; 1860-62, C. F. Dewitt; 1863, Charles A. Wilson; 1864-66, George W. Coe; 1867-70, William T. Wright; 1880, Humphrey Martin, Jr.

ASSESSORS.

1852-53, William Elston; 1854, Madison Coykendall; 1855, William Benjamin; 1856-57, William Van Sickle; 1858-60, John T. Dennis; 1861-63, William Y. Cole; 1864-66, Edward A. Stiles; 1867-72, James Smalley; 1873-78, Moses Stoll; 1879, Nelson Dewitt; 1880, William S. Vandruff.

COLLECTORS.

1852-53, James J. Martin; 1854, Jacob Lator; 1855, William Wickham; 1856-58, Peter S. Decker; 1859-61, John N. Smith; 1862, Samuel Wickham; 1863-66, G. Beaks Dunning; 1867, William Elston; 1868-70, George P. Cole; 1871-76, William W. Cox; 1877, William S. Vandruff; 1878, William S. Little; 1879-80, Jacob E. Hornbeck.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF SCHOOLS.

1852, John B. Case; 1853-54, Moses Stoll; 1855, Joseph Winters; 1856-61, Moses Stoll; 1862, Asa R. Cole; 1863-64, Charles Morrow; 1865-66, J. I. Bennett.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

1853, Ira D. Huffman; 1855, Matthew Westfall, William Crigar, Jacob H. Beemer, Ira D. Huffman; 1860, Enoch Ayres, Mordecai Wilson, James Decker, Abram Bross; 1865, James Decker, Ira D. Huffman, Mordecai Wilson, Levi Beemer; 1870, George W. Coe, Elias F. Morrow, Ira D. Huffman, Uz Van Anken; 1875, Samuel Dennis, George W. Coe, Uz Van Anken, Ira D. Huffman; 1880, Samuel Dennis, Simon M. Stoddard, Theodore Martile, Elias Hockenterry.

SURVEYS OF HIGHWAYS.

1852-53, Andrew Van Sickle, William Van Sickle; 1854, William Van Sickle, William J. Shorter; 1855, Daniel Rosenkranz, Harrison H. VII.—VILLAGES.

DECKERTOWN.

This enterprising village—the principal business centre of a territory many miles in extent—is situated 15 miles northeast of the county-seat. The Midland Railroad passes within its limits, and since its construction has aided greatly in the development of the place.

The settlement of the village recalls a period as early as 1740, and possibly earlier, though no authentic facts prior to that date are obtainable. In the latter part of the seventeenth century a band of French Protestants who had, on account of their religious faith, suffered exile and chosen a refuge among the hospitable Hollanders, emigrated to America. They explored the Hudson River, and chose a settlement at the mouth of the Walkill, where they founded a small colony near the present site of Kingston. Years later some of the emigrants who formed this colony, which had since been increased in numbers by fresh arrivals from Holland, explored the Mamakating valley to the Delaware River, and formed a settlement at the mouth of the Neversink.

One of their number, by descent a Hollander, whose name was Peter Decker, passed over the Blue Mountain range on a pilgrimage in search of fertile land upon which to settle, having determined to leave the Neversink colony and form the nucleus of an independent colony. He descended into the valley now the township of Wantage, and, selecting an eligible site, built a log house where the village now stands. This log structure is described by an early resident and descendant of Peter Decker as located on ground formerly the garden of Dr. Vibbert's hotel, and which occupied the site of the present Dickerson Block. The log house was later occupied by Samuel Decker, a son of the first settler, and still later by another son. It has long since been demolished.

The hamlet made but tardy progress for a series of years, and little is known of its history. A grandson of Peter Decker, Samuel by name, early during the present century built a log tavern near the present location of Andrew Quick's blacksmith-shop, and of which the present Warner House is the offspring. Peter Decker later built a tavern on the site now occupied by the Dickerson Block. It was a frame building, and was afterwards purchased by Soferein Westfall; and Dr. Vibbert, a man of considerable enterprise in his day, finally became owner, after which it was sold, but was consumed by fire the night previous to the purchaser's intended occupancy. Samuel Decker then built the present Warner House, which has since its erection been frequently remodeled and had many landlords.

James Sayre and Michael McMann were among the early merchants, though little is known of the progress of business enterprise in the place. Gabriel Coykendall and John Miracle erected a store, tailor-shop, and dwelling, which was later converted into a public-house, and is the present Union Hotel.

Advantage was taken of the fine water-power which passed through the place, and mills were erected, the later of which are described.

The advent of the railroad brought both enterprise and capital to the place, which has since that time made such steady advancement as to rival its larger adjacent villages in commercial enterprise.

The Farmers' National Bank of Deckertown.—A charter for the organization of this bank was obtained in 1848, and the bank established Jan. 1, 1850, under the State banking system, the institution having then been known as the "Farmers' Bank of Wantage." Its first board of directors were James C. Havens, Samuel Whitaker, Levi Shepherd, John Loomis, Thomas D. Edsall, Levi Dunn, Charles A. Cooper, G. L. Dunning, John B. Decker, and Charles Roe. James C. Havens was chosen president and Thomas D. Armstrong cashier. It was originally organized with a capital of $50,000.

In July, 1865, the bank embraced the national system, and increased its capital to $100,000, it having been previously raised from the original amount to $80,000.

Mr. Armstrong having resigned the cashiership, Mr. J. A. Whitaker succeeded to the position, which he filled until 1874, when the present cashier, J. F. Marjoram, was chosen as his successor. Mr. Havens resigned the presidency April 9, 1859, and Jonathan Whitaker was elected to the office, which again became vacant by his death, in 1873, since which time J. A. Whitaker has filled the office.

The present board of directors are Richard E. Edsall, John P. Brown, John B. Decker, Charles A. Wilson, Marcus S. Hayle, J. A. Whitaker, T. F. Marjoram, Lewis J. Martin, N. H. Marjoram, John Loomis, Charles A. Cooper. But three of the original directors are members of the present board.

Deckertown Mill.—The Deckertown Mill, which is now owned by I. E. Hornbeck, was originally built in 1844 by Dr. Vibbert. It is located in the village, upon the Clove Creek, and depends for its supply of water upon the Sand Pond, in the northwest portion of the township. It was at an early date purchased by Matthew Cooper, after which Mahlon Cooper became owner, and at a subsequent date Joshua Cole controlled it. It was purchased by the present owner in 1868, at sheriff's sale, and has since been controlled by him. It has during his ownership undergone a thorough renovation, having been equipped with a new water-wheel and other machinery, which changed it completely. It has now four run of stone, and, with an adequate supply of water, may be driven to a capacity of 500 bushels per day. The average business is 30,000 bushels per year. The grain consumed in the mill is purchased in the immediate vicinity and in New York, and a market for the flour is found principally at points along the Midland Railroad.

O. J. Little's Plow-Factory.—This establishment was first started by Odell & Little, who in 1866 erected the building for the manufacture of plows. It passed later into the hands of Odell & Coe, after which George W. Coe became sole proprietor. The firm subsequently became Cox & Coe, when the latter sold his interest to O. J. Little, and the firm became Cox & Little. Mr. Little is now sole owner. He is principally engaged in the manufacture of a patent plow, which is very popular in the county and known as the "Sussex Plow." A corn plow known as the "Wantage Plow" is also manufactured to a considerable extent, as are plows of other patterns. The factory is furnished with an engine of ten-horse power, which enables it to do an extensive jobbing business. The market for these implements is found principally in Sussex County, Orange Co., N. Y., and Monroe Co., Pa.

Lafayette Fuller's Grist-Mill.—This mill, which is located in the suburbs of Deckertown, upon the Clove Creek, was built by John L. Adams in 1822, and was at an early day the scene of much business enterprise. Mr. Adams also erected on the site a fulling-mill, carding-mill, and a clover-mill, all of which were actively employed. The grist-mill was furnished with two run of stone, and had an average capacity of 100 bushels per day. Mr. Adams' death occurred in 1840, when the mill passed into the hands of John Loomis, who conducted it for some years, and ultimately made an exchange with Matthew H. Cooper for other property. He managed it for some years, and sold to Robert T. Shafer, who in turn sold to Coe Decker, of whom it was purchased by the present owner. The capacity of the mill has not been greatly changed since its erection.

Woolen-Mill.—On the site of Wright's saw-mill, located upon the Clove Creek, and familiarly known as the Evans property, John Loomis, in 1850, erected a woolen-factory for the manufacture of cloths, yarns, satinetts, etc. This mill was furnished with 12 looms, 300 spindles, and much valuable machinery. It was sold by Mr. Loomis to Thomas Tatum, and consumed by fire in 1858 while owned by him. The mill was never rebuilt, the site being now occupied as a saw-mill. James Evans at an early day erected a grist-mill upon the same location.

Pulaski Lodge, No. 103, I. O. of O. F.—This lodge was organized Feb. 6, 1851, with the following charter members: Oliver G. Millsbaugh, N. G.; Samuel T. Overhiser, V. G.; James Evans, R. S.; E. McComly Couse, A. S.; James Coe, Treas. The lodge for a period declined, but was resuscitated March 7, 1871.

The names of its Past Grands are George M. Coe, William S. Vanderhuff, Frederick L. Heater, Vincent H. Lane, David A. Eddy, William N. Meeker, Nelson W. Heater, David A. Benjamin, John D. Potter, James Lawrence, John P. Lautz, Moses Stern, Merrit C. Carpenter, Charles Suhr. The present elected officers are Nathaniel P. Westfall, N. G.; Oscar Hough, V. G.; Alanson S. Cole, Sec.; William N. Meeker, Treas. Its present membership is 66, its place of meeting Deckertown, and time of convocation every Thursday night.

Samaritan Lodge, No. 98, Free and Accepted Masons.

—This lodge was organized under a warrant granted by the Grand Lodge of New Jersey, in January, 1869. The charter members were Simeon M. Stoddard, Thomas A. Rogers, Thomas Gray, Charles A. Wilson, Thomas Armstrong, John W. Vought, Carlos M. Noble, George W. Rhodes. The lodge was constituted and formally opened Feb. 19, 1869, by Robert Rusling, Deputy Grand Master of New Jersey, assisted by other grand officers, after which Rev. Charles Coit delivered an address. The Masters of the lodge since its organization to the present time have been as follows:

1869, Thomas A. Rogers; 1870-73, Simeon M. Stoddard; 1874, George W. Rhodes; 1875, James H. Dunning; 1876-77, Albert C. Noble; 1878-79, Joseph W. Elston; 1880-81, Lewis J. Martin.

The officers for 1881 are Lewis J. Martin, W. M.; J. Emerson Decker, S. W.; Thomas B. Goidl, J. W.

The Deckertown Union Cemetery Association.—This association was incorporated April 8, 1872, its first officers having been: President, Samuel Dennis; Secretary and Treasurer, Lewis J. Martin; Trustees, James Cox, Van Rensselaer Adams, Jonathan Whitaker, George W. Coe, Samuel Dennis, James W. McCoy, Jacob Wilson, Jacob V. Little, Lewis J. Martin, Jacob Martin, William S. McCoy, Hosea J. Harden. Its present officers are: President, Evi A. Wilson; Secretary, Lewis J. Martin; Treasurer, Asa Havens; Trustees, Lewis J. Martin, James F. Martin, Owen J. Little, Hosea J. Harden, Jacob V. Little, James A. Dennis, George Shepherd, Nelson W. Heater, Evi A. Wilson, James Cox, Asa Havens, James Shelly. The annual election is held on the last Saturday in April of each year. The beautiful grounds of this association are located in the outskirts of Deckertown.

The Press of Deckertown.—The Sussex County Independent, published at Deckertown, N. J., was established by Stephen H. Sayre, of Orange Co., N. Y., in 1870, the first number of the paper having been issued on May 4th of that year. After the expiration of one year, Mr. Sayre associated with him in the proprietorship of the paper Stephen H. Moore, who retired a few months later. On April 1, 1872, William H. Noble, of Elmira, N. Y., was admitted to partnership with Mr. Sayre, and the paper was published by Sayre & Noble until 1875, when it passed to the control of a stock company, under the corporate name of "The Independent Printing Company." On Dec. 1, 1877, Jacob L. Swayze, president of the Merchants' National Bank of Newton, purchased the capital stock of the company, and retained possession of the paper until Oct. 1, 1878, when it was purchased by the present editors and proprietors, Messrs. Whitfield Gibbs and John J. Stanton. During the period that it was owned by Mr. Swayze the columns were under the editorial management of H. A. Van Fredenberg, present editor of the Port Jervis Daily Union.

During the early management of the paper it was, while professedly "independent" in politics, in reality a staunch and earnest supporter of Democratic principles and candidates. In 1876 a new departure was indulged in, and an open attack made upon the regular Democratic organization of Sussex County, which was alike energetic and ably sustained. The paper at this time supported "independent Democrats" for the offices of State senator and Assembly, as against the regular nominees of the party. The warfare against the controlling Democratic influence of the county has been earnestly taken up and carried through by the present editors of the paper, and its influence has been felt in the politics of the county.

In 1880 an indictment for malicious libel was found by the Sussex grand jury against the editors and against Jacob L. Swayze, an able contributor. To this indictment a "plea in abatement" was entered, challenging, in effect, the entire panel of jurors because of hatred and prejudice against the defendants, and the sheriff, on similar grounds, for empaneling the jury. This was an unexpected and unusual proceeding, occurring for the third time only in the entire criminal practice of the United States, and its discussion throughout the country was very general. The prosecution demurred to the proceedings, challenging thereby the legality of the method of defense adopted.

Since the paper came into the hands of its present editors and proprietors its circulation has greatly increased. It enjoys the support of a number of the ablest contributors of Northern New Jersey, and presents a neat typographical appearance. Messrs. Gibbs & Stanton are both practical printers, graduated from the "case" of leading journals, and are gentlemen who enjoy the respect, confidence, and esteem of their friends and neighbors.

BEEMERVILLE.

This point was first settled by the Beemer family, the earliest representative of whom was Henry Beemer, who secured a large tract of land in the vicinity, and some years later removed to Canada. His son Henry next came into possession of the property, upon which he lived until his death, in his one hundred and eighth year. The third Henry Beemer occupied the ancestral estate, which embraced the present hamlet, and died in his eighty-fourth year. His widow, who is eighty-one years of age, is still residing upon the property, now in possession of Gabriel L. Beemer, her son, who is a merchant.

A log church was erected here at a very early date, on ground above the village. It was used by various denominations, having been built as a union church. Among the earliest preachers, Rev. Mr. Overton is remembered as having filled the pulpit. The building in 1822 gave way to a more pretentious frame edifice, which for years did service at this point, and was ultimately removed to Branchville.

Opposite the site of the Beemer residence a school-house was built, which was superseded by one erected on ground located opposite the stone church. The third was located upon the hill near the cemetery, and the fourth about midway between the former two.

The earliest building for mercantile purposes was erected at what is known as Lower Beemerville, in which Joshua Austin opened a store adapted to the country trade. He was succeeded by one Welland, after which Samuel Whitaker and Nathaniel Loomis were proprietors. David Gale opened a store at Beemerville in 1830, and he was succeeded by Gabriel Swayze. Another building was erected, in which a mercantile business was conducted by James Lane, and which is still standing and occupied by O. C. Hockenberry. In 1860, Gabriel L. Beemer erected the store at present occupied by him, and he is still a merchant at this place.

A log tavern was opened at a very early day by William Grigar. Henry Beemer (the second) was also an early landlord, and extended hospitality to the traveling public until his death, when his son Henry succeeded to the business. The building has since been converted into a dwelling. Another tavern was built at an early period, burned and rebuilt, and is now owned by William T. Harrison.

There are now in Beemerville one hotel, two stores,—kept by Gabriel L. Beemer and O. C. Hockenberry,—two blacksmith-shops, three blacksmith- and wheelwright-shops,—conducted by Isaac Dolsen, Andrew Adrian, and Westfall Brothers,—and a mill owned by Mrs. Nancy Compton, which is run by water-power and equipped with two run of stone.

Henry Beemer succeeded in having the place made a postal station, and was commissioned as the first postmaster. The mail was distributed at his tavern at as early a date as 1820, and twenty-five years later Horace I. Beemer received the appointment. Gabriel L. Beemer is the present official.

LIBERTYVILLE.

This spot was first settled by Jacob Beemer, who came during the latter part of the last century and purchased a large tract of land. Joseph Cole was also an early resident, and owned a farm in the neighborhood. Silas Heminway, about 1835, opened a store just below the site of the present mercantile emporium, which he conducted until it was later converted into a hotel. John Ayres also built a store, which is now owned by Ezra Overton. There are also a blacksmith- and wagon-shop, a school-house, and a church.

The old Paterson stage-route passed through the place and brought much business to the tavern.

In 1830 a post-office was established, with Jacob Beemer as postmaster, the mail having been brought by the four-horse stage that passed over the road on its regular trips. In 1846, Martin Holmes was commissioned as postmaster, and Ezra Overton now holds the position.

COLEVILLE.

This hamlet derived its name from William Cole, who emigrated from Montague about 1800 and purchased 1000 acres of land, embracing the settlement as it now exists. He sold or donated portions of this until he was at his death the possessor of but 116 acres. He erected a log house near the site of Cassidy's Hotel, and pursued his vocation of millwright and surveyor. A grist-mill was also erected by him, with a single stone, and at a later date another, which was more capacious and equipped with two run of stone. Adam Deavenport came soon and purchased the first mill, and also followed farming pursuits. William Wickham was the next pioneer to the settlement, and secured the land now occupied by Harman Riggs. Benjamin Smith also purchased land near by, which he cultivated. Abram Brink came from Montague, and settled upon a farm which is now occupied by his grandsons. Benjamin Van Sickle, at a later date, became owner of the land at present occupied by John Wilson. Levi Van Gorden improved the land now owned by Christopher Van Auken. Bowdewine Brink and Christopher Cortright each owned farms in the vicinity, the latter having been succeeded by his son, Jacob Cortright.

The earliest store in Coleville was erected by William Cole in 1828; he was for a while proprietor, when his sons succeeded to the business. Levi Deavenport also built and conducted a store, and Halsey Winfield erected the building at present occupied for mercantile purposes by I. S. Locey.

John Dodderer erected a hotel about 1840, and Jacob Rolosen became landlord of another public-house in 1858.

There are now two stores, kept by Timothy Vale and I. S. Locey, two blacksmith-shops, by Horace Deavenport and James Post, a grist-mill, owned by Theodore Matthews, and two hotels, of which James Cassidy and William Myers are the popular hosts.

MOUNT SALEM.

The pioneer settler of this hamlet was James Northrop, who became a landowner and farmer about 1800. It came by inheritance to his son, Thomas Northrop, and from him to the present owner, James R. Northrop. In 1836, Nelson Hoyt made his advent, erected a storehouse, and opened a store. He also built a tavern, which was rented to Richard Masterson. This tavern, which had in succession many owners, is now closed. William Gibson opened a second store, and James R. Northrop and James Smalley soon after formed a copartnership in mercantile business. Thomas A. Wickham succeeded them. Another store was built by James Wickham, burned, and rebuilt.

There are now a grocery, kept by Gabriel Ferguson, a blacksmith- and wheelwright-shop, owned by C. C. Casterlin, and a post-office, with J. R. Northrop as postmaster and Henry Wilson as deputy. A Baptist church is also located at the hamlet.

VIII.—CHURCHES.

BEEMER MEETING-HOUSE.

The Congregational Church of Wantage and Frankford, now known as the "Beemer Meeting-House," was organized about 1744, and is without doubt the oldest religious organization in the township. It was the first and only Congregational Church in the county of Sussex.

A colony from New England settled in the vicinity, and brought their form of church government with them. One of the early pastors was Rev. Jabez Collver, who was proprietor of an extensive tract of land in the vicinity of Collver's Gap, and after whom the gap and lake are named. He left Sussex County in 1793; and settled in Canada, where his death occurred in 1812. Mr. Collver was known as a "United Empire Loyalist" by the British, and by Americans as a "Tory." The Governor (Simcoe) of the Province of Canada offered Mr. Collver, as an inducement to locate within his boundaries, 1000 acres of land for himself, 400 acres each for his married children, and 200 acres for those who were single.

The pastors of this church in succession have been Revs. Jabez Collver, Mr. Seeley, Mr. Overton, Salvemus Howell, Christopher Youngs, Mr. McDowell, Mr. Swayze, Mr. Gillett, David Abel, R. W. Knight, Barret Matthias.

The organization was gradually absorbed by other denominations until 1844, when the congregation, by a vote of its members, decided to unite with the Second Presbyterian Church of Wantage, at Beemerville, in whose custody the property still remains. By the deed to the Presbyterian Church there is a restrictive clause that if at any time five or more members shall in good faith desire the property for the use of a Congregational Church, it shall revert to such organization.

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF WANTAGE.

This church—more generally known as the "Clove Church"—was organized under the Brunswick Classis of New Jersey as a Reformed Dutch Church by the Rev. Elias Van Benschooten in 1788. The petition to the Classis was forwarded the year previous and reads as follows:

"TO THE REVEREND CLASSIS OF NEW BRUNSWICK:

"GENTLEMEN,—We, inhabitants of the Clove and its vicinity, Beg Leave to present ourselves in the following Manner: Our ancestors a few in number who formerly belonged to the Dutch Reformed Church settled Our County about forty years since under part of which time the Reverend Mr. Thomas Robin by permission of his Church Council and people of the Minisink preached some of his time amongst us. By his leaving them we became again destitute till the Reverend Mr. Bunschooting was installed in Minisink Congregation, who labored some time amongst us, whose labors to apparatus has been attended with the Blessings of God, So as we have upwards of thirty communicant members Amongst us. We the under Mentioned being Ardently Desirous of the propagation of the Gospel and of Being settled under the Constitution of the Low Dutch Reformed Church, Beg permission that you would be pleased to Grant and Appoint the Reverend Mr. Elias Bunschooting or any person or persons you may think proper to assist us in appointing and establishing us proper Church officers in order to Rule and Represent us for the future, and Grant us such supplies in our destitute state as you in your wisdom shall think Meet and Necessary. May the Blessing of Almighty God attend your Councils and we your partitioners are in Duty Bound to Pray.

"Clove, August the 21st, 1787.

"The petition of the Clove has been examined and approved by the kerkenraad of the three united Congregations of Morningside, and the Reverd Classis of New Brunswick would please to order the erection of a Congregation among that people, to be and remain in Union with the above said Congregations till a minister is settled among them. Done this the 27th of August, 1787. Signed by order of the kerkenraad.

"ELIAS V. BENSCHOOTEN,
 "Prosis."

The church was accordingly organized with 50 members,—25 males and the same number of females.

The Rev. Mr. Van Benschooten, having received a call, then became pastor of the Clove Church, and with the people of his church he lived and died much respected and beloved. He was the only pastor this church ever had under its then existing form. At the first, being unable to pay their minister one-half of a very small salary, the Clove united with Westtown in his support, and his labors were divided between the two places. But the Clove Church soon increased so as to be able to pay a full salary, from which time the Rev. Mr. Van Benschooten withdrew from Westtown and devoted his whole time to the congregation in the Clove. This church rose from very small beginnings. The barn of Helmos Titsworth served them for some time as a meeting-house. It deserves to be recorded that the Rev. Elias Van Benschooten made an endowment of $20,000 to the College of New Brunswick,—a gift that will bless the church while the present order of things continues, and by which, though dead, he yet lives and preaches.

Soon after the demise of the Rev. Mr. Van Benschooten the Clove Church was dissolved by a vote of its members, passed Nov. 24, 1817, and merged in the First Presbyterian Church, Wantage, which was organized under the Jersey Presbytery, Aug. 11, 1818, with 25 members,—viz., 12 males and 13 females.

The first pastor of this church was the Rev. Gershom Williams, during whose ministry there were received on confession of faith 64 members, and 44 on certificate,—total 108.

In 1821 the Rev. Edward Allen was installed over the church, and labored here until 1830. Under his ministry there were two powerful revivals of religion, besides other seasons of refreshing of more limited extent. As the fruits of the whole, there were 342 members added to the church. In consequence of ill health the Rev. Mr. Allen resigned his pastoral charge, and was succeeded by the Rev. Peter Kanouse, Sept. 27, 1830, who was installed and continued his charge until Dec. 29, 1834. During his ministry there were two revivals, and some other seasons of refreshing; 163 members were added as the fruit of the two revivals. In 1833 this church consisted of 512 members.

In 1835 the Rev. George Pierson became the pastor of this church, and about this time the parsonage was burnt and the church records were consumed.

Some time in 1839 the Rev. Anthony McReynolds received a call to become their preacher, which he accepted, and continued to serve them until the autumn of 1843, when he resigned his charge, and the church gave a call to the Rev. Sylvester Cooke, who accepted it, and was soon after installed. His ministry, which extended over a period of many years, was greatly blessed, and has left many tender memories behind.

In September, 1873, Rev. Laurens T. Shular received a call to succeed Rev. Mr. Cooke in the pastoral work, which he accepted, and began his labors soon after. He continued with the church until the latter portion of the year 1875, when Rev. Theodore F. Chambers received a unanimous call in January, 1876, and still continues pastor of the church.

The present Session of the church is composed of Jacob W. Dewitt, W. W. Titsworth, and L. C. Deavenport.

FIRST WANTAGE BAPTIST CHURCH.

Among the oldest church organizations in Sussex County is that most familiarly known as the Papakating Baptist Church of Wantage. About 1751 a number of persons from Mansfield, Conn., who had been recognized as members of the Baptist Society, emigrated to Sussex County and settled at or near Newton, where a church was organized with William Marsh as pastor; the date of this organization was Nov. 14, 1759. In October, 1759, the church joined the Philadelphia Association. Mr. Marsh left the church in 1763 and went to Wyoming, where he was murdered by the Indians.

In 1770, Rev. Constant Hart was pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. Nicholas Cox in 1772, who was pastor for ten years.

For some years this was the only Baptist Church in Newton, Hardyston, and Wantage. A church was organized in Hardyston, and afterwards, in 1777 and 1778, large numbers of the congregation settled in Wantage, when it was agreed to remove the meetinghouse from Hardyston to Wantage, near where the present Papakating church now stands, which was erected in 1830.

Mr. Cox continued as pastor until 1782, when he resigned and removed to Kingwood, N. J., as pastor of the Baptist Church in that place. He was a native of New Castle Co., Del., where he was born, March 24, 1742. He was licensed in Philadelphia in 1771, and ordained at Wantage, April 15, 1772. He was succeeded by Rev. James Finn in 1783, who resigned in 1785. Silas Southworth, a member of the church, became the next pastor, and was ordained May 21, 1786. From this period until the death of Mr. Southworth, Feb. 20, 1814, letters of dismission were given to several members to organize a church at Mount Salem, and also at New Foundland and Beemerville. Notwithstanding the sending out of these colonies, the old church increased by frequent revivals.

After the death of Mr. Southworth the church was supplied by Elders House and Teasdale. The church gave a call to Rev. Levi Hall, Nov. 4, 1815, who was installed the following May. He died Aug. 31, 1821, after a brief but successful ministry. Elder John Hagan became pastor in March, 1822, and resigned 1825. He was succeeded by Elder Leonard Fletcher in March, 1826, who continued pastor until December, 1831, being followed by Elder Timothy Jackson, who resigned October, 1835, and was succeeded the following year by Elder Isaac Moore. Elder W. M. Fay followed Mr. Moore, in 1840, and remained until 1842. Rev. Sanford Leach was pastor for the next two years. In November, 1845, the church gave a call to Rev. D. F. Tuiss; he resigning in 1849, the Rev. T. Davis was called, and remained as pastor until 1858. Rev. Joseph Belden was pastor for eighteen months, and in March, 1861, Rev. George F. Love followed; in 1865, Rev. Daniel T. Hill, and in 1870 Rev. George F. Love was again recalled. He was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Jewett, and he by the present efficient and successful pastor, Rev. J. G. Dyer. The church has licensed eight persons to preach the gospel. This is one of the few churches in the county that have preserved most of their records, and each year adds to the interest and value of such records.

The present deacons of the church are James Cox, J. V. Little, J. A. Thurber, Levi Hull, Samuel Dennis, Lebbeus Martin, George Shepherd; Church Clerk, Lebbeus Martin; Treasurer, Humphrey Martin. The trustees are J. V. Little, Halsey Berry, George Shepherd, Lebbeus Martin, Samuel Dennis, John Halted.

The First Baptist Church sustains three Sabbath-schools,—one at the Pond, another at Lewisburg, and a third at Deckertown. The superintendent of the Pond Sunday-school is Levi Hull, while James McCoy presides at Lewisburg, and O. J. Little at Deckertown. The various schools have an attendance of 175 scholars. The present roll of the church embraces 178 members.

THE SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF WANTAGE.

Some of the members of the First Presbyterian Church of Wantage, who found the increasing dimensions of the society a serious difficulty, determined to petition for a division of the congregation. In response to this wish the Second Presbyterian Church was organized, July 13, 1834, with 122 members.

A new stone edifice, 40 by 60 feet in dimensions, was erected, and dedicated Jan. 4, 1835, Rev. Edward Allen having preached the dedicatory sermon from the text, "Peace be within thy walls." The cost of the edifice was $3000.

The Rev. Edward Allen became the stated supply, and continued his labors until 1841, during which time a valuable parsonage was secured and several additions made to the church. The elders at this time were Daniel Van Auken, Henry Beemer, Jacob Ayres.

In 1842, Rev. Peter Kanouse became the pastor, and labored with great zeal for the growth and prosperity of the church. He was for years so largely identified with the interests of Wantage, both temporal and spiritual, that a brief sketch of his life will not be amiss here.

Peter Kanouse was born in Rockaway Valley, Morris Co., N. J., Aug. 20, 1784, and died at Deckertown, N. J., May 30, 1864. He learned the trade of a blacksmith, and for several years followed that business at Rockaway. In 1807, the first year of the labors of the Rev. Barnabas King in that place, Mr. Kanouse was received into the church, and in 1809 became one of the elders. Even then, uneducated as he was, he was greatly esteemed for both his piety and his natural talents. He was unusually gifted in prayer and exhortation, and was for years one of Mr. King's most effective helpers in that extensive field. For several years he had indulged the wish to study for the ministry, and after the death of his wife he set himself resolutely to the realization of this purpose. He pursued a course of classical study at the Bloomfield Academy; his theological studies were pursued chiefly under the direction of the Rev. Dr. James Richards, of Newark, and in 1821 he was licensed to preach by the Jersey Presbytery. In 1822 he was ordained by the same body, and installed pastor of the church at Succasunna. His labors here were attended with marked success. From this place he went as a missionary to the Indians. From this position he came to Sussex County, and succeeded that truly remarkable man, the Rev. Edward Allen, as pastor of the Wantage Church, the mother of the three churches in that township,—Wantage, Beemerville, and Deckertown. His preaching in the old Wantage church was wonderfully successful. One revival at that place was astonishing in its incidents, power, and the number of its converts. He was wont to say that "he never traveled anywhere, even in Wisconsin, that he did not find some who were converted in that revival." His great success in Wantage led to his being called to the charge of the Free Presbyterian Church,—now the First Congregational,—Newark, N. J. His labors here were far from being unsuccessful, but his friends at Wantage claimed him again. He took charge of the Second Church of Wantage, Beemerville, and his ministry was again rewarded with several remarkable revivals. At least two of these were said to have brought into the church over a hundred converts each. After several years' labor here he removed to Wisconsin,—a change that did not add much to his comfort, and he returned the third time to Wantage, and for several years supplied the pulpit of "Wantage Third," as the Presbyterian Church of Deckertown was called. Here too his labors were abundant in the number brought into the church.

The elders during the ministry of Rev. Mr. Kanouse were Levi Ayres, John Dunning, Henry Beemer, Daniel Van Auken, and E. M. Decker.

The pulpit was next filled by Rev. Nathaniel Leighton, who followed Mr. Kanouse and began his labors Sept. 1, 1854, the elders during his ministry having been John Dunning, Henry Beemer, Eben M. Decker, and Levi Ayres.

Mr. Leighton resigned the pastorate after a residence of five years with his people, and an invitation was extended to Rev. Robert Crossett, which was accepted, and the new pastor entered upon his clerical work Jan. 1, 1859. The elders at this time were Benjamin Couse, Nelson Phillips, Isaac Dolsen, Robert McMickle, Jonathan Decker.

Rev. Andrew Tully succeeded in December, 1866, and continued pastor of the church until 1873, after which Rev. William F. Arms received a call, and was installed on the 7th of December of the same year. His ministry extended over a period of nearly three years, after which the present incumbent, Rev. C. P. Glover, received and accepted a call, his installation having taken place Dec. 26, 1878. The present elders are John Dunning, Robert McMickle, Nelson Phillips, Isaac Dolsen, Barret A. Van Auken, M. L. Hockenberry, O. C. Hockenberry, Dolsen Ayres. The church sustains a flourishing Sabbath-school with 90 members, of which the pastor is superintendent, and Robert McMickle assistant superintendent.

THIRD PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF WANTAGE.

On May 1, 1839, Rev. George Pierson, the beloved pastor of the Presbyterian Church of the Clove, at the request of several members of his congregation residing in the village of Deckertown, organized the above-named church. Though feeble numerically,—only 28 members,—they possessed great spiritual enthusiasm. The first elders chosen were Lewis Whitaker, Jacob Beemer, Horton Beemer, and John Smith.

Rev. James W. Wood, fresh from the seminary, became pastor of the church in the autumn. He is remembered as a man of positive convictions, a conscientious preacher, fearless in the discharge of his duties, and spiritually minded. He began his labors with this little flock under the firm conviction that he could convert the whole of Sussex County. For six years he waged a successful warfare, but doubtless found true the experience of a greater man, Philip Melancthon, who "confessed the old devil was too strong for the young Melancthon." The first year under Mr. Wood's pastorate 34 were added to the roll of membership, and the people began the work of church erection. The result of six years of labor of this pastor was the building of a comfortable edifice and the addition of 120 to the church membership. The pronounced piety of Rev. Mr. Wood is still remembered. His boldness in confronting the evils of the day left its impress upon the minds of his hearers.

Rev. A. B. Rich succeeded to the charge, and during his pastorate of two years 20 members were added to the church roll. After an interval of two years, during which the congregation were without a settled pastor, Rev. B. Farrand received a call, and remained six years, when the membership was increased by 50 names. Rev. William H. Babbitt followed and remained two years, during which time 19 were received into communion with the church.

In connection with the results of these successive pastorates should be mentioned the efforts of two elders of devoted piety, John Smith and Broderick Decker, whose fidelity and sincerity, as exemplified in personal pleading with the people and visitations from house to house, were greatly blessed.

Rev. Peter Kanouse, a man mighty in the Scriptures and a giant in argument, became in his old age the pastor of the church. He ministered with edification to the people until he fell asleep, in 1861, having carefully guarded his flock for six years. He was a man greatly beloved, and his grace is still with the people.

Rev. O. H. P. Deyo labored for a year in the field, and was succeeded by Rev. P. J. Timlow, a ripe scholar and an able preacher. For four years he drew increasing congregations, who were delighted as they sat under his ministry. Rev. N. Elmer followed, and preached for one year, when he was succeeded by Rev. James McWilliams, than whom the church never possessed a more thorough scholar and thoughtful divine. The four years of his labor in this field were without brilliant results, but the church had ever before it the life of a minister that was lovely and of good report. It had teachings that were sound and thoroughly Presbyterian. During his pastorate at Deckertown he was united in marriage to Miss Rebecca Wilson, daughter of one of the older residents of the place. His death, which was sudden, occurred in September, 1873, from an affection of the heart. He was stricken suddenly, while in the prime of health and manhood. Rev. Mr. McWilliams was an honored member of two secret societies, whose deep sorrow bore fit expression in the tablet that marks his grave.

The present pastor, Rev. E. A. Hamilton, was called in September, 1873, and has occupied the field longer than any preceding minister. Mr. Hamilton entered the army at the beginning of the civil war and served until its close, leaving the service with the commission of lieutenant-colonel of the First New York Mounted Rifles. He afterwards graduated at the Oberlin University, and later studied theology at the Union Theological Seminary, in New York City. The church has during his ministry been repaired, the congregation increased, and additions to the membership to the number of 58 made.

The only revivals of religion which this church has enjoyed have been under the pastorates of Rev. James Wood and Rev. Mr. Hamilton. It has had various seasons of refreshing, but no striking displays of interest of a general character.

The congregation has suffered great loss by death in recent years, heads of families of much spiritual as well as financial influence having been called away.

The present elders are Abram Smith (for many years in office), Jeremiah Layton, James H. Dunning, Andrew Shorter, and James Halsey Consc. J. A. Dunning is the present superintendent of the Sabbath-school and chorister of the church.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The Methodist Episcopal Church at Deckertown was organized in 1858, under the energetic labors of Rev. Isaac Cross, the church edifice having been erected in 1857, and dedicated Feb. 3, 1858. This was mainly effected through the liberality of Mr. Increase Stoddard, who donated the ground upon which it stands and a subscription of $500. By a singular coincidence, his funeral sermon was the first delivered in the new building.

It is not possible to present to the reader any detail of the progress of the church other than is afforded by the succession of pastorates. Mr. Cross was followed by Rev. John Seran, after which Rev. Jacob Fort was assigned to the charge. He was succeeded by Rev. John Faull, after which the pastors in order are as follows: Revs. J. N. Vansant, Benjamin Palmer, J. N. Keys, George W. Horton, Walter Chamberlain, E. V. King, and J. N. Keys, a second time, who is the present pastor.

The stewards of the church are C. A. Wilson, Amzi Ayres, Nelson Dewitt.

THE WANTAGE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The Wantage Methodist Episcopal Church was organized through the zealous efforts of Rev. Mr. Shaw in 1831. The same year a church edifice was erected, services having previously been held in the barn of William Wilson and in the school-house of the neighborhood. The pastors who are located at Deckertown also minister to this congregation. The present stewards of the church are N. T. Woodruff, Hiram Van Siekle, and Benjamin Hart.

THE NORTH WANTAGE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This church—better known as the Red Church, from the original color of the building—was erected in 1837 by Isaiah Winfield, the first pastor of the church being Rev. Mr. Baker. It was rebuilt and beautified in 1878, and is now enjoying the pastoral labors of Rev. Mr. Tompkins.

LIBERTYVILLE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The Libertyville Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1860, and a building immediately erected under the auspices of Rev. S. C. Mertene, the ground for the purpose having been donated by Jacob Cortright. The congregation has been growing and prosperous.

MOUNT SALEM BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was formerly an outpost of the Baptist Church at Unionville, Orange Co., N. Y., and was organized by that body in 1833, under the ministry of Rev. Z. Grenell, Sr., who became its first pastor. The same year an edifice was erected by the parent church for the use of the congregation. The second pastor was Rev. John Case, and at a later date Rev. Stephen Case also filled the pulpit. Rev. C. Brinkerhoff followed, and Rev. Jacob Gesner was at a later date the clergyman in charge. Rev. C. Brinkerhoff was a second time settled over the charge, after which Rev. Ernest Thompson, at present settled over the Baptist Church at Newton, became pastor. He closed his labors in 1878, since which time the church has been without regular ministrations. The present deacons are William Wickham, S. S. Myers, and Sanford Vail.

X.—NOTES AND INCIDENTS.

The following inscription is copied from the monument erected to the memory of Dominie Van Benschoten in the cemetery of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, New Brunswick:

"The memory of the just is blessed.*

"The Rev. Mr. Elias Van Bunschoten was born October 26th, 1738; graduated A.B. 1768; licensed to preach 1773, and settled in the ministry, first at Shatticoke, afterwards at Minisink. He died January 10th, 1815. Established in the truth and ardent in its defense, from his youth to his old age he preserved in a good profession of faith and in a holy and exemplary life. In the ministry of the gospel he was faithful, and diligently employed his talents in the service of his divine Redeemer. His zeal to promote the interest of the church of Christ prompted him to make a very liberal donation to the support of indigent students and the benefit of the theological college at New Brunswick. To perpetuate the memory of this venerable and charitable man, and to express their gratitude, the Right Reverend Genl Synod of the Reformed Dutch Church have erected at the public expense this MONUMENT."

"Well done! good and faithful servant.†"

EARLY EXPLOITS AT DECKERTOWN.

The following incident is related as having occurred at the tavern kept by Samuel Decker at an early day. On a certain evening a man was seen riding towards the upper end of the tavern-stoop. The horse was a light sorrel in color, with a bald face. The knight rode up to the stoop, and made his horse step upon it. He then rode past the kitchen to the bar-room door, thence he turned and rode into the bar-room, and was seen no more from the street. On entering, he advanced with his steed to the bar. Meanwhile, the barkeeper and proprietor was stooping down in the act of replenishing his bottle from the barrel, and, having his back turned, did not observe what was progressing. With a kind of a neighing voice the knight from his horse called for drink. The barkeeper looked up, and suddenly encountered the nose of the steed. He considered this as a challenge, and sprang through a side door to a wood-pile with the intention of grasping an axe with which to kill the horse. Some of his friends, deeming this unwise, detained him as he was returning with the weapon.

The horse was with difficulty ejected from the house, when suddenly a band of pugilists poured from the bar-room and swarmed upon the stoop. Oaths and imprecations rose, and clenched fists flew, till dark night drew a curtain over the turbulent scene.

The design of this affray, as proved afterwards in court, was to provoke the tavernkeeper to kill the horse in the bar-room, and then to open the animal, stuff the innkeeper into the cavity, and sew him up, leaving only the head protruding, after which they purposed using the bottles at will and departing in triumph.

This outrage upon the common decencies of society was not originated by the denizens of Deckertown, but was the offspring of the fertile brains of what were called in those days liners. They dwelt upon the State line between New York and New Jersey, having doors opening into both States. These people were as wicked as the evil one wished them to be, and occasionally so much worse as to injure even the cause of the devil.

THE GRAND ENCAMPMENT OF VETERANS.

In response to an invitation extended by Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, the Annual State Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1878 was held at Deckertown, in August of that year. For many weeks previous to the occasion extensive preparations were in progress, that the veterans might be welcomed with becoming éclat. Invitations had also been extended to various State regiments of militia and to the venerable Hexamer Battery, of Hoboken. A welcome was also given to citizens of the county who desired to join in the reception of the State's heroes by old Sussex. An irregular company of cavalry was improvised in the county for escort duty, which assembled at Newton on the 26th of August and marched to the scene of action the following day.

On Tuesday, the 27th, the first regular day of the encampment, Gen. Kilpatrick, escorted by Mattison's cavalry, received the troops at Deckertown and conducted them to the ground, which was located two miles north of the village.

This parade was the most imposing spectacle of the kind witnessed in the county. A section of Capt. Eller's Hoboken Battery during the march had been dispatched to the grounds to fire a salute, while the remaining section performed the same duty at the depot. The following was the order of march:

Sussex County Cavalry.
 Gen. Kilpatrick, Col. Hamilton and Davis.
 Department Commander Mueller, G. A. R., and staff.
 Fourth Regiment Militia, Col. Dudley G. Steele.
 Drum Corps.
 Second Battalion Essex County, Capt. Matthews.
 Westwood Cornet Band.
 Ninth Regiment Militia, Col. Hart.
 Brass Band, 50 pieces.
 Hexamer Battery, Capt. Ellis.
 Lincoln Post, No. 11, Newark.
 Uzal Dodd Post, No. 12, Newark.
 Hexamer Post, Orange.
 Phill Kearney Post, No. 1, Newark.
 Farragut Post, No. 28, Paterson.
 George G. Meade Post, No. 7, Passaic.
 Chaplain Butler Post, No. 35, Paterson.
 Rankin Post, No. 10, Brooklyn.
 T. M. K. Lee Post, No. 5, Camden.
 Bayard Post, No. 8, Trenton.
 Kearney Kennedy Post, Now Brunswick.
 Ulric Dahlgren Post, No. 2, Philadelphia.
 Voss' Band, Newark.
 Hudson County Battalion, Col. Coffey.
 Veteran Battalion, Maj. Farrier, Jersey City.
 Hackettstown Band.
 Veterans Hackettstown, Washington, and Dover.
 Detachment of Veterans of Various Organizations.

This was followed by a long cavalcade of carriages and wagons of every description. The march was hot and dusty, and a few succumbed to the heat and were obliged to leave the ranks. The officers, with brilliant uniforms and spirited horses, made a fine appearance. Immediately after the procession of the Grand Army posts were several carriages, containing Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, Gen. John C. Robinson, commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic of the United States, Gen. Graham, Gen. Carr, Prof. Atherton, Hon. Garret Hobart, Hon. F. A. Potts, Hon. Samuel T. Smith, Hon. John Hill, Socrates Tuttle, of Paterson, and many others.

Extensive arrangements had been made for the comfort of those who participated in the display, many of the invited guests having been entertained by the general at his residence. Eloquent addresses were made by Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, Gen. J. C. Robinson, and others. Fine music also enlivened the scene, and a poem descriptive of events in the late war was read by one of the veterans.

The scene outside the tent was picturesque. Below the road the artillery was encamped, and through the dim light afforded by the camp-fires the guns of the battery could be discerned. Beyond the big tent were numerous Sibley and A tents where the organizations were encamped, and over the grounds numerous lights presented a weird and martial look.

The sham battle commenced about noon. The veterans were commanded by Col. Mueller and the militia by Col. Hart, of the Ninth. Kilpatrick, accompanied by his orderly, placed the troops in position. The battle opened by the firing of the cannon on the hill and in the meadow in front of the house. The militia ascended the hill and captured the battery. The veterans came around, and after some firing of musketry retook the cannon. The Ninth and Fourth Regiments formed a line of battle below, and the two forces met in contest. There was considerable excitement during the conflict, in one or two instances the men coming in close contact with each other, so that the fighting assumed almost the appearance of a genuine battle. A flag of truce, borne by Gen. Kilpatrick, ended the sham fight, and, standing in his saddle, he made the farewell speech to the veterans and the State militia. The soldiers then marched to their tents, stacked arms, and made ready for their departure. For the remainder of the afternoon the road was crowded with wagons, and the paths through the fields to the village were filled with pedestrians.

Nearly 40,000 people were assembled on the grounds, and the success of the enterprise afforded matter for congratulation to all who participated.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HUGH JUDSON KILPATRICK.

Hugh Judson Kilpatrick was born at Deckertown, N. J., Jan. 14, 1836; graduated at the United States Military Academy, and entered the army as second lieutenant of artillery May 6, 1861; was commissioned captain of the Fifth New York Volunteers May 9th, and was wounded at the battle of Big Bethel, June 10th, 1861. On his recovery he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Second New York Cavalry Volunteers, of which regiment he became colonel, December, 1862. With his regiment, he participated in the Rappahannock campaign, in the second battle of Bull Run, and many minor actions, and in the Maryland campaign. During "Stoneman's raid" to the rear of Gen. Lee's army he commanded a brigade of cavalry, and was promoted to be brigadier-general of volunteers, June, 1863. At the battle of Gettysburg he commanded a brigade and division. In April, 1864, he was ordered to duty with Gen. Sherman in the West, and at the battle of Resaca, May, 1864, was severely wounded. During Gen. Sherman's march to the sea and subsequent campaign through the Carolinas, he commanded the cavalry and was actively engaged. In June, 1865, he was promoted to be major-general of volunteers. He resigned his commission in the regular army, December, 1865, and his volunteer commission Jan. 1, 1866. In November, 1865, he was appointed United States Minister to Chili; was recalled in 1868.* For details of his military operations see Chapter XV. of this work.

SAMUEL WHITAKER.

Samuel Whitaker was for many years one of the leading spirits of Wantage township, and identified, in a remarkable degree, with the growth and development of that part of Sussex County. His parents were Richard and Elizabeth (Ferguson) Whitaker, of Unionville, N. Y., where the former was a successful tiller of the soil. The brothers and sisters were Jacob, Aaron, Richard, John, Halsey, and Lewis Whitaker, and Mary, who married Dr. Austin, of Unionville; Milly, who married Benjamin Haynes, of Unionville; Charlotte, second wife of Benjamin Haynes; and Fanny, who became the second wife of Dr. Austin. Descendants of Jacob reside at Oswego, N. Y., a son of Richard at West Town, N. Y., and daughters of John at Goshen and Middletown, N. Y.; Lewis lived and died in Wantage, and is represented there.

Samuel Whitaker was born at Unionville, N. Y., on June 22, 1796. His educational advantages were such as the common schools of his day afforded. In early life he embarked in the mercantile business, at Beemerville, Sussex Co., where he remained a number of years. Removing to Unionville, he continued the mercantile business at that place for several years, and about the year 1835 located at Deckertown, N. J., where he was a leading merchant until within a few years of his demise, which occurred on Oct. 20, 1871.

Although a man of plain habits, and of a retiring disposition, he was possessed of remarkable energy and force of character, and took an active part in all movements tending to advance the material welfare of the community in which he dwelt. He was one of the founders of the Farmers' National Bank of Deckertown, and a director for many years. In bringing the Midland Railway to Deckertown no man was more active, and he subscribed liberally to the project, and devoted much time and energy in furthering its accomplishment. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church of Deckertown, and in politics a Democrat. He filled the office of county collector of Sussex County several years, and that of postmaster at Deckertown for many years. In all his business relations he sustained an exalted character for integrity and fair dealing, and left behind him, at his death, recollections of an upright and honorable life.

Mr. Whitaker was married, when a young man, to Margaret, daughter of John E. and Jane Adams, of Wantage township, and had three children,—namely, John A., born July 1, 1818; Richard, born March 24, 1820, died Aug. 31, 1845; and Zillah M., wife of Jacob E. Hornbeck, of Deckertown, born June 16, 1822.

* Johnson's Cyclopedia.

John A. Whitaker is the president of the Farmers' National Bank of Deckertown. He was cashier of that institution from Jan. 1, 1857, until his election as president on Jan. 13, 1874, previous to that time being engaged in the mercantile business at Deckertown. He is a leading and influential citizen in that village, of genial manners, and widely known throughout his section as a successful business man. He was married in the year 1846 to Mary A., daughter of John and Amanda (Sayre) Holbert, of Chemung Co., N. Y., and has four daughters,—viz., Isabel, wife of Theodore F. Margarum, cashier of the Deckertown Bank; Amanda H., wife of Capt. Theodore F. Northrop, of New York City; Mary Alice, wife of Charles D. Tyler, of Newark, N. J.; and Josephine, wife of John Bennet, of Elmira, N. Y.

AMOS MUNSON.

Amos Munson is a son of Israel Munson, who was born in Morris Co., N. J., in 1771. The latter was a wheelwright by trade, and followed that occupation at New Vernon, Morris Co., when a young man. In early life he removed to Sussex County and entered upon the calling of a farmer in Hardyston township, where his son, Asa Munson, now resides. Here he passed the remainder of a long and industrious life, engaged in agricultural operations, and died in 1838. His wife was Nancy Conger, a native of New Vernon. Her parents kept a public inn four miles below Morristown during Revolutionary times, in an ancient dwelling that is still standing. Her mother was a representative of the Whitehead family, that has been favorably identified with different interests in New Jersey.

The children of Israel and Nancy Munson were as follows,—viz., Amos; Lavinia, who married Capt. William Berdslee, of Hardyston; Samuel; Saren B.; Susan, who became the wife of Edward S. Berdslee; James L.; Israel; Theodosia, who married John Goble; John; and Nancy. Of this large family there are living, Amos, the subject of this notice; Samuel, at Paterson, N. J.; Asa, in Hardyston township; Saren B., in Michigan; Susan, at Jerseyville, Ill.; James L., in Sparta township; and John, in Wantage township.

Amos Munson was born on the homestead, in Hardyston township, Feb. 11, 1803. His earlier years were passed upon the paternal farm, and his educational advantages were those afforded by the district school of his locality. When a young man, he clerked for a time in the store of Robert Baldwin, at Hamburg, then in charge of Stephen F. Margarum, and married, on Jan. 14, 1824, Elizabeth, daughter of Nicholas and Anna (Farber) Ryerson, of Vernon township. She was born Aug. 30, 1807. The young couple at once entered upon the active duties of life, and on March 5, 1824, located at Paterson, N. J., where Mr. Munson carried on the butcher business with success for fourteen years. In 1838 they removed to Deckertown, N. J., where he purchased a farm of one hundred and forty-four acres, upon which he has since resided.

Mr. Munson belongs to that class of business men who, by industry and the intelligent discharge of business duties, meet with success in any calling in life. As a farmer he has been industrious and clear-headed, and by careful management has accumulated a good estate. A large portion of his property is now included within the corporate limits of Deckertown, and comprises streets and lots, one of the former of which bears his name. In various ways his life has been intimately identified with the growth and development of Deckertown, until, after many years of residence at that place, he is looked upon as one of the veritable fathers of the village. Himself a member of no religious sect, he has ever been a contributor to the various benevolent enterprises of his day, and, with liberal hand and intelligent advice, assisted in the erection and construction of all the churches and schools of the village, and in other ways co-operated in all movements tending to advance the material, social, and educational interests of the community in which he resides. In bringing the Midland Railway to Deckertown he was actively interested, and, besides subscribing fifteen hundred dollars in cash to the encouragement of the project, he gave the right of way through his farm, of two thousand five hundred and seventy-two feet of land, half of which was one hundred feet in width, and the remainder, upon part of which the depot stands, one hundred and thirty feet. He is still pursuing the avocation of a farmer, and though now at the ripe old age of seventy-eight years, is well preserved, in the full possession of all his faculties, and in personal charge of all his affairs. He has ever been foremost in welcoming the aid of invention in lightening the arduous labors of a farmer's life, and introduced the first mowing-machine and first horse-rake used in Sussex County. On his farm are to be found all the latest mechanical contrivances of the present day. Himself and wife, after the long period of fifty-seven years of married life, now live peacefully and happily in their pleasant home at Deckertown, enjoying in their old age the respect and esteem of all classes of citizens, and the consciousness that they have performed their allotted tasks in life with fidelity and success. No children have been born of the union.

John B. Decker

JOHN B. DECKER.

The first white man to enter the precincts of what is now Wantage township, in Sussex County, was Peter Decker, a Hollander by descent, who left the Neversink settlement about the year 1740, and, passing over the Kittatinny or Blue Mountain, pursued his search after suitable land upon which to effect a permanent settlement. His choice fell upon the present site of the village of Deckertown, where, amid tall forest-trees, murmuring brooks, and the solemn silence of a vast solitude, he erected the first dwelling built by a white man in that section. Here he passed his days engaged in clearing up land and tilling the soil, enduring the trials and privations of pioneer life. He was the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch.

Josiah, son of Peter Decker, was also an early resident of Wantage township. He lived at the "Clove," and operated the first grist-mill at that point, besides engaging in farming to a considerable extent. To himself and wife, Sarah, were born five children,—namely, Bowdewine, Abraham, William, Fامتجة, and Margaret. The sons lived and died in Wantage. Fامتجة became the wife of Ephraim Kilpatrick, grandfather of Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, and Margaret married Seth Wickham.

Bowdewine Decker was one of the strong men of Wantage township in early times. He was born Feb. 25, 1763, and grew up on his father's farm, his schooling advantages being but meagre in those days. He was a great reader, however, and a teacher in one of the early district schools of his locality. In 1787 he located near the present residence of his son, John B. Decker, where he erected a stone house, which he occupied for some years. In 1805 he built the main portion of the present dwelling of John B. Decker, where he continued to live until his death, in 1857, in his ninety-fourth year. Besides being a thrifty and successful farmer, owning over four hundred acres of land, he engaged extensively in other business. For many years he kept a store near his residence, where he carried on mercantile pursuits; he had a tan-yard, a distillery, an extensive potash-works, and was generally identified with the growth and development of his section. A man of good judgment and strong sense, the adviser of many people, of sterling integrity, generous and public-spirited, he was for many years one of the leading men of Wantage. He was a supporter of the Clove Presbyterian Church, and at one time bought the church edifice at public sale, and presented it clear to the congregation. He was an Old-Line Whig, but never an aspirant for office. His first wife, whom he married on May 31, 1787, was Naomi, daughter of Richard Westbrook, of Wantage, and a representative of one of the strong pioneer families of the section. She was born June 14, 1772, and died April 29, 1825. Her children were Richard, born Aug. 15, 1788; Josiah, born April 15, 1792; Mary, born Aug. 30, 1790; Hannah, born Feb. 5, 1794; Sarah, born Oct. 10, 1796; Frederick, born May 16, 1802; and John B., the only one surviving, born Nov. 16, 1803. Bowdewine Decker married for a second wife, on June 8, 1826, Rebecca Van Sickle, born May 1, 1768; died Sept. 11, 1845.

John B. Decker was born on the paternal farm, on the date indicated above, and is one of the oldest and most highly esteemed citizens of the township. His earlier years were passed upon his father's farm, but his labors were mostly directed to the tanning business. In 1824 he took up his residence at his father's mill, and continued to co-operate with his father in the management of his affairs. In 1845 he removed to the family homestead, and worked the farm, and a few years later it was decided to him by his father. Here he has continued to reside since, the property now, however, belonging to his son-in-law, Jacob Swartwout.

Mr. Decker has devoted his entire life to agricultural operations, and has long been a representative farmer in Wantage township. He has owned a large estate, some of which is still preserved to him, but, though of good business qualifications and of excellent judgment, he has lost no less than eighty thousand dollars during his life by indorsements for friends, and because of his generous heart and liberal spirit. He now owns the mill at the Clove, a farm of one hundred and fifty acres near by, one hundred acres in Montague township, a small farm in Pennsylvania, and houses and lots in Coleville and Deckertown. He has paid particular attention to the raising of fine stock, particularly horses. The celebrated trotting mare "Goldsmith Maid" was foaled on his farm in 1857, and sold by him, in 1863, for three hundred and fifty dollars to John H. Decker and Thomas Bingham, of Newburg, N. Y.

Mr. Decker has now reached the mature age of seventy-eight years, and is well preserved, and in full possession of all his faculties. He is a man of strict integrity, possesses the confidence of many friends, and is a contributor to the Clove Presbyterian Church. A Republican in politics, he has never been an aspirant after place. He has been twice married. His first wife was Sarah, daughter of William and Elizabeth Decker, to whom he was united on April 24, 1824, and who bore him the following children,—viz., William (deceased); Naomia E. (deceased); Elizabeth (deceased), wife of Jansen H. Beemer; Mary (deceased); Bowdewine (deceased); Daniel W., who died from disease contracted in the army in the late Rebellion; and Emma R., wife of Judson J. Wickham, of Craigville, Orange Co., N. Y. Mr. Decker's second wife was Charity M. Kilpatrick, whom he married on March 20, 1855. She was born May 12, 1824, and died March 15, 1868, leaving one child, Lillie, wife of Jacob Swartwout, of Wantage township.

JACOB E. HORNBECK.

The Hornbeck family is one of the pioneer families of Sussex County, and was early represented in Ulster Co., N. Y., being of Dutch extraction.

Philip was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch and the first representative of the family in this section. His son Jacob was one of the early and prominent physicians of the county. He resided a part of his life where Jacob Westbrook lives, in Sandyston township, and in Montague township, and was licensed to practice by the State board of censors on Oct. 5, 1802. He enjoyed a large and extensive practice, and at one time represented his fellow-citizens in the Legislature of the State. His wife was Esther, daughter of Capt. John I. Westbrook, and granddaughter of Jacob Westbrook, and his children who reached mature years were seven in number—namely, John W., a prominent lawyer of Allentown, Pa., who died in 1848, while representing his district in Congress; Maria (deceased), wife of James Bassett, of Honesdale, Pa.; Sarah, widow of Dr. Cornelius Stillwell; Elizabeth, widow of Archibald Drake; Cornelius, a leading merchant and lumber-dealer of Honesdale, Pa.; Margaret, widow of William Cortright; and Jacob E., our subject. Dr. Hornbeck died Nov. 12, 1859, aged eighty-four years.

Jacob E. Hornbeck was born March 20, 1820, on his father's homestead, in Sandyston township, where his earlier years were passed. He enjoyed the benefits of academic instruction under Rev. Mr. Allen at Milford, Pa., and at the Allentown Academy. Upon attaining the age of twenty years he entered mercantile life as a clerk in Honesdale, Pa., where he remained for five years, owning one-quarter interest in the White Mills, near Honesdale, and in eighteen hundred acres of land in Wayne Co., Pa., and superintending the erection, one summer, of a new mill, at an expense of two thousand eight hundred dollars.

At the conclusion of that time he engaged in trade in Montague, in partnership with Jacob Hornbeck, and married, for his first wife, Mary D., daughter of James B. Armstrong, of that township, who died a few months later. In 1847 he opened a store at the Lackawaxen Narrows, in Pike Co., Pa., and continued at that point for four years. He then moved to Hawley, Pa., and, in partnership with Joseph S. Soliday, followed mercantile pursuits for two years.

On Jan. 3, 1856, he married, for his second wife, Zillah M., daughter of Samuel and Margaret Whitaker, of Deckertown, N. J., and soon after removed to that place. He purchased a cedar swamp near the village, erected a mill, and for a time manufactured cedar shingles quite extensively. Subsequently he assisted his father-in-law, Mr. Whitaker, in the management of his affairs, and later engaged in trade in the village, in partnership with John A. Beemer and John Loomis, under the firm-name of Hornbeck, Beemer & Co., for about five years. After the termination of this business connection he purchased the Deckertown mill property, and has since owned and operated the grist-mill at that point.

Mr. Hornbeck is recognized as one of the self-made, influential, and successful business men of Wantage. Starting out in life with small capital, but filled with an ambition to do and succeed, he has, by the exercise of sound judgment, industry, and close application to business, achieved honorable prominence in business life. He is generous and liberal-minded, a warm supporter of the progressive and benevolent enterprises of the day, and one of the moving men of Deckertown. A few years ago he erected the Opera House block, in size fifty-four by eighty feet, and comprising several stores and a public hall, which he still owns. He has dealt considerably in real estate and owns several houses and buildings, besides a farm of two hundred and eighty-seven acres in Orange Co., N. Y. He is a Democrat in politics, was a warm supporter of the war, and postmaster at Deckertown for two years, commencing April 1, 1859. He has been collector of Wantage township for two years past, being chosen without opposition, and was trustee and clerk of Deckertown school for thirteen years. He has acted as the private adviser and counsel of a number of friends, and has administered five different estates. Towards the project of bringing the Midland Railroad to Deckertown he contributed fifteen hundred dollars, and lent warm personal encouragement.

His children are Maggie E., wife of Whitfield Gibbs, editor of the Deckertown Independent, and Samuel W., residing at home.

ELIAS COOPER.

Capt. Elias Cooper, as he was familiarly known, was one of the strong men of Wantage township in early days, and did much by his energy and force of character to develop the industries of the section of country in which he located. His father was Obadiah Cooper, of English descent, and a farmer at Fishkill, Dutchess Co., N. Y. Here Elias was born, on July 19, 1783. He grew up on the paternal farm, and attended the common schools of his day. When he had attained the age of twenty-nine he was induced to come to Sussex County and take charge of the plantation of his maternal uncle, Dominic Elias Van Benschoten, one of the pioneer Dutch ministers of the Minisink region, who became widely known throughout that section. The removal to Sussex County occurred on April 1, 1812. This large tract of land, lying in Wantage township, and comprising about one thousand acres, finally became the property of Capt. Cooper, subject to a bequest of twenty thousand dollars, which the captain paid, to Rutgers College, New Brunswick, which had been left by Rev. Van Benschoten to that institution, provided his will was read at each annual meeting of the Classis of New Brunswick. Upon this tract Capt. Cooper lived, surrounded by his slaves, and engaged in agricultural operations, and in running a grist- and saw-mill at the "Clove." He was a gentleman of the olden time, liberal and public-spirited, of strong judgment and common sense, and one whose advice and assistance were sought by all classes of people. He loaned a great deal of money through his section, and many families whose representatives are now leading agriculturists in Wantage received their first start through his liberality and assistance. He took great interest in local military affairs, and was a captain in the militia of his day. He was a Whig in politics, and a strong pillar in the Clove Presbyterian Church. In his latter days he was actively interested in the temperance cause. He passed away on Sept. 9, 1846, dividing his property equitably among his children, who still own a large portion of the original estate.

Capt. Cooper was married on Dec. 25, 1811, to Sarah, daughter of Henry and Sarah (Rosencrans) Dodge, of Dutchess Co., N. Y., and a member of the influential family of that name, in New York City. Her father, Henry Dodge, was once a representative in the New York Legislature, and many of her relatives performed active service in the Revolutionary war. Mrs. Cooper was born May 4, 1790, and died on June 12, 1872. Her children were as follows: Matthew H., born Oct. 25, 1812, residing in Brooklyn, N. Y.; John J., born April 9, 1814, residing at Goshen, N. Y.; William, born Sept. 16, 1815, graduated at Princeton College, practiced law at Deckertown, died March 3, 1842; Sarah M., born April 30, 1817, married Asa Smith, of Wantage, Sept. 30, 1835; James H., born Feb. 21, 1819, died Nov. 19, 1876; Charles A., born Jan. 2, 1821, graduated at the University of New York, practiced medicine for twenty-two years in Wantage township, now a leading oil operator at Oil City, Pa.; Hannah E., born Jan. 23, 1823, deceased, wife of W. W. Rose, of Brooklyn; Mahlon, born June 26, 1824, residing at Warwick; Walter, born Sept. 28, 1828, died Aug. 14, 1830; and Daniel W., born March 7, 1831, a practicing physician of Wantage township.

EVI DE WITT.

Among the many old families who, about the middle of the seventeenth century, sought the shores of the New World, none had been more distinguished in political and social life, none had numbered in its ranks more noted men than the De Witts.

Natives of Dordrecht, one of the oldest burgher towns of Holland, and in later years dear to art as the birthplace of Cuyper and Ary Scheffer, and to theology as the meeting-place of the Synod of Dort, the "Geslachtten von Dordrecht" in the Royal Library at the Hague, gives the descent of the De Witt family in an unbroken line from the year 1295 to Sept. 8, 1639. Some of the names served under William the Silent, and were zealous supporters of the revolted provinces against Spanish oppression. After the death of John of Barneveldt, Jacob De Witt succeeded to the high honors of "Land Advocate of Holland." His son Cornelius, the burgomaster of Dordrecht, "at the head of a Dutch fleet, with a stout Dutch admiral to do his bidding," sailed up the Thames, burning the English ships and sending consternation into the very heart of London. Another son, John De Witt, one of the most distinguished men in the history of the Netherlands, became Grand Pensionary of Holland during the period between the separation from Spain and the opening of the Thirty Years' War.

The family emigration to the colony of "New Amsterdam" began about the year 1639. Andries and Tjerck Claus De Witt located at Esopus, in Ulster Co., N. Y., about 1648, and became the progenitors of the Ulster branch of the family. As the generations increased the family became numerous, and some of its representatives followed the line of settlement through the Manakating and Minisink regions, and have since been numerous represented in that section.

Moses De Witt, son of Jacob and Leah De Witt, and father of our subject, was born Oct. 23, 1761. He served in the war at Minisink, where he held the office of captain, and is said to have stood his ground against the Indians, and to have fought bravely until a white man was no longer to be seen. After the struggle he located in Wantage township, Sussex Co., near the Jacob W. De Witt farm, where he passed his days as a farmer, being one of the pioneers of Wantage. To himself and wife, Margaret, were born the following children,—namely, Hiram, born Nov. 9, 1783; Olivia, born Jan. 7, 1785, married Amos Titsworth, of Wantage; Jezereh, born Sept. 1, 1786; Tjerck, born April 19, 1788; Evi, born June 11, 1789; Moses, born Sept. 1, 1790; Mary, born April 20, 1792; Aaron, born June 24, 1793; Elizabeth, born Jan. 20, 1796, married Edward Lewis; Margaret, born Oct. 13, 1797, married Samuel Smith; John, born Jan. 18, 1799; Naomi, born March 23, 1801, married John B. Decker; Jacob W., born Nov. 27, 1804; and Catharine, born March 23, 1806, married Jacob Swarts. Of this large family of children, all attained mature years save Hiram, who was killed in early life by the falling of a tree. Olivia, Evi, Moses, Elizabeth, and Jacob W. became residents of Wantage. Jacob, Soferine, and Samuel were brothers of the first Moses. The first two passed their lives in Wantage township, and Samuel removed West. Moses De Witt died Dec. 8, 1842, and his wife on May 19, 1845.

Evi De Witt, the subject of this sketch, is one of the oldest residents of Sussex County, being in his ninety-second year. He was born June 11, 1789, in Wantage township, grew up on his father's farm, and at the age of seventeen went to learn the trade of a tanner and currier with John Peckham, of Greenville, Orange Co., N. Y. He worked as an apprentice for two years, and was taken in as a joint partner the third year. On March 9, 1811, he married Prudence Stoddard, a native of Connecticut, who was born Nov. 6, 1791. After this event he continued to work at his trade for some time, when he removed to his native township and engaged in tanning and carrying on the farm where his son, Jonathan S. De Witt, now lives. Here his family was born and raised, the two avocations of farming and tanning being separately pursued. Upon the marriage of his son, Jonathan S., Mr. De Witt purchased the Tjerck De Witt farm, whereon he erected his present residence, about twenty-eight years ago. He subsequently resided for a few years where Jacob W. De Witt now lives.

The life of Mr. De Witt has been a modest and busy one, spent within the inner circles of society, yet having an important relation to the growth and development of the community in which he has passed so many years. He enjoys the respect and confidence of his friends for his honest, straightforward, and manly life, and will carry down with him, at a green old age, the recollection of a sincere, earnest, and useful career. He is a Democrat in politics, and has filled the leading offices of his township, though never a seeker after place. He is a member of the Wantage Methodist Episcopal Church, and a liberal contributor to church and kindred interests. His wife died Aug. 25, 1873. Of a large family of children eight are still living, and his grandchildren number twenty-four. The children were Lucy S., born Feb. 9, 1812, who resides in Wantage, and married John L. Decker and Obadiah A. Wright; Jezerceel, born Sept. 16, 1813, died Aug. 24, 1821; Hannah, born Oct. 11, 1815, wife of Halsey Kite; Simeon S., born Dec. 21, 1817, and Lorenzo, born Feb. 20, 1820, both of whom died Aug. 21, 1821; Prudence, born Sept. 3, 1822, married Benjamin Vanetten; Jonathan S., born May 31, 1825, a leading farmer of Wantage; Lucretia, born July 23, 1827, died Feb. 9, 1846; Arminda L., born Dec. 1, 1829, wife of Nathaniel W. Bailey; Daniel S., born Feb. 23, 1832; Nelson, born April 9, 1834, residing on the home farm; and Margaret L., born Aug. 19, 1836, wife of Abraham J. Decker, of Wantage.

JACOB W. DE WITT.

Jacob W. De Witt, son of Moses and Margaret De Witt, was born on the homestead of his father, in Wantage township, on Nov. 27, 1804. He came of distinguished Dutch stock in Holland, and the family of which he is a representative has long been identified with the settlement and development of the section of country in which he lives. The earlier history of his ancestors is presented in connection with the sketch of his older brother, Evi De Witt, in this work.

Until the death of his parents the life of Mr. De Witt was passed on the old homestead, which he farmed on shares a portion of the time. His education was obtained at the district school which stood on the corner, near his present residence, on the "Clove" road. On Feb. 3, 1830, he was united in marriage to Phoebe, daughter of Constant and Lydia A. Fuller, of Wantage. She was born April 10, 1810, and died Sept. 4, 1857. After the demise of his father the home farm came to Mr. De Witt, upon which he lived, engaged in agricultural pursuits, until his removal to his present residence, in 1873, and which he still owns. He is recognized as one of the successful leading representative agriculturists of Wantage, and by a life of industry, integrity, and fair dealing has accumulated a good estate and won the respect and confidence of many friends. He is a man of generous impulses, liberal in his support of the religious and benevolent institutions of his day, and for thirty years past has been an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Wantage. He was formerly a Democrat in politics, but now identified with the Republican party, and has filled the office of freeholder, and the minor offices of the township, as the representative of each party. He took an active interest in the project of bringing the Midland Railroad to Deckertown, to which he contributed two thousand dollars, and is one of the well-preserved, intelligent, and popular aged men of his section. His children by his first marriage were as follows: Lydia A., born Dec. 30, 1830; Constant F., born March 29, 1833, died May 27, 1867; Miranda L., born Feb. 22, 1835, married Alfred Hardin, died Jan. 8, 1876; Theodore, born July 9, 1837, a leading farmer in Wantage; Sarah Naomi, born July 31, 1841; Emma A., born Dec. 5, 1843, died May 20, 1852; Margaret, born June 14, 1846, widow of Dr. Lewis Westfall; Moses, born April 30, 1849, a graduate of Princeton College in 1870, and a practicing lawyer at Newark, N. J.; and an infant son, who died unnamed. His second wife was Fanny, daughter of Henry and Sarah Shepherd, of Wantage, and widow of Silas Lewis, of the same place. She was born March 24, 1814, and is the present helpmeet of his home.

CHARLES A. WILSON.

The Wilson family is of Scotch extraction, and has been identified from the earliest years with the settlement and development of Wantage and contiguous townships in Sussex County.

Andrew Wilson, the pioneer of that branch of the family to which the subject of this sketch belongs, was born in Scotland, on Nov. 30, 1726, and emigrated to this country from Ireland in early life. He was of good family and a commissioned officer under George III., serving at the battle of Ticonderoga during the French and Indian war. He was badly wounded in the service, and granted a patent of land by the government. He first located in Wantage township, near the Walkill River, and finally established himself where his grandson now resides, and where he passed his life in clearing up land, tilling the soil, and in the usual farming operations incident to a pioneer life. Himself and wife, Martha Ferguson, were among the six who formed the first Methodist class in this section of Sussex County. She was born on March 5, 1731, and the marriage occurred on Aug. 29, 1750. The fruits of the union were Mary, born Aug. 13, 1751; Joseph, born Oct. 29, 1752; Benjamin, born May 24, 1754; Andrew, born Nov. 27, 1755; Catharine, born Sept. 15, 1757; Hope, born Jan. 1, 1760; Jacob, born May 23, 1761; Margaret, born July 17, 1763; Addi and Neri, born May 24, 1765; Martha, born Feb. 14, 1767; Iiram, born March 4, 1769; Forger, born June 2, 1771; and Abiah, born March 9, 1773.

Andrew Wilson died Nov. 6, 1802, and his wife on February 16th of the same year.

Abiah Wilson, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born on the old homestead, on the date indicated above. He occupied throughout life a large tract of productive land in Wantage township, and became favorably known as a successful and representative agriculturist. At his death he divided his property equitably among his children, and many of his descendants are still identified with the farming and business interests of that section. To himself and wife, Mary Lobden, a large family of children were born,—namely, a son, Jan. 26, 1794; Andrew, April 15, 1797, died Sept. 15, 1874; Eliza, July 18, 1798; Julia, Nov. 17, 1800; Mathias, Oct. 25, 1801; Eliza, July 4, 1804, married William Stoddard, died July 4, 1847; Samuel, Feb. 6, 1806; Augustus, July 2, 1807; Philetus, father of our subject; James, July 9, 1810; a daughter, April 1, 1811; Mary, May 18, 1812, married John Fuller, died Aug. 16, 1844; Abiah, April 23, 1814; Lebeus, Aug. 17, 1817, died April 8, 1846; Lida, March 1, 1819, married James Coe. Abiah Wilson died Nov. 15, 1827, and his wife, Mary, on Feb. 9, 1855.

Philetus Wilson was born near Deckertown, March 11, 1809, and passed the whole of a long and useful life, following the calling of the soil, in Wantage township, residing over forty years on the same farm. Springing from old colonial stock, he was possessed of the sterling integrity and sound practical sense which formed so distinguishing a feature of the pioneer settlers of Sussex County. He was for many years prominently identified with the agricultural interests of Wantage, and took a prominent part in the organization and control of the successful county fairs of Sussex County. An ardent lover of nature, he took just pride in all that pertained to agriculture, and always welcomed the aid of inventive genius to forward and lighten the toils of the husbandman. For a score of years he had a valuable nursery on his farm; did much to advance the standard of horticulture in his locality. He was a liberal contributor to church and kindred interests, and a member, first, of the Baptist, and subsequently of the Methodist, denomination of Christians. A Democrat in politics, he held aloof from the strife and turmoil of public life, and filled only the minor offices of his township. Possessed of a genial and kindly nature, a warm and generous heart, and endowed with that rare Christian spirit that carries religion into the daily walks of life, he was deservedly popular in the community in which he dwelt, and held in high esteem by his friends and neighbors. His last illness was comparatively brief, and he passed away on Feb. 10, 1876, in the bosom of his family and surrounded with every comfort that a life of industry, integrity, and fair dealing had enabled him to enjoy.

His wife, who survives him, was Clarissa, daughter of Andrew and Miriam (De Witt) Wilson, a descendant, on the paternal side, of the original ancestor of the family in the line of Joseph Wilson. Her father was for many years a justice of the peace, and one of the lay judges of the Court of Common Pleas of Sussex County. The marriage occurred Dec. 25, 1835, and of the union was born an only child, Charles A. Wilson, on Oct. 20, 1840. The earlier years of the latter were passed upon his father's farm, and he received a thorough preliminary and academic education at the celebrated institution of William Rankin, at Deckertown. In early life he entered the mercantile business in the store of E. C. and Ira C. Moore, of Newton, N. J. Finding that occupation too confining, he returned to the paternal farm and engaged in the creamery business for some time, and later went to the State of Iowa, where he engaged with success in the lumber and grain traffic, and where a large part of his business interests still lie, being attended to by responsible agents. Returning home at the urgent solicitation of his parents, he resumed the creamery business for a period, and devoted much time and energy in bringing the Midland Railroad of New Jersey to his native place. That desirable object accomplished, he embarked in the lumber and coal business at Deckertown, in which he is at present engaged.

Mr. Wilson represents that class of young, active, and energetic business men for which Deckertown is noted, and who bear a very important relation to the business growth and prosperity of the place. He takes an active interest in all movements tending to improve and develop the village, and has added to its architectural attractions by the erection of a handsome residence for himself. He bears in the community the reputation of an honorable and upright man, is one of the directors of the Farmers' National Bank of Deckertown, and is otherwise identified with the various institutions of his section. He was one of the builders of the Middletown and Crawford Railroad, running from Middletown to Pine Bush, Orange Co., N. Y.; is a member and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Deckertown, and acts politically with the Republican party, though he is decidedly averse to the holding of public office. He is also interested in the agricultural prosperity of Wantage township, and owns one of the finest farms in Sussex County, it being a part of the old homestead of his great-grandfather, Andrew Wilson, and the same occupied by his father during his lifetime. He is prominently identified with the institution of Ma-soury, was formerly a member of Harmony Lodge,

A. F. and A. M., of Newton, and was one of the founders of Samaritan Lodge, No. 98, of Deckertown, to which he belongs, and of Masons' Home Lodge, Iowa Falls, Iowa. He is also a member of Baldwin Chapter, No. 17, R. A. M., of Newton. He was married on July 10, 1872, to Emma A., daughter of Solomon G. Gibbs, of Oswego, N. Y. She died Aug. 19, 1880, leaving two children, Clara A. Wilson, born May 13, 1873, and Charles G. Wilson, born May 7, 1877.

HUMPHREY MARTIN.

Humphrey Martin was a son of Nathaniel Martin, born on Aug. 31, 1762, and who was one of the pioneer settlers of Wantage township, in Sussex County. Nathaniel Martin's wife was Phila Potter, who was born April 29, 1763, and the issue of the marriage, Mary, born Oct. 9, 1782, who married Jephtha Martin, and died May 31, 1816; Sarah, born March 19, 1786; Humphrey, born Aug. 15, 1789; and Lebeus, born April 11, 1794. Nathaniel Martin died in 1854, and his wife, Phila, on July 8, 1833. The father of Nathaniel Martin was Humphrey, who died April 17, 1805. Ichabod and James were brothers of Nathaniel, and the family originated in Middlesex Co., N. J.

Humphrey Martin was one of the leading and controlling men of his day, and was born in Wantage township on the date indicated above. Throughout a long life he exerted a wide influence as a successful and progressive farmer, and enjoyed the confidence and respect of a wide circle of acquaintances and friends. He was a Democrat in politics, and held the ordinary township offices. He was for many years a member and officer of the First Baptist Church of Wantage, and a strong pillar in its counsels. He was actively identified with the progressive movements of his day, and gave the right of way through his farm to the Midland Railroad of New Jersey. He died Oct. 30, 1878. His wife was Isabella Teasdale, and the children, Lebeus, Thomas T., Nathaniel, James J., Eliza, who married Stephen Cole; Prudence, who became the wife of Ellis A. Post; Phila, who married Harry Post; Mary, who married Hopkins Chandler; Lydia; Ann T., wife of Moses B. Northrup; and Sarah, who became the wife of Jackson D. Jay. Lebeus Martin occupies the residence of his father, near Deckertown, is a leading and influential farmer, and represented Sussex County in the Legislature for two years, 1871 and 1872. His son, James F., is one of the growing young agriculturists of Wantage.

JACOB B. LEPORT.

This family is of French descent. The grandfather of our subject resided at an early day at Quebec, Canada, and served in the French army at the time of its taking by Gen. Wolfe. Removing to New Jersey, he settled at Suscumna Plains, where he ended his days. His children were Cornelius, who settled near Blairstown, N. J.; Abraham, who located in Virginia; James, who settled in New York State; Mary, who died young; and John, father of Jacob B. Leport.

John Leport was born in the year 1779, and was raised to the trade of a blacksmith, in Morris Co., N. J. About the opening of the present century he married Abby Burt, and removed to Sussex County, purchasing a farm near Columbia, in Byram township, of one hundred and thirty acres. He farmed this tract about thirty-five years, and then purchased a farm in the same township, near the Sparta line, where he remained until his demise, on April 22, 1857. His wife died in 1838, aged fifty-eight years. Their children were Mary, Nathaniel, Cornelius, Cyrus (for many years a successful lawyer at Stanhope, N. J.), John, Jacob B., Lydia (who married Michael L. Lawrence), William, Andrew, and Madeline, who married Morris Hoppage.

Jacob B. Leport was born in Byram township, Sussex Co., N. J., on March 23, 1815, and passed his boyhood days on the paternal farm, enjoying, meanwhile, the benefits of such educational training as the common schools of his locality afforded. On March 1, 1838, he married Ann, daughter of Samuel C. and Hannah (Blaine) Beardsley, of Hardyston township, who was born April 6, 1818. Her grandfather, Thomas Blaine, served in the Revolutionary war, and lived to be nearly one hundred years of age. Soon after the marriage Mr. Leport commenced to work the home farm on shares, and subsequently took a long lease on it, and operated it for nineteen years. In 1859 he removed to Wantage township, Sussex Co., and purchased of Evi De Witt the John De Witt farm of one hundred and eighty acres, where he has since resided. He is recognized as one of the successful representative farmers of the county, and the outbuildings and appointments of his farm indicate careful and thrifty management. He devotes himself principally to the dairy business, and makes large quantities of butter. He is a Republican in politics, and in 1879 was the reform freeholder of Wantage township, being chosen to that position in a township largely Democratic. He was for several years a commissioner of deeds, and sustains, in the community in which he resides, the reputation of a successful and prudent farmer, of correct principles and habits, and one who is entitled to the confidence of his fellows. He is a regular attendant of the Presbyterian Church of Deckertown, and was for fourteen years a trustee of Wantage Methodist Episcopal Church.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Leport are William H. Leport, born Nov. 11, 1838, a resident of Newark, N. J., and Amzi B., born Aug. 13, 1846, residing in Wantage township.

IRA D. HOFFMAN.

Ira D. Hoffman is a descendant, in the fourth generation, of John Hoffman, who came to this country from Holland before the Revolutionary war and settled at Esopus, Ulster Co., N. Y. There he lived until his death, engaging in agricultural pursuits. He had three sons,—John, James, and Zachariah.

The first two remained in Ulster County until death. Zachariah, who was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, removed to Sussex Co., N. J., soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, and located near Van Sickle Town, where he passed his life as a farmer. His wife was Sarah De Witt, who bore him three sons and one daughter,—namely, James, Zachariah, Cornelius, and Mary, who married and went West. Cornelius removed to the neighborhood of Oswego, N. Y., where he lived and died. James passed his life in Wantage township, where some of his descendants are still to be found.

Zachariah Hoffman, father of Ira D., was born in 1778. In the year 1800 he took up his residence where Ira D. Hoffman now lives, where he pursued the avocation of a farmer throughout his life, and died July 21, 1861. His wife was Hannah Dennis, of whom were born eight children,—viz., Sarah, who married Lewis Van Sickle, of Wantage; Levi (deceased); Rosanna (deceased), who married James Brink; Catharine (deceased), who married Jacob Brink; Richard W., a farmer residing near Milford, Pa.; Anna, wife of Squire Northrup, of Athens, Pa.; Alida, wife of Jerome B. Gilson, of Wantage; and Ira D. Hoffman. Mrs. Hoffman died April 24, 1859, aged seventy-nine years.

Ira D. Hoffman was born Dec. 3, 1821, on the family homestead, where he still resides. He grew up on the paternal farm, and enjoyed the advantages of a common-school education only. On March 13, 1841, he married Margaret J., daughter of Joseph and Hannah (Smith) Davenport, a representative of one of the pioneer families of Wantage township. Soon after that event Mr. Hoffman commenced working the home farm on shares, and after a few years he purchased an adjoining farm, and, leasing the homestead tract, worked the two together until the demise of his father, in 1861. He then purchased the interest of the heirs in the home farm and became its possessor. Besides this tract, of about ninety acres, he owns two other farms in the neighborhood, besides the Hoffman House hotel property at Coleville. He has met with success as a tiller of the soil, but has paid principal attention to dairying.

As a public man Squire Hoffman is widely and favorably known throughout his section. In politics he is a Democrat, and has held the minor offices of his township. For a score of years he was a justice of the peace, and a large share of the litigation in his locality was disposed of by him for years. To this position he added the profession of a conveyancer, was a commissioner of deeds for fifteen years, and has drawn large numbers of legal papers for his friends and neighbors. He also engaged with success in the pension business for many years. Owing to these several avocations, he has been brought into business contact with large numbers of people, his counsel and advice have been sought by many who were in need of assistance, and his services have been

George Shepherd

GEORGE SHEPHERD is a great-grandson of Abraham Shepherd, an early resident of the Minisink, who lost his life during the prevalence of Indian atrocities at that point. James, his grandfather, came early to Deckertown, where he followed the avocation of a blacksmith for some time. He subsequently purchased the tract of land upon which the family have since resided, about two and a half miles southeast of Deckertown, where he followed his trade, and also engaged in agricultural pursuits. He erected, in 1806, the present residence of George Shepherd. His wife was Mary Randall, and the children of the union were Temperance, who became the wife of Nathaniel Fountain; Henry; Susan, who married Richard Elston; and Melinda, who married Elijah Coykendall.

Henry Shepherd was born on April 20, 1788, and subsequently came into possession of the family estate. He married Sarah, daughter of Constant and Lydia Fuller, born April 20, 1795, and had children,—Harvey, born Dec. 26, 1811, residing in Jersey City; Fanny, born March 24, 1814, widow of Silas Lewis, and present wife of Jacob W. De Witt, of Wantage; Lydia Ann, widow of David Wilson, and present wife of Jeremiah Bennett, of Unionville, N. Y.; Mary, who married Archibald Fountain and resides at Hamburg; Lavinia, wife of Lewis Adams, of Wantage; Jesse, a farmer in Wantage; and George, the subject of this sketch. Mr. Shepherd was a man of a retiring disposition, and passed his life within the inner circles of existence. He was an intelligent and industrious farmer, of strict integrity, and gave liberally of his means to the support of the progressive institutions of his day. He died in 1875, and his wife in July, 1878.

George Shepherd was born May 1, 1831, on the homestead of his grandfather, which he now owns. He obtained his elementary education at the district school of his neighborhood, and completed his studies at Rankin's Academy, Deckertown. He married, on Jan. 1, 1862, Sarah E., daughter of Daniel and Ann C. Hall, of Wantage, and has one child, Sarah Georgiana, born Feb. 23, 1870. After his marriage he cultivated the home-farm on shares, and subsequently purchased it of his father. Besides this tract of one hundred and forty-five acres, he owns an adjoining farm of one hundred and thirty-five acres. He is one of the successful, thrifty farmers of Wantage township, a man of strict integrity and unblemished character, and one who enjoys the respect and esteem of the community in which he lives. He is a Republican in politics, but no office-seeker, is a member and trustee of the First Baptist Church of Wantage, and is a warm supporter of the benevolent institutions of his day. Towards bringing the Midland Railroad to Deckertown he contributed five hundred dollars.

frequently called into demand in the settlement and adjustment of estates in the capacity of executor or administrator. He has performed the duties of his several positions with singular exactness and fidelity, and is held in general respect for his integrity and honorable dealings. He is a member of the Mount Salem Baptist Church, of which he is a trustee, and was its clerk and treasurer for many years. He is still in active business life.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Hoffman are Mary E., wife of John Flynn, of Port Jervis, N. Y.; Horace D., residing in Wantage township; Rebecca M., wife of Abraham S. Magill, of Middletown, N. Y.; and Maggie A., wife of Thomas N. Roloson, of Wantage.

OSCAR DUNN.

His grandfather was Daniel Dunn, who came from Piscataway, N. J., before the Revolutionary war and located on the old homestead, now owned by our subject, adjoining that where the latter now resides. Daniel Dunn passed his life engaged in agricultural operations, which in those early days implied incessant labor and toil, amid the privations and hardships of pioneer life. He had four children,—namely, Drake, Daniel, Ruth, and Charity; the latter married a man by the name of Gould. Drake settled in Wantage township and farmed throughout his life.

Daniel Dunn, father of Oscar, was born on the home farm in the year 1792, and on that one place passed his entire life in the tilling of the soil. He died in 1858. His wife was Mary Springstard, who bore him six children,—namely, Alanson, now a farmer and merchant at Unionville, N. Y.; Oscar; Sarah (deceased), who married William Elston; Moses (deceased); Mary (deceased), who married Samuel C. Potter; and Charlotte, wife of Nicholas Cox, of Wantage township. Mrs. Dunn died in 1853.

Oscar Dunn was born on the Dunn homestead, in Wantage, on April 25, 1818. He grew up on the paternal farm, and attended the district school of his neighborhood. Until the death of his father, in 1858, he worked the home place on shares, but after this time he came into possession, partly by descent and partly by purchase, of the tract, now comprising one hundred and seventy acres, which he still owns. By careful, systematic, and industrious habits of life, together with intelligent management, Mr. Dunn has achieved great success in agricultural operations, and is one of the wealthiest and most successful farmers of his section. He has always made a specialty of the dairy business, and from keeping twelve cows he has run up to one hundred and fifty at the present writing (1881). The advent of the Midland Railroad to his native township has afforded ample facilities for the transportation of milk to the city markets, and his daily shipment of that product of farming industry averages twenty-five cans the year round. In addition to the homestead, Mr. Dunn owns several other farms, including sixty-six acres upon which he now resides, the Henry De Witt farm, in Wantage, of over one hundred and ninety-three acres, a farm in Orange Co., N. Y., of one hundred and twenty-eight acres, eighty acres near the Dunn Vale school-house, and thirty-four acres in Vernon township. He moved to his present residence in 1866, and erected his attractive and admirably designed dwelling in 1870. It is one of the handsomest architectural structures, for a farm-residence, in Sussex County, and furnished throughout in a tasteful and elegant style.

In 1879, Mr. Dunn's barn was destroyed by fire, in which were burned thirty cows, eighty tons of hay, three horses, wagons, and other farming conveniences to a large amount. With an insurance of only one thousand dollars, however, he replaced the structure with his present commodious barn and outbuildings in 1880. He was married on Jan. 1, 1842, to Sarah Louisa, daughter of John and Phebe Elston, of Wantage, and has one son, Thomas Jefferson Dunn, born Nov. 11, 1842, and who married, on Oct. 22, 1872, Ellen, daughter of Barret D. Havens, of Wantage township. Mr. Dunn is a Democrat in politics, though no office-seeker, and, with his wife and family, is a member of the Orange Baptist Church of Unionville, N. Y.

I.—PHYSICAL FEATURES.

THE present township of Walpack is one of the smallest civil divisions of Sussex County. It contains 21.3 square miles of territory, and comprises an area of 13,632 acres. It is 9 miles in length from extreme points, and 3 miles in width in its widest part. The Delaware River, flowing along the western border, forms the boundary line between Walpack and Pennsylvania. At the southwest corner of the township the stream describes a sweeping bend, and, returning for nearly a mile, again makes a sharp curve to the southward.

* By Prof. W. W. Clayton.

Walpack is bounded north by Sandyston and the Delaware River; east by Stillwater; south by Warren County; west by the Delaware River. Aside from the rich valley through which the Flatbrook flows and the strip of lowland along the river border, the township is wholly mountainous, the Blue Mountain range conspicuously separating it from Stillwater on the east.

The Delaware and Flatbrook valleys comprise the best farming lands of the township. These valleys are separated by a chain of hills known in the upper part of the township for two-thirds of its length as Pompey Ridge, and for the remaining one-third, at the lower end, as Walpack Hill, terminating near Walpack church. Flatbrook is formed by the junction of two streams called Little and Big Flatbrook, which unite in Sandyston, near Peters' Valley, the former rising near Hainesville, in Sandyston township, and the latter in the mountains of Montague. This brook is a considerable stream, and flows nearly parallel with the Delaware from its source to its confluence with the latter river, at Flatbrookville. At the mouth of this stream, in the Delaware River, is the remarkable whirlpool which in the Indian language, according to Heckewelder, gave name to the ancient territory of Walpack. This authority says, "'Walpack' is a corruption of 'Wahlpeck,' which in the Indian language signifies a 'turn-hole,' or whirlpool in the water. It is compounded of the two Indian words waa-lac, 'a hole,' and tuppeck, 'a pool.'" The name "turn-hole"—a provincialism now obsolete—was used to designate a sudden bend of a stream by which the water, when deep, is turned back upon itself in an eddy or whirlpool. The eddy from which Walpack takes its name is visible at low water, but during great floods it becomes a powerful whirlpool, sucking in large pieces of timber and carrying them out of sight.

The population of Walpack in 1880 was 571,—a decrease of 76 in the last decade. Its entire assessed valuation was $280,557, and its total taxes $3013.10.

THE OLD MINE ROAD.

The original township of Walpack, which extended from the New York State line to the Delaware Water Gap, was the only portion of Sussex County traversed by the "Old Mine Road." This road was one of the earliest—and perhaps the earliest of like extent—on the continent of North America, having been built by a company of miners from Holland, as some suppose, before the conquest of the New Netherlands by the English, in 1664. At all events, it was the avenue of communication between the Hudson and the Delaware before the beginning of the eighteenth century, the means of ingress of the Dutch and Huguenot settlers of the rich valley of the Minisink, and their only channel to market on the Hudson for many years before they knew that the Delaware, upon whose banks they had settled, might float them to Philadelphia.

The Old Mine Road was about 100 miles in length, extending from Kingston, on the Hudson River, to the Delaware Water Gap. It was located upon the Mamakating valley, thence across the dividing ridge to the Neversink, or Mackhackemack branch of the Delaware, along which it ran to the latter river, and down the same to its terminus at the old copper-mine in Palaquarry, now Warren County. "This mine was opened about three miles northwest from Nicholas Depue's house, in Walpack township, Sussex Co. (now Warren), N. J.,"* Nicholas Depue lived on the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware, about three miles above the Water Gap.

Count Zinzendorf, accompanied by his eldest daughter, Benigna Henrietta Justina von Zinzendorf, and Anton Seyfert, in August, 1742, made a trip over the Old Mine Road from Nazareth, Pa., to Kingston, en route for Sheeomeco, a Mohican mission near what is now Pine Plains, in Dutchess Co., N. Y. The portion of their route for the first thirty miles to the Delaware at Depue's Ford is described in the journal as being rough and difficult. It led by an Indian trail into the Minisink through Tat's Gap. This, says the writer, was "the most fatiguing part of the journey as far as Rhinebeck; for after crossing that river (the Delaware) into the Jersey Minisink they struck one of the oldest roads in the country so far inland, and no natural avenue of trade and intercourse. This was the 'Old Mine Road,' constructed, it is said, at a very early day by Dutch adventurers. . . . It was by means of communication thus opened that the Dutch now seated themselves along the whole extent of this beautiful valley even to its utmost southerly limits,—most numerously, however, on the Jersey shore of the Delaware." The count and his companions reached Depue's, on the bank of the Delaware, on Saturday evening, August 12th, and on Sunday were escorted to the Walpack church, riding their horses across the ford, it being Dominie Fryenmoet's Sunday at that place. "We were compelled," says the count, "to listen to two sermons, which wearied us."

It will only be anticipating our history a little to remark that at this time there were four Reformed Dutch Churches in the Minisink valley, three of them situated on the Old Mine Road, and one near Depue's Ford, on the Pennsylvania side. The last mentioned was called the Shawaneck or Smithfield Church; the two in Walpack were called respectively the Walpack and Minisink Churches; and the one above the State line, at the confluence of the Mackhackemack with the Delaware, called Mackhackemack Church. To these was subsequently added the Shapanack Church, also in Walpack, upon the Old Mine Road, about seven miles above the Walpack church, which stood in the Bend of the Delaware.

The count seems not to have had the most cordial liking for the young pastor, Johannus Casparus Frycnmoet. The Sunday was very warm, and between the services, "In order to avoid religious controversy," he says, "I went into the woods and read 'Josephus.' The divine came to me and annoyed me with questions and remarks. Although my curt manner provoked him, it served to bring him to reflection; and he sought to propitiate me afterwards by riding with us for several hours. He is the well-known Casper, from Zurich, a well-meaning man, I must confess,—one of the so-called 'Convictionists,' without much conviction, however, and yet efficient for good in his denomination."

Nothing further of interest is recorded during the journey of Count Zinzendorf and his party through Walpack. They passed over the Mine Road to Kingston, stopping one night about half-way between that place and Port Jervis, visited the Mohican mission at Shecomoco, and returned by the same route, reaching the Minisink on the 27th of August.

Conrad Weisser, another distinguished Moravian, made a journey over the Mine Road, en route from Bethlehem to Onondaga, in 1750. He gives the following stations and distances:

- "August 17.—Came to Nazareth.
- "August 18.—Nicklas Deput, in Smithfield, on Delaware, 39 miles.
- "August 19.—Henry Cortrecht, at Minisink, 25 miles.
- "August 20.—Emanuel Pascal, 'the Spaniard,' 35 miles.
- "August 21.—Kings-town (Sopus), 44 miles."

John Adams, while attending Congress during its sessions at Philadelphia, as late as 1800, passed down the Mine Road as the most eligible route from Boston to that city. He was accustomed to lodge at Esquire Van Campen's, in the Jersey Minisink.*

II.—EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The earliest settlers in this township, as well as in the county of Sussex, came in by the Old Mine Road, above described. They were chiefly Hollanders and French Huguenots, or their descendants, from Ulster Co., N. Y. They were the Van Aukens, Van Campens, Deckers, Dupues, Dingmans, Emans, Schoonhovens, Brincks, Westbrooks, Ennises, Van Nests, Cools, De Voors, Swartwouts, Westfahls, Rosenkraus, Kuykendals, Hoornbecks, De Wits, Van de Marks, Vredenburgs, Kortrechts, Hoogtalings, Gumairs, Quicks, Cuddebacks, Schoonmakers, Kermers, and Van Syckles. Among those of Irish, Scotch, Welsh, and English nationalities we find the names of Love, Magee, McClennan, Chambers, Thompson, McCarty, Roet, Burns, Jones, Kimber, Pigeon, Wells, Perry, Conley, and others.

Local records containing most of the above names begin in 1716, when Rev. Petrus Vas, of Kingston, began to visit the settlements and hold religious services, baptizing the children of the settlers. To these memoranda of baptisms were added the records of four Dutch Reformed Churches and their Consistories, beginning with 1737 and continuing through the century. From the record of baptisms in the Minisink and Mackhackemack Churches we take the following:

These local records do not, of course, reach back to the beginning of settlement, but only to the beginning of the period when the religious interests of the community began to be cared for; the first settlements in Walpack began at a period considerably earlier. Some of the acts passed by the Provincial Assembly of New York show that there was a considerable population in the valley of the Delaware, upon and at the mouth of the Mackhackemack, or Neversink, and southward to and including the Minisink islands, prior to the year 1700. In Rittenber's "History of Orange County" we find the following reference to the old precinct of Goshen, which included the first settlements in ancient Walpack:

"That portion of the precinct lying west of the Minisink Mountains was subject to several political changes. By act of Oct. 18, 1701, 'for the more regular proceeding in the election of Representatives,' the inhabitants of 'Wagachemack and Great and Little Minisink' were 'empowered to cast their votes in the county of Ulster.' By act of Nov. 12, 1709, 'to determine, settle, and ascertain the bounds and limits of the County of Orange,' the act of Oct. 18, 1701, was repealed so far as it related to the settlements named, which were in effect declared to be a part of Orange County."[†]

These acts prove beyond controversy that there was a considerable voting population on the Neversink and southward on the Delaware, in ancient Walpack, before the year 1701; for in the act of that year they are named as "the inhabitants of Wagachemack (Mackhackemack) and Great and Little Minisink." The precinct of Goshen, from which they were set off to vote in Ulster, had a municipal organization in 1703, being entitled, under the general law of the province of New York, to "two assessors, a collector, overseer of highways, and a constable." The western part of the precinct was afterwards set off and known as "Minisink precinct."[‡]

PATENTS AND LAND-GRANTS IN WALPACK.

Two early patents were located in Minisink under authority of the province of New York which covered a portion of ancient Walpack. These were the grant made to Arent Schuyler, issued May 20, 1697, and the Minisink patent, granted Aug. 28, 1704. The Schuyler patent embraced 1000 acres adjoining the Mackhackemack and extending southward so as to include the Minisink islands. It is thus described:

"A certain tract of land in Minisink country, in the province of New York, called by the native Indians Warensaghskenick, otherwise called Maghawaemus; also a certain parcel of meadow, or vly, called by the Indians Warensaghskenick, situate, lying, and being upon a certain run, called by the Indians, and known by the name of Minisink, before a certain Island called Menayack, which is adjacent to or near to a certain tract of land called by the Indians Maghakenek, containing the quantity of 1000 acres and no more."

Arent Schuyler, who was employed by the government of New York as an interpreter and agent among the Indians, visited this locality in 1694, and made the following entries in his journal, which he reported to the Governor:

"JOURNAL OF CAPTAIN ARENT SCHUYLER'S VISIT TO THE MINISINK COUNTRY.

"May it please your Excell:

"In pursuance to y^e Excell: commands I have been in the Minisink Country of which I have kept the following journal: viz^t

"1694 y^e 3^d of Feb: I departed from New Yorke for East New Jersey and came that night att Bergenatow where I hired two men and a guide.

"Y^e 4th Sunday Morning. I went from Bergen & travelled about ten English miles beyond Haghsingsack to an Indian place called Peckwes.

"Y^e 5th Monday. From Peckwes North and he West I went about thirty-two miles, snowing and rainy weather.

"Y^e 6th Tuesday. I continued my journey to Maggaghskenick [Port Jervis] and from thence to within half a day's journey to the Minisink.

"Y^e 7th Wednesday. About eleven a clock I arrived att the Minisink, and there I mett with two of their Schems and severall other Indians of whom I enquired after some news, if the French or their Indians had sent for them or been in y^e Minisink Country. Upon w^{ch} they answered that oee French nor any of the French Indians were nor had been in the Minisink Country nor thereabouts and did promise y^e if y^e French should happen to come or y^t they heard of it that they will forthwith send a mesinger and give y^e Excellency notice thereof. . . .

"In the afternoon I departed from y^e Minisinks; the 8th, 9th, & 10th of Feb: I traveled and came to Bergen in y^e morning and about noone arrived at New Yorke.

"This is may it please y^e Excell: the humble report of y^e Excellency's most humble serv^t.

"ARENT SCHUYLER."

The Minisink patent was granted Aug. 28, 1704, to Matthew Long, Ebenezer Wilson, Philip French, Derick Vandenburg, Stephen de Lansey, Philip Rokeley, John Cobert, Daniel Howan, Caleb Cooper, William Sharpas, Robert Milward, Thomas Wenham, Lancaster Syms, John Person, Benjamin Aske, Petrus Bayard, John Colewell, Peter Faconier, Henry Swift, Hendrick Ten Eycke, Jarvis Marshall, Ann Bridges (widow of John Bridges), and George Clark. This grant embraced the western part of Ulster and Orange Counties, and extended southward on the Delaware River "to the south end of Great Minisink Island," and eastward "to the bounds of the Wawayanda patent granted to John Bridges and Company." It was the attempt to crowd down these patents upon the lawful territory of New Jersey, and to appropriate the rich lands of the Minisink and the upper Wallkill, under color of title from New York, that caused the long and bitter boundary line controversy referred to in another part of this work.

GRANTS UNDER THE WEST JERSEY PROPRIETORS.

The earliest tracts referred to under this head were located while the territory of Sussex County was included in Hunterdon and Morris.

On Nov. 6, 1718, Joseph Kirkbride located a tract of land on the Delaware River, adjoining a branch of the same, about three miles above Pahaqualin (an Indian village*), in the county of Hunterdon. Joseph Kirkbride conveyed this tract of land by deed bearing date Oct. 10, 1725, to Nicholas Schoonover and Thomas Brinck. There being an overplus of land within the said bounds, a resurvey was made in 1740 by Martin Ryerson, and the tract was found to contain 1210 acres besides allowance for highways. At the resurvey a more definite description is given of the tract. It is described as "situate in the county of Morris, in the western division of New Jersey, at a place called Walpack, upon the Delaware River, beginning at the mouth of a considerable stream of water which emptieth itself into the Delaware River, commonly called the Flat Kill; thence up the several courses thereof," etc.

This survey embraced the peninsula or hook at the lower end of Walpack, extending about four miles up from the mouth of the Flatbrook. In the same year Joseph Kirkbride located 500 acres farther up, embracing the Shapanack flats. This tract was subsequently owned by Isaac Van Campen, and still later by his son Abraham, from whom it passed to John H. De Witt about 1811 or 1812.

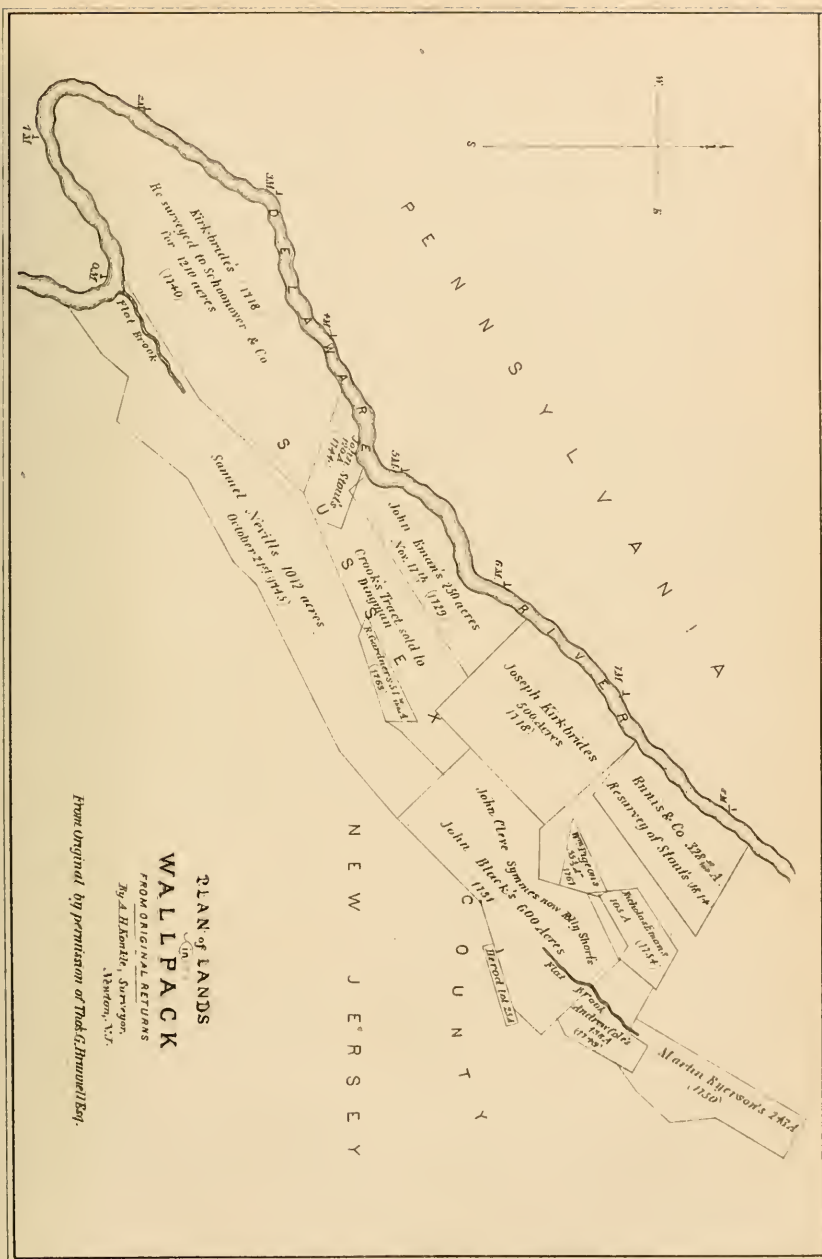

Joseph Kirkbride was a deputy surveyor, and lived and died in Bucks Co., Pa. He was the ancestor of Dr. Kirkbride, of Philadelphia, and of Mrs. Gurney, of Burlington.

Nov. 17, 1725, John Crooks located a survey above Joseph Kirkbride's on the Delaware River. The front of this tract along the Delaware, comprising 250 acres, was sold by John Crooks in 1729 to John Emans, and is the Emans tract shown on the map.

June 7, 1731, Col. Daniel Coxé had a survey made by Samuel Green, deputy surveyor, "situate, lying, and being at a place called the Flat Kill, in the county of Hunterdon." This survey was in that portion of ancient Walpack now Sandyston. Upon the running of the Lawrence line it was found to be in East Jersey, and Col. Coxé, or his heirs, or assigns, received an equivalent for it in the western divisions.

In 1731, John Black purchased the 600 acres on Flatbrook north of the Nevill purchase known as the Black Tract. About 1760 it was purchased by John Cleves Symmes, and became the well-known Symmes purchase.

PLAN OF LANDS
 IN WALLPACK

FROM ORIGINAL RETURNS
 By A. H. KORTZ, SURVEYOR,
 LAWTON, N.J.

From original by permission of Thos. G. Bennett Esq.

Oct. 1, 1736, Hendrick Van Gorder located a survey of 100 acres on the Delaware River below Flat Rock. He was living on this land in 1743, when John Lawrence, in running the partition line between East and West Jersey, took an offset from his house.*

The Stout tract, of 120 acres, on the Delaware, between Kirkbride's lower tract and the lands of John Emans, was surveyed to John Stout in 1744. He had also another tract of 245 acres in the township.

In 1745, Samuel Nevill located a tract of 1012 acres in Walpack, east of Kirkbride's lower tract. It extended up the Flatbrook to a point above Haney's Mills. Portions of this were bought by Adam Dingman and by a man named Ciphers in 1763. Adam Dingman had previously purchased a portion of the Nevill tract, for we find in Book A of land records of Sussex County that "in 1760, Adam Dingman agreed (as it is recited in the deed) to sell 121 acres on the Flat Brook, in Walpack, to Hendrick Aurands, a miller of the same place. In 1769 (Adam Dingman, having meantime died without making the conveyance) Andrew Dingman, his son and executor, executed the deed in accordance with his father's agreement." The land was a portion of the Samuel Nevill tract, which had been conveyed to Mr. Dingman previous to 1760.

In the above conveyance Hendrick Aurands is referred to as a "miller" of Walpack. There was an old mill near or within the limits of the land described in his deed, the ruins of which were seen over sixty years ago by several old persons now living. The location of the old ruin is on the Flatbrook, near where Miss Sally Warner now lives. This was probably the mill at which Hendrick Aurands operated previous to the date of his deed,—1760. If so, the mill was undoubtedly older than the Barton mill, at Flatbrookville. Several old settlers are of the opinion that this mill was the oldest in the township, if not in the county.

In 1749, Andrew Cole located 138 acres near Walpack Centre. It was situated on Flatbrook east of the Nicholas Emans tract.

Martin Ryerson, in 1750, located 243 acres on Flatbrook, above the Black tract.

In 1753, Samuel Nevill located 800 acres on the Delaware, above the lands surveyed to Ennis & Co., extending to the East Jersey line. Hon. Samuel Nevill was an early judge of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, and held the first Court of Oyer and Terminer in Sussex County.

Nicholas Emans, May 5, 1754, located 165 acres, adjoining Andrew Cole's land, near Walpack Centre.

In 1763, Richard Gardner had surveyed to him about 51 acres, east of the stout tract, on Flatbrook.

Asher Harriot owned 25 acres east of the Black tract, on Flatbrook; the date of its location is not given.

The Ennis tract, situated on the Delaware, above Joseph Kirkbride's 500 acres, was resurveyed to Cornelius Ennis, Christian Smith, and John Shoemaker, May 27, 1814.

Abraham Van Campen was an early settler in that part of Walpack which is now Pahaquarry, Warren Co. He was a member of the Consistory of the four Reformed Dutch Churches in 1741, a justice of the peace for many years, and a judge of the County Courts. When the border troubles began with the Indians, in 1755, he was the first to inform Governor Belcher, and was appointed colonel of a Sussex regiment of militia and assigned to the duty of protecting the frontiers. An interesting correspondence ensued between him and Governor Belcher, which will be found in the chapter on the French and Indian war, in this work.

Isaac Van Campen, of Shapanack, was also a prominent citizen of the township. He was one of the early justices of the peace, a judge of the County Courts, and a member of the Legislature from 1782 to 1785. He had a son Abraham, who has sometimes been confounded with the senior Abraham Van Campen. Abraham, the son of Isaac, succeeded his father in the estate at Shapanack, and became prominent in public affairs about the beginning of the Revolution. The Van Campens became a numerous and influential people in Walpack. The graves of nineteen of them may be counted in the old Shapanack burying-ground. The old stone house at Shapanack was probably built by Isaac Van Campen. That and the stone house now occupied by Jacob Roe (the old Jacob Myers house) are probably the oldest now standing in the township, and antedate the period of the Revolution. Abraham, the son, becoming involved, sold the place to the De Witts about 1811 or 1812, and removed to the adjoining place formerly occupied by Col. John Rosenkrans. Abraham Van Campen had a large family, most of them cripples.

On Oct. 15, 1735, Adam Dingman purchased, of John Crooks, 479 acres of land in Walpack (extending from the Delaware River to Flatbrook, and including portions of the property now owned by David Bunnell, Bowdewine Van Auker, and John B. Fuller); and in 1763 bought an additional tract, located east of the first. He subsequently divided this property—with the exception of a few acres sold to Nicholas Emans, Jan. 12, 1751—between his three sons, James, Jacob, and Peter. Jacob and Peter subsequently deeded it to James, who, on May 2, 1786, conveyed it to James and Peter Schoonover. Peter, in turn, conveyed it to Benjamin Schoonover in 1797, and Benjamin transferred a portion of it to Henry Bunnell, May 28, 1812. This was the last conveyance of the Dingman property in Walpack, and none of the descendants now reside in the township. Three deeds from James Dingman to James and Peter Schoonover bear the same date, May 2, 1786,—viz., one referred to above and the following.

* See field-book of John Lawrence, chapter on the Partition Line, in this work.

James and Peter Schoonover purchased of James Dingman, May 2, 1786, 15 acres on the Delaware adjoining lands of Jacob Van Campen, deceased. This was part of a tract conveyed by the proprietors of West Jersey to Richard Gardner, April 10, 1753, and assigned by Gardner to Martin Ryerson, Feb. 19, 1754. It was reassigned by Martin Ryerson to Adam Dingman, Feb. 19, 1757, and devised by Adam Dingman, in his last will and testament, to his son James.

James Dingman and Antje, his wife, May 2, 1786, conveyed, to James and Peter Schoonover, 429 acres of lands along the Delaware (formerly part of the Crook tract) willed to James, Jacob, and Peter Dingman by their father, Adam Dingman, deceased. These lands were afterwards conveyed to James Dingman by his brothers, Peter and Jacob.

John Emans owned 250 acres of land on the Delaware as early as 1729. This embraced part or all of what is now David Bunnell's flat-lands. Nicholas Emans, a son of John, lived and died on a portion of this purchase. He also owned 105 acres in the vicinity of Walpack Centre in 1754. Daniel Emans, a son of Nicholas, lived an old bachelor on a portion of the homestead, where he died in 1849, aged about eighty. What remained of the Emans homestead was then purchased by David Bunnell. Daniel Emans and his father, Nicholas, were buried on the old place.

Nicholas Schoonhoven was a resident and landowner in Walpack in 1737.* He and Thomas Brink together owned at the above date lands subsequently possessed by Emannel Hover, and still later by Jonas Smith, son of John Smith. Peter and James Schoonhoven (afterwards spelled "Schoonover") owned lands in the township as late as 1786, and Benjamin as late as 1812. Hendriens Schoonhoven was a freeholder for Walpack in 1762.

Capt. Emanuel Hover, who was a prominent early resident of Walpack, appears from the following deed of conveyance to have left the county before 1797. April 18, 1797, Manual Hover and Mary, his wife, of Northampton Co., Pa., conveyed to Jonas Smith and his wife, Mary, of Walpack, 150 acres, excepting one-half acre, it being "the common burying-ground of Walpack"; also 25 acres in an undivided 300-acre tract conveyed to Hover by Anne Brink, Nicholas Brink, Nelly Schoonover, widow of Nicholas Schoonover, Elijah Schoonover, and others.

John Cleves Symmes, one of the most distinguished citizens of Sussex, removed from Long Island to Walpack about 1760. The prominence of this family, together with some disputed points respecting portions of their history, induces us to give more space than usual to the subject. The following facts have been furnished chiefly by Thomas G. Bunnell, of Newton.

The Symmes family, so prominent and so well known in Sussex County during the Revolutionary era, trace their descent from Rev. Zachariah Symmes (1), who was born in Canterbury, England, April 5, 1599, and came to New England in 1634 in the same ship with Ann Hutchinson and John Lathrop. He became pastor of the church at Charlestown, Mass., which position he held until his death, Feb. 4, 1671. His son, William Symmes (2), was born at Dunstable, England, in 1627, and came to this country with his father in 1634. He was a sea-captain and died Sept. 22, 1691, leaving a son named Timothy, who was born in 1683. Timothy Symmes (3) married Elizabeth Rose in 1710. He was by occupation a farmer, and lived near Scituate, Mass., where his grandson, John Cleves Symmes, visited him in 1762. He died in 1765, leaving a son Timothy, who was born at Scituate in 1714. This son Timothy (4) was educated to the ministry, having graduated at Harvard University in 1733. He received ordination as a Presbyterian minister at East Haddam, Conn., Dec. 22, 1736, and married his first wife, Mary Cleves, in 1740. In 1742 he went to River Head, L. I., where his two sons were born,—John Cleves, July 21, 1742, and Timothy, April 10, 1744. For several years Rev. Timothy Symmes was engaged in missionary work in New Jersey, and at one time, we are told, was pastor of a Presbyterian Church at Elizabeth. He married, for his second wife, Eunice Cogswell, about 1750, and died at Ipswich, Mass., April 6, 1756.

John Cleves Symmes (5) was educated to the law, but never, as we can learn, practiced his profession. Previous to the Revolutionary war, about 1760, he removed from Long Island to Walpack, Sussex Co., N. J., where he became the owner of several hundred acres of the choicest land in the Flatbrook valley, including the present site of the village of Walpack Centre. In this neighborhood, on the farm now owned by Mrs. Nancy Cole, on the west side of the Flatbrook, he reared a dwelling, and around it planted an orchard of apple-trees. Some of the old trees in this orchard are still standing, but the house has been removed many years. Bowdewine Van Auken, Sr., one of the oldest men now living in the township, tells us that he well remembers the Symmes mansion. On a mountain-stream on the opposite side of the Flatbrook, Judge Symmes also erected a grist-mill, the site of which can yet be pointed out by those familiar with the location.

John Cleves Symmes was married to Anna Tuthill, daughter of Henry Tuthill, of Southold, L. I., when about eighteen years of age, and probably before he emigrated to Walpack. From this marriage there were two daughters, Maria and Anna. The latter lived with her grandfather Tuthill, at Southold, on Long Island, after her mother's death, and was educated in the female academy at East Hampton, and afterwards in the family and school of the celebrated Mrs. Isabella Graham, of New York. She accompanied her father to the valley of the Miami in 1788, being in her fourteenth year, and on Nov. 22, 1795, was united in marriage to William Henry Harrison.

* See deed for church and burial lot, dated Feb. 1, 1737, in history of Walpack Church.

After the death of Judge Symmes' first wife, Anna Tuthill, he married the "Widow Halsey," who lived only a few years, when he again married, his third wife being Susannah, daughter of the Hon. William Livingston, Governor of New Jersey, and sister to the wife of the celebrated John Jay.

Judge Symmes was chairman of the Committee of Safety for Sussex County, and at a meeting held in the court-house, Newton, on Aug. 10 and 11, 1775, he offered the patriotic preamble and resolution which were adopted by that body, and which appear in the Revolutionary history in this volume.

In 1776, Symmes was commissioned colonel of one of the militia regiments of Sussex, and on September 13th of the same year was appointed one of the judges of the County Court. This latter position he resigned a year later, and his brother, Timothy Symmes, was appointed Sept. 24, 1777, to fill his place. In March, 1776, he was ordered with his regiment to New York, where it was employed in erecting the forts and batteries on Manhattan Island and on Long Island. Shortly before the battle of Long Island he was elected a delegate to the State Convention of New Jersey, which met at Burlington in June of that year, and was a member of the committee which was appointed to draft a constitution for the State. Towards the close of 1776, Col. Symmes was sent by the Legislature, in company with Theunis Day, of Bergen County, to Ticonderoga, with the delicate task of making a new arrangement of the officers of the New Jersey regiments in the Northern Department. Their report will be found on pages 25 and 26 of "Officers and Men of New Jersey in the Revolutionary War." On the return of Col. Symmes from this important expedition he was ordered with his command to Morris County to join the brigade of Col. Jacob Ford. On Dec. 7, 1776, while quartered at Chatham and charged with the duty of covering the retreat of Washington through New Jersey, Col. Ford received intelligence that 800 British troops, commanded by Gen. Leslie, had advanced to Springfield, four miles away. Col. Symmes was ordered to check the approach of the enemy if possible. The following document, which we accidentally discovered in the clerk's office on the court records for February term, 1782, may be taken as conclusive authority on this point:

"These may certify that on the seventh day of December in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, I the subscriber then having the command of the militia from the county of Sussex in the State of New Jersey, lay at Chatham in sd State, with other Battalions of militia forming a Brigade under the command of Col. Jacob Ford, when Col. Ford had advised that the British troops to the number of Eight Hundred Men, under the command Genl Leslie had advanced to Springfield within four miles of Chatham. Col. Ford thereupon ordered me to proceed to Springfield and check the approach of the enemy if possible. According to orders, I marched to Springfield with a detachment of the Brigade and attacked the enemy in Springfield that evening. In the skirmish Capt. Samuel Kirkendall of the Sussex Militia was wounded in the Hand, his hand was split by a musket shot, from his middle finger to his wrist, by which wound he has lost the use of his right Hand. Given under my Hand at Newton in the State of New Jersey this 6th May 1780.

"JOHN CLEVES SYMMES Colonel.

"To whom it may concern."

The object of this certificate on the part of Judge Symmes was to induce the court to recommend Capt. Kirkendall for a position to do light garrison duty, and thus be enabled to earn something in the service.

In a civil point of view Col. Symmes rendered himself equally conspicuous and serviceable to the government. While a citizen of this State he served as a member of the Council of Safety, was a State senator in 1777 and 1780, resigned his command of the Third Sussex Battalion, May 23, 1777, to accept, under his father-in-law, Governor Livingston, the appointment of associate justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, which position he held about ten years. He also served two years in the Continental Congress.

Mrs. Symmes died July 25, 1776, and was buried in the old Shapanack burying-ground, about six miles above, on the farm now owned and occupied by the heirs of Moses Hull, deceased. This old graveyard is but a few hundred yards from the banks of the Delaware, near the ruins of the old Shapanack Dutch church, which was also erected previous to the Revolution. This old church was built of logs in the shape of an octagon. It was still standing and in use sixty years ago, and is well remembered by our older citizens. We last visited the spot July 15, 1871, and copied the following inscription from the plain marble slab which marks the spot where Mrs. Symmes is laid:

"In Remembrance of
MRS. ANNA SYMMES,
who was born October 1741, married to the HONBLE JNO C SYMMES, 30th October 1760, & died 25 July 1776, leaving two daughters,
MARIA & ANNA."

Maria (or Mary, as we find it in some old deeds) married Maj. Peyton Short, of Kentucky, and Anna married William Henry Harrison, afterwards President of the United States. Mrs. Harrison died at North Bend, Ohio, in February, 1864. The grave of Mrs. Symmes is surrounded by a rude stone wall, now badly crumbled to pieces and overgrown with briars and brambles. Down from the top of this grave was a large hole dug by burrowing animals and worn smooth and fresh by use. The following letter will explain how the stone inclosure came to be placed there:

"BETHLEHEM, Pa., AUG. 14, 1871

"MY DEAR SIR,—Circumstances partly beyond my control have prevented an earlier reply to your letter relative to the grave of Mrs. John Cleves Symmes, in Shapanack, Sussex Co., N. J., and I now have the pleasure to say that about 1851 my son Charles had his attention called to the unprotected condition of the grave by Miss Blinn Wykoop, then a resident on the DeWitt farm. My son wrote to Mrs. Anna Harrison, one of the daughters of Mrs. Symmes, and widow of President Harrison, residing at Cleves, Ohio, who immediately authorized him to secure the title to the property and have a wall erected around the grave. My son, who resided at Easton, Pa., immediately communicated Mrs. Harrison's wishes to me, and I had them carried out, except the purchase of title. About the same time Mrs. Harrison had Gustav Greenwald, an artist of Bethlehem, Pa., to visit the spot and make a painting of the place, which was done in a very handsome manner and to the satisfaction of Mrs. Harrison. The painting was sent to her at her residence in Cleves, a short distance below Cincinnati, Ohio.

"Truly yours, etc.,

"A. G. BRODHEAD.

"To THOS. G. BUNNELL, Esq., Newton, N. J."

Judge Symmes, having made a contract with the government of the United States for the purchase (by himself and associates) of all the lands lying between the Great and Little Miami Rivers, embracing, as was supposed, about 2,000,000 acres, left his home in New Jersey some time in the year 1787 for the examination of the purchase, afterwards known as "Symmes' purchase." This contract with the government, for some reason (see "Burnet's Letters") was not in full carried out. Only about half of the original quantity of land contracted for was conveyed to Judge Symmes and his associates, among whom was Gen. Jonathan Dayton, of this State, after whom Dayton, Ohio, was named.

Judge Symmes, after inspecting the lands of his purchase, returned to New Jersey, and in the month of July, 1788, again left for the West with a small colony of emigrants and landed at North Bend, 15 miles below the present site of Cincinnati, in February, 1789. He must have left New Jersey on his final remove West as early as July, 1788, as on the 6th of August in that year Rev. Manassa Cutler met him and his party at Bedford, Pa., of which he made the following notice in his journal:

"Judge Symmes—John Cleves—had taken lodgings at the best tavern (in Bedford); we, however, made shift to get lodgings in the same house, —Mr. Wert's, a Dutchman. Judge Symmes was complainant. I had a letter to him from his brother (Timothy Symmes) at Sussex Court-house (N. J.). He had his daughter (Anna) with him, a very pretty young lady, one or two women with husbands, six heavy wagons, one stage-wagon, and a chair,—a two-wheeled covered conveyance for two persons, —thirty-one horses, three carpenters, and one mason; has been out three weeks."

"August 7.—I rose early this morning; foggy, so that we could see but little of the town; set out just after sunrise. Judge Symmes' wagons were nearly ready to start when we left the houses," etc.

This journal, which is now the property of the New Jersey Historical Society, is conclusive on two disputed points,—viz., it settles beyond doubt the time of Judge Symmes' final removal from New Jersey, and also that his daughter was not married to William Henry Harrison until after their arrival in Ohio.

A grandson of Judge Symmes, and a son of Gen. Harrison,* now living in Indiana, gives us the following additional particulars:

"Judge Symmes laid out a town at North Bend, to be called 'The City of Symmes,' but, Cincinnati having been selected for the station of the government troops and location of Fort Washington, emigrants flocked to the Cincinnati settlement as offering greater protection against Indian depredations. Judge Symmes had sold some lots in the proposed city, but soon repurchased the most of them and abandoned the enterprise. The judge made North Bend his home, though he was much of his time at Cincinnati, attending to the sale and settlement of his lands.

"Soon after the organization of the Northwestern Territory Judge Symmes was appointed (Feb. 19, 1788) one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the Territory, and attended the sittings of the court at Detroit and Marietta. About the year 1808 he built a large and costly dwelling at North Bend, and when not engaged from home on judicial duties employed himself in making titles for lands sold and superintending the clearing up and improvement of the lands about North Bend, which (with the consent of his associates) he had reserved for his own use and cultivation. Some time in the year 1810 the judge's fine residence at North Bend was destroyed by fire, the work of an incendiary whose aspirations for the dignified position of justice of the peace the judge did not happen to endorse. With the house all the judge's valuable papers were destroyed, causing some inconvenience and embarrassment in arranging the titles of settlers to lands purchased. After the destruction of his house at North Bend the judge made one of the hotels of Cincinnati his principal headquarters, visiting frequently his settlement at North Bend, and residing while there at the house of Mr. John Cunningham, the devoted and faithful manager of his lands. In the spring of 1812, Gen. William H. Harrison, his son-in-law, moved his family from Vincennes, Ind., to Cincinnati, and the judge at once became an inmate of Gen. Harrison's family, where, under the tender care of his daughter, he lived until his death, which occurred Feb. 26, 1814, in the seventy-third year of his age. He died of cancer, and was buried at North Bend."

An appropriate monument marks his resting-place, upon which is the following inscription:

"Here who, at the foot of these hills, made the first settlement between the Miami Rivers.

Born on Long Island, State of New York, July 21, 1742.
Died at Cincinnati, Feb. 26, 1814."

Judge Symmes is spoken of as being a man of laborious habits, temperate and frugal in all things, and eminently distinguished for kindness and inflexible integrity.

Timothy Symmes, a judge of the county for many years, resided in Walpack and kept a hotel. He was a brother of John Cleves Symmes and father of John Cleves Symmes, Jr., the famous author of the theory of concentric spheres, or the hollow sphericity of the earth. Timothy Symmes was appointed judge Sept. 24, 1777, in place of his brother, John Cleves Symmes, resigned. He held the office, presiding over the court of the county, till 1791. In 1793 he removed to Ohio. He was a staunch patriot during the Revolution, and a prominent Freemason. John Cleves Symmes, Jr., was a captain in the war of 1812, and distinguished himself for bravery in the battles of Bridgewater, Fort Erie, and Lundy's Lane; he was a native of Walpack.

Several forts were built along the Delaware River during the French and Indian war. One of these was the old Nonanock fort, in what is now Sandyston; another stood at Shapanack, and was part of Col. John Rosenkrans' house during the Revolution. It stood on the site of the house now occupied by Joseph A. Hull, and, of all the surrounding country, was the most beautiful and eligible site for a garrison, being on an elevated plateau commanding the river for miles up and down.

Johannes Deputé, of Walpack, was once the hero of a conflict with the Indians, who attacked his house with savage ferocity; single-handed he beat them off. Nicholas Cole, however, was not so fortunate. The savages surrounded his house in the night, set fire to it, and then murdered the inmates as they were trying to effect their escape.

Col. John Rosenkrans owned a large tract of land about Walpack Centre, extending to the Delaware River. He married Oranna De Witt, a relative of De Witt Clinton, and lived at Shapanack. Col. Rosenkrans gave the ground on which the old Shapanack church stood, with a provision in the deed that the ground should revert to the donor or his heirs when it ceased to be used for church purposes. Sixty-five or seventy years ago there were large congregations at the old Shapanack church; the organization, however, was abandoned sixty years ago, part of the congregation going to the Walpack, and part to the Peters' Valley Church.

Col. John I. Rosenkrans married one of the daughters of Abraham Van Campen, of Shapanack; she became the mother of Abraham Van Campen Rosenkrans,—commonly called "Camp" Rosenkrans,—who was a school-teacher, and succeeded his grandfather, Abraham Van Campen, on the Col. John Rosenkrans property, where Joseph A. Hull now lives.

Some time during the Revolution, John Dimon, a young man of eighteen, came from New England with Simeon Vaughn and wife. Mr. Vaughn was a shoemaker, and located on the farm now owned by Peter B. Van Horn. John Dimon bought of William Henry Harrison and wife, June 26, 1811, the farm adjoining that of Mr. Vaughn, consisting of 62-65 acres, for the consideration of $600. The farm was afterwards owned by his son Jonathan, the father-in-law of Nicholas Tillman, the present owner. John Dimon married Elizabeth, daughter of Jacob Scott, and had a family of fifteen children, of whom twelve arrived at maturity and ten reared families. Jonathan Dimon, who inherited the homestead, was born in 1784 and died in 1862, leaving one son and two daughters,—viz., Jacob N. V., now residing in Frankford township; Jane, who married Daniel H. Rosenkrans, now residing in Sandyston; and Lydia, wife of Nicholas Tillman, now residing on the homestead. John Dimon was a Revolutionary soldier in Capt. Simmons' company. His son Jonathan married Hannah, daughter of Nathaniel Van Arken, and at one time built a mill on Van Horn's Brook.

Zebulon Losey settled about 1780 upon the farm where his grandson Amos now lives. He came from Dover, Morris Co. His first house, like those of most of his neighbors, was a log cabin. His sons were John, Stephen, and Isaac. John and Stephen removed to New York; Isaac was apprenticed to Simon Vaughn to learn the shoemaker's trade, and afterwards set up a shop at his own house, working evenings at his trade and devoting his day-labor to his land. He thus cleared his farm, and turned many an honest penny by keeping his neighbors' shoes in repair. Isaac Losey was an exhorter and local preacher, and may justly be regarded as the father of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Walpack Centre.

Isaac Losey's sons were Zebulon, John, Cyrus, and David, the last named being the only survivor. One of Isaac Losey's sisters married a schoolmaster named Jonathan Thompson; another married a man named Norris, a pettifogger, who lived about a mile from Walpack Centre, on the road leading across the mountain. There were several log houses there at that time, and the place was called "Norristown,"—a name which has since been dropped.

The old stone house at Shapanack was purchased about 1811 or 1812 of Abraham Van Campen by Henry De Witt, of Rochester, Ulster Co., N. Y., for his son, John H. De Witt, who at that time became the occupant of the place; the peculiar long-roofed barn now standing on the premises was built by him. John H. De Witt's mother was Margaret Schoonmaker, of Ulster Co., N. Y. He married a Wynkoop, of the same county. Mr. De Witt died in 1827, and was buried at Shapanack.

The De Witts had many slaves, and among them was an interesting old servant called "Cæsar;" Cæsar Soules was his name. New Jersey abolished slavery by an act passed April 18, 1846. By the census of 1850 there was but one slave in Sussex county; this was Cæsar Soules. He had refused to accept his freedom, clinging to his old home and association, and choosing to remain for the rest of his life upon the farm. The De Witts had been kind to their slaves. Some two or three years before the death of Cæsar, Peter De Witt, now of Somerville, N. J., kindly provided for the faithful old servant by hiring his board in a respectable colored family of the neighborhood,—that of Absalom Reamer,—where he spent the remainder of his days, being frequently visited and kindly cared for by Mr. De Witt. He died March 11, 1860. As with colored people generally, his age was not certainly known. Mr. De Witt says, "I was never able to learn the correct date of his birth. My grandfather used to say that when he was a young married man, and just beginning to farm, Cæsar was a boy old enough to plow, and from that circumstance I judge he was in the neighborhood of one hundred years old when he died."

Jacob Cole became a resident of Walpack some time during the Revolution. On Nov. 22, 1815, he purchased of Peyton Short and his sons, John C. and C. W. Short, for $2304, part of the old Symmes tract, containing 192.14 acres, on which Dayton Cole now lives. Jacob Cole, Sr., married Phebe, daughter of Jonathan Marsh, the lessee of the old Shoemaker farm of John Cleves Symmes, as shown by a lease in Judge Symmes' own handwriting, dated March 20, 1783. Jacob Cole, Sr., had ten children, of whom the sons were Abraham, who died on the old homestead; Simeon, who removed to Illinois; Jacob, who also removed to the West; Benjamin, who resides in the neighborhood; and Jason, who died in Pennsylvania. The younger Jacob Cole married Rebecca, daughter of Isaac Losey, of Walpack Centre. Dayton Cole, son of Abraham Cole, deceased, married Eveline, daughter of Hon. Timothy E. Shay, of Sandyston, and resides on the old homestead. Sarah, daughter of Jacob Cole, Sr., married Cornelius Fuller, of Walpack, and Margaret, another daughter, married James W. Fuller, a brother of Cornelius. They were sons of Eli Fuller.

Eli Fuller came from Pennsylvania and settled in Walpack about 1800. Nov. 22, 1815, he purchased of Peyton Short and sons part of the portion of the old Symmes tract which John Cleves Symmes deeded to his daughter, Mary Short. Upon this property he found an old dismantled grist-mill, supposed to have been built by Judge Symmes soon after his arrival in Walpack. The Fullers soon after erected mills where Haney's Mills now stands, which they continued to operate until about twenty years ago.

Among the early residents of Walpack were the Deckers, who have left numerous descendants still residing in the township. Daniel Decker, born at Mackhackemaek, April 22, 1737, and dwelling there, was married Dec. 4, 1756, by Anthony Van Ellen, justice of the peace, to Blandina Vredenburg, a native of Pennsylvania,* born Jan. 23, 1738. They settled where Daniel D. Decker, a grandson, now lives, at Decker's Ferry, in Walpack. Daniel Decker died March 1, 1813, and was buried on the farm where he resided; his wife died Nov. 22, 1835, in her ninety-seventh year. They had seven children, four sons and three daughters, as follows: 1. Henry, married Margery Westbrook, and had children,—Daniel, Andrew D., John, Abraham, Elijah, Mary, Salache, Blandina; 2. Thomas, born Nov. 25, 1775, married Susanna Shoemaker, and had children,—Henry S., Daniel D., Samuel, Peggy Maria, Sarah Ann, Calvin, and Blandina; he died April 26, 1866; 3. Aaron, married Jane Brokaw, and had children,—John A., Caleb, Abraham, George W., Daniel, and Amanda, now Mrs. Kintner, of Middleville, Stillwater township; 4. John, born April 24, 1780, married Maria Brokaw, died March 10, 1827; among his children are Peter, Abraham, Aaron, Sarah, Salache, and Jane; 5. Sarah, married John Swartwood and removed to Tioga Co., N. Y.; 6. Jane, married James Van Auken, of Monroe Co., Pa., father of Casparus Van Auken, of Hardwick, Warren Co.; 7. Hannah, married John Depue, of Pahaquarry; she was the mother of Moses, Daniel, Nicholas, and John Depue.

Daniel Decker located on part of the old Schoonover and Brink purchase, at Decker's Ferry, which he is believed to have established soon after his settlement there. His sons, Henry, Thomas, Aaron, and John, became farmers in Walpack and died in the township. Aaron was a justice of the peace and a chosen freholder for a number of years. Henry was a soldier in the war of 1812, as was also his son, Henry, Jr. John carried on the ferry and established a blacksmith-shop in the vicinity.

Levett B. Bristol, who married one of John Decker's daughters, kept one of the first stores at Flatbrookville. Most of the Deckers now residing in Walpack are the descendants of Thomas, the second son of Daniel Decker. The ferry which bears their name has been in the hands of the family uninterruptedly for more than a hundred years.

Mrs. Jonas Smith, a daughter of Thomas Decker, now living in Walpack, recollects hearing her mother relate that many years ago William Hill, with his wife and two children, came down the Delaware in a canoe, en route from Kingston, and landed one evening at her father's, who then resided on the Delaware at "Fiddler's Elbow," where William Hull now lives. Mr. Hill and his family spent the night with Mr. Decker, and in the morning presented Mrs. Decker, in return for her hospitality, a wooden butter-bowl, which was until lately in the keeping of Mrs. Smith. Mr. Hill bought 500 acres of land above Flatbrookville, on a portion of which Sarah, widow of Uriah Hill, now resides. William Hill died in the summer of 1844, at an advanced age, leaving sons,—Andrew, Nehemiah, Uriah, David, and Enos. Uriah and Enos have a number of descendants in the township, Andrew in Warren County, and Nehemiah in Stillwater township. Enos, the youngest and only surviving son, resides at Newton.

John Smith came from Bucks Co., Pa., and settled on the Pennsylvania side of the Minisink as early as 1730. His son Jonas purchased of Capt. Emanuel Hover the farm now occupied by Philip S. Rosenkrans, at the old Walpack burying-ground, on which he lived. Among his children were Jacob, who for many years was a merchant at Flatbrookville; William, who was a miller at the same place, and subsequently removed to Susquehanna Co., Pa., where he died at an advanced age; and Philip J., who succeeded his father in the old homestead, where he died one of the wealthiest farmers in Walpack.

Philip Smith, the third son of the original John, married Dorothy, daughter of Stuffle Smith, a German. He owned, and occupied till the time of his death, the large farm on the river-flats near the Walpack church, now owned by John W. Vass. He had sons,—Philip Smith, who lived and died on part of the old homestead; Jonas Smith, a farmer residing on Flatbrook; John Smith, who died the owner of the old homestead about 1863; and Jacob Smith, who still resides in Walpack. His daughters were Elizabeth, wife of Benjamin Depue, of Big Flats, N. Y.; Barbara, wife of Adam Eschback, of Walpack; Catharine, wife of Benjamin Hull, of Walpack; and one who was the first wife of Samuel Gariss, of Flatbrookville.

Jacob Smith, the fourth son of John, was born March 27, 1773, and died April 8, 1834. He was buried in the old Shapanack burying-ground. He lived on a farm in Sandlyston. Two of his sons were Daniel and John. Daniel lived and died near Flatbrookville; John lived near Peters' Valley, in Sandlyston, on the farm now occupied by Jacob J., a son of Daniel Smith, but removed to Ohio many years ago. Ludwick Smith, another son of the original John, died at Stroudsburg, Pa., some years ago. He was the maternal grandfather of Ed. H. Mott, the well-known journalist, formerly of Milford, Pa.

The daughters of the original John Smith were Elizabeth, wife of John Miller, of Pennsylvania; Christeen, wife of Jacob Walter, of the same State; and one other, who married Leonard Karess (Gariss), of Walpack. Leonard Gariss was a German, and came to Walpack from Bucks Co., Pa. His sons were Jonas, Isaac, Philip, Abraham, and John, who have many descendants in the Delaware valley.

Jacob Myers, a native of Montague, settled in Walpack, about 1800, upon the place at Walpack Centre where Jacob Roe now lives; he died in 1850, aged eighty-six. He had sons,—Josias, Abijah, William, and Jacob. Abijah moved to Frankford township and settled on the present Howell place; the others moved away from the county. Elizabeth, the youngest daughter of Jacob Myers, is now the widow of the late John Losey, and resides at Walpack Centre.

Jonathan Jones, a native of Wales, came from Bucks Co., Pa., near the close of the last century. He worked a farm on the river road, belonging to Mrs. Sabilla Mushbaek, widow of John Mushbaek (drowned in the Delaware River), to whom he was married by Rev. Elias Van Benschooten, Sept. 20, 1795.* Mr. Jones soon became a landed proprietor of some consequence, and a man of influence in the township. He owned a farm on Flatbrook, about a mile above its mouth, where he had a distillery. He represented the township of Walpack in the board of chosen freeholders in 1799, 1802-4, and 1808-11. He died on his farm, on Flatbrook, where his son Moses afterwards lived. Of his eleven children, four were sons,—viz., Moses, Aaron, Jonathan, Jr., and Edward. All except Moses removed from the township. Moses was killed by his team running away and dashing his head against a saw-log near the mill. He was frequently chosen moderator of the town-meetings. Two of his sons are Cyrus and Andrew J. Jones; the former resides near Flatbrookville, and the latter at Milburn, Essex Co., N. J. He owned the old homestead till a few years ago. The eldest daughter married David Morrow, of Wantage, another is the widow of the late Cyrus Crissman, of Milford, Pa., and Emily, the youngest daughter, is the wife of Moses C. Westbrook, of Blooming Grove, Pike Co., Pa.

Nathaniel Van Auken became a resident of Walpack in the spring of 1798. He was a son of Daniel Van Auken, and was born on his father's farm, a few miles above Carpenter's Point, on the Neversink.

March 18, 1789, he married Mary (Maria) Westbrook, daughter of Richard Westbrook, of Montague, and settled on a farm in Wantage, where he resided till he removed to Walpack, as above stated. He purchased the old homestead of Samuel Westbrook, where he continued to reside until his death, Jan. 26, 1835, in the seventy-first year of his age; his wife died March 22, 1856, aged eighty-two. They had seven children: 1. John W., married Rachel Rosenkrans, and settled in Walpack, afterwards removed to Luzerne Co., Pa., where he died; 2. Sarah, married Henry B. Wintermute, of Stillwater, and forty-eight years ago removed to Steuben Co., N. Y.; 3. Bowdewine, married Lydia Dodderer, of Stillwater, and resided in Walpack, where he died in the eighty-second year of his age; 4. Hannah, married Jonathan Dimon, of Walpack, and resided in Walpack, on the Dimon homestead, till her death, in the eighty-seventh year of her age; 5. Abraham, married Catharine Bevans, of Sandlyston, resided in Walpack till his removal to Pike Co., Pa., where he died in the seventy-fourth year of his age; 6. Mahala M., married Daniel Depue, of Pahaquarry, and lived in Walpack till the death of her husband, since which she has resided in Warren County, and with her daughter in Pennsylvania; 7. Leah Naomi Jane, married William Clark, of Montague, settled in Walpack, and after several removals died in the State of Delaware.

Nathaniel Van Auken belonged to a family of fifteen children,—eight sons and seven daughters. Fourteen of them—seven sons and seven daughters—married and reared families of their own. The oldest son, Jeremiah, was the school-teacher murdered by the Indians in his school-house at the time of Brant's raid upon the Neversink, in the fall of 1779. Nathaniel Van Auken entered the Revolutionary army at the age of sixteen, and was in the receipt of a pension at the time of his death. Nathaniel and Bowdewine Van Auken, sons of Bowdewine Van Auken, now occupy the estate of their grandfather, in Walpack.

Daniel Crissman came from Reading, Berks Co., Pa., soon after the Revolution, with his wife and four children,—John, George, Daniel, and Peggy,—and settled in Walpack, on what is known as the Crissman property, three miles above Flatbrookville. He had been a hatter at Reading, where he accumulated some property, which at the close of the Revolutionary war was all in Continental money, and, that becoming worthless, it almost ruined him. He then came to Walpack, hoping to retrieve his lost fortune at farming. He purchased a farm from his brother Charles, who had preceded him to New Jersey, and on it he lived and died. He and his wife were buried in the old Walpack burying-ground. George succeeded his father in the ownership of the farm, and lived there until his death, about thirty years ago. Peggy married Andreas Cole, who owned and occupied a farm on the Flatbrook, near where Walpack Centre now is. George married Sarah, daughter of John Dimon, of Walpack, by whom he raised a family of sons and daughters. Of his children, Ira, a bachelor, resides at Milford, Pike Co., Pa., where he is a justice of the peace; Cyrus married a daughter of Moses Jones, of Walpack, and died at Milford, Pa., where his widow and family still reside; Allen was a school-teacher, and died single; Clarissa married Israel C. Conkle, of Warren County, where she died, leaving a family; Lucinda married Oakley Stoll, and resides near Walpack Centre.

Peter Knight and Abraham Schnavle were early settlers in the vicinity of Walpack Centre. Peter Knight came from Bucks Co., Pa.; he married a Saylor. His son Daniel married Margaret Rosenkrans; his daughter Auna was the wife of Peter P. Petty. Schnavle's two sons, Peter and George, were soldiers in the war of 1812.

Benjamin Hull was among the early settlers in the Shapanack neighborhood.

Henry Bunnell, son of Isaac Bunnell, removed from Middle Smithfield, Monroe Co., Pa., in the spring of 1809, and purchased part of the original tract of land deeded to John Emans in 1729. He added to this additional purchases from the original Crooks' grant, and became one of the wealthy land-owners of the township. Henry Bunnell was a blacksmith, and upon his settlement in Walpack set up a shop near his house.*

Just above Henry Bunnell's, on the river road, George Fisher kept a tavern about 1830. Stoffle Sigafus had previously lived there in a log house, which Fisher bought and converted into a tavern for the accommodation of raftmen on the Delaware. The place is known as Rosenkrans' Eddy. A ferry was formerly kept across the river at this point, and, from its central location, it was for many years the chosen place for holding town-meetings and general trainings. The ferry was established by Sigafus, and was subsequently carried on by Fishler and others. Henry Sigafus, Joseph Haney, and Isaac Gariss were landlords successively of the old tavern. The landing of the raftmen, the goers and comers over the ferry, the town-meetings and general trainings, made it a place of considerable life and stir. There was always plenty of fun, and never a lack of poor whisky.

Early in the nineteenth century there was a considerable immigration from Bucks Co., Pa., into Walpack. Among the families thus migrating were the Haney's, Knights, Sheets, Shafers, Sigafuses, Seamaus, Shupes, and Traugers. There were also Yost Yetter, John Gariss, and others. The Kishpaughs came from Stillwater or Hardwick.

Daniel and John Shoemaker, sons of Henry Shoemaker, a Revolutionary soldier of Pahaquarry, settled in Walpack early in the present century. Daniel Shoemaker bought of Peyton Short and sons 134½ acres of the old Symmes estate, Nov. 22, 1815. On this property he lived and died, and was succeeded by his son, Benjamin T. Shoemaker. Henry Shoemaker, a lawyer, who lived and died at Branchville, was a son of Daniel. His other children were John T., a farmer, living in Warren County; Moses, who married Patience, eldest daughter of Jesse Bell, and lives in Pike Co., Pa.; and Daniel and Thomas T., deceased. There were two daughters, Sarah and Margaret; the former married George Labar, of Monroe Co., Pa.

John Shoemaker, brother of Daniel, resided for many years on the farm now owned and occupied by Cornelius D. Guun. He was one of the freeholders for Walpack from 1827 to 1831, and again in 1834. He removed with his family soon after to the Susquehanna valley, in Pennsylvania.

Robert Bell removed from old Newton township to Walpack. He purchased, April 30, 1808, 197½ acres of land on Flatbrook, near Walpack Centre. This land formerly belonged to the estate of Judge Symmes, and was conveyed by his daughter, Anna Harrison. June 26, 1811, he purchased of William Henry Harrison and wife 197½ acres of land formerly bought by Judge Symmes of Isaac Van Nest. Robert Bell married Mary, daughter of the elder Leonard Struble, of Myrtle Grove, now Hampton township. His sons were Jacob, a blacksmith at Walpack Centre, who married a Bale and afterwards removed to Wilsonville, Pa.; Jesse, who married a Miss Young and reared a large family. He lived on the John Shoemaker place, in Walpack, till about twenty years ago, when he removed to Sandyston, where he died; he was a member of the Legislature in 1843 and 1844. John Bell lived near Swartwood, and had one son and one daughter. The son, Leonard, Jr., removed to the West; the daughter is Mrs. Jacob N. V. Dimon, of Frankford.

Leonard Bell, the brother of Jesse, married Lucinda, daughter of Maj. Benjamin Roseukrans, and lived and died near Walpack Centre. Nancy Bell married Abraham Cole, of Walpack; she is now a widow, and resides with her son, Dayton Cole, on the old Symmes homestead. Susan Bell married Helam Van Auken of Walpack; Elizabeth married John A. Struble, of Hampton; Margaret married John Bevans, of Sandyston, and resides there; Robert married a daughter of Henry Burk, of Walpack, and lived and died on his father's homestead, leaving one son, Emmet.

About 1825, James Vardakin kept a small store on the east side of Flatbrook, at Walpack Centre, in a building erected by his father-in-law, Ira Fuller. He was succeeded in 1828 by George W. Lane and William Stoll, who had previously been merchants at Lafayette. They continued in business about a year and a half, during which time ex-Surrogate Charles Roe, then a boy, was their clerk.

James Vardakin, about 1829 or 1830, shot Christopher Divers at a general training. It was on the place where John Layton, Jr., now lives, just over the Sandyston line. Vardakin, who was standing guard, was somewhat intoxicated, and when Mr. Divers, who was also in a state of intoxication, attempted to pass, Vardakin halted him and leveled his gun. Divers, thinking it was all in fun, laughed and attempted to pass on, when he was shot. The gun was loaded with gravel and inflicted a terrible wound, of which Divers afterwards died a miserable death. Vardakin was a character universally detested by the community. He was subsequently removed to Pennsylvania, where he died.

III.—AGED PERSONS IN WALPACK.

In June, 1880, Walpack contained eighteen persons aged between sixty and sixty-five years. Those aged sixty-five and upwards are named in the following list:

Gariss, 74; John Hetzel, 65; Sarah Hill, 79; Cyrus Jones, 67; Rachel Jones, 66; Charles Kishpangh, 70; Daniel Knight, 66; Elizabeth Losey, 69; David Losey, 66; Triphena Losey, 66; Amelia Ribble, 73; Elizabeth Smith, 73; Lucretia Stoll, 66; Jacob Smith, Jr., 65; William Sigafus, 67; Anna Sigafus, 66; Jonas Smith, 70; Sarah A. Smith, 67; Nancy Stoll, 79; James W. Follor.*

IV.—MORAVIAN MISSION IN WALPACK.

In the "Memorials of the Moravian Church" we find the following:

* The Brethren preached and kept a school in the upper valley of the Delaware, on the Jersey shore, in 1746 and 1747. In the former year Joseph Shaw was settled at Walpack; here his wife deceased. He also preached at the Minisink Church, and on one occasion, in April of 1747, had a promiscuous audience of Swedes, English, Scotch, Irish, Welsh, Germans, Walloons, Shawanese, Mohawks, Delawares, and Catalas."
